Introduction: What Is “The Jewish Study Bible”?

MORE THAN TWENTY-FIVE CENTURIES have passed since an anonymous Jewish poet wrote an elaborate and lengthy prayer that included this exclamation:

O how I love your teaching!

It is my study all day long (Ps. 119.97).

These two themes—the love for Torah (teaching) and dedication to the study of it—have characterized Jewish reading and interpretation of the Bible ever since. The love is the impetus for the study; the study is the expression of the love. Indeed the intensity with which Jews have examined this text through the centuries testifies both to their love of it—a love combined with awe and deep reverence—and to their intellectual curiosity about it. That tradition of impassioned intellectual engagement continues to the present day.

The tradition of biblical interpretation has been a constant conversation, at times an argument, among its participants; at no period has the text been interpreted in a monolithic fashion. If anything marks Jewish biblical interpretation it is the diversity of approaches employed and the multiplicity of meanings produced. This is expressed in the famous rabbinic saying: “There are seventy faces to the Torah” (Num. Rab. 13.15 and parallels), meaning that biblical texts are open to seventy different interpretations, with seventy symbolizing a large and complete number. Thus, there is no official Jewish interpretation of the Bible. In keeping with this attitude, the interpreters who contributed to this volume have followed a variety of methods of interpretation, and the editors have not attempted to harmonize the contributions, so an array of perspectives is manifest. In addition, we do not claim any privileged status for this volume; we can only hope that it will find its place among the myriad Jewish interpretations that have preceded and will follow. We hope that Jewish readers will use this book as a resource to better understand the multiple interpretive streams that have informed, and continue to inform, their tradition. We also hope that The Jewish Study Bible will serve as a compelling introduction for students of the Bible from other backgrounds and traditions, who are curious about contemporary academic Jewish biblical interpretation.

Jews have been engaged in reading and interpreting the Bible, or Tanakh, since its inception. Even before the biblical canon was complete, some of its early writings were becoming authoritative, and were cited, alluded to, and reworked in later writings, which themselves would become part of the Bible. Jewish biblical interpretation continued in various forms in early translations into Greek and Aramaic, in the Dead Sea Scrolls, in rabbinic literature, and in medieval and modern commentaries; it continues in the present. We therefore have kept in mind two overarching goals in the commissioning and editing of the study materials in this volume. The first goal is to convey the best of modern academic scholarship on the Bible, that is, scholarship that reflects the way the Bible is approached in the university. This desire comes from a strong conviction that this approach does not undermine Judaism, as leading figures of previous generations had argued, but can add significant depth to Jewish belief and values. The second goal is to reflect, in as broad a fashion as possible, the range of Jewish engagement with the Bible over the past two and a half millennia. The breadth of this engagement, as well as its depth, should not be underestimated. In fact, as a group, the contributors reflect divergent Jewish commitments and beliefs, which infuse their commentaries. They employ state-of-the-art scholarship and a wide range of modern approaches; at the same time, they are sensitive to Jewish readings of the Bible, to classical Jewish interpretation, and to the place of the Bible in Jewish life. In this respect they are actually quite “traditional,” in that Jewish interpreters have a long history of drawing on ideas and methods from the non-Jewish world in which they lived and incorporating them into Jewish writings.

Although there is no single notion of Jewish biblical interpretation, our contributors share some commonalities:

- They view the Tanakh as complete in itself, not as a part of a larger Bible or a prelude to the New Testament. For all of them, the Tanakh is “the Bible,” and for this reason The Jewish Study Bible uses the terms “Tanakh” and “the Bible” interchangeably.
- We avoid the term “Hebrew Bible,” a redundancy in the Jewish view. Jews have no Bible but the “Hebrew Bible.” (Some Christians use “Hebrew Bible,” a sensitive substitute for “Old Testament,” to distinguish it from the Greek Bible, or New Testament.)
- They take seriously the traditional Hebrew (Masoretic) text of the Bible.
- They take cognizance of and draw upon traditional Jewish interpretation, thereby placing themselves in the larger context of Jewish exegesis.
- They point out where biblical passages have influenced Jewish practice.
- They call attention to biblical passages that are especially meaningful in the life of the Jewish community.

Just as there is no one Jewish interpretation, there is no authorized Jewish translation of the Bible into English. In fact, translation has always been less important in Jewish communal life than in Christian communities, because public liturgical readings from the Bible have always been in Hebrew, a language understood until recent centuries by many within the community. For Jews, the official Bible is the Hebrew Masoretic Text; it has never been replaced by an official translation (like the Vulgate, for instance, which is the official Bible of the Roman Catholic Church). Nevertheless, because many Jews since postbiblical times did not understand biblical Hebrew, translations into vernacular languages were made. For contemporary English-speaking Jews, the best and most widely read Jewish translation is the most recent one commissioned and published by the Jewish Publication Society, begun in 1955 and completed in 1982, with revisions to the earlier books incorporated in the 1985 edition, and with a revised and corrected second edition in 1999. That second edition of the translation (NJPS Tanakh) serves as the basis for this volume.

There is no single way to read through the Bible—this is reflected in the variety of orders found for the biblical books in manuscripts and rabbinic texts. In fact, some may prefer first to read background material about the Bible, and only then to read the text. For this reason, we have taken an expansive approach in offering numerous essays that explore many aspects of the Bible and its interpretation. Some of these are of the type found in other study Bibles, exploring issues such as canon, the history of the biblical period, and modern methods of studying the Bible. Others reflect the specific interests of The Jewish Study Bible, including essays on the history of the Jewish interpretation of the Bible, Jewish Bible translation, midrash, and the Bible in the Jewish philosophical, mystical, and liturgical traditions. Each essay is self-standing, and there is often overlap between them. As a whole, however, they convey the important place of the Bible within Judaism, and many of the varieties of uses that this text has found throughout the ages. We hope that, along with the annotations, these essays will introduce a wide audience to the world of Jewish tradition as it relates to the Bible. (A brief introduction to the essays, pp. 1827–28, sets out their arrangement and aims in greater detail.)

For each book of the Bible, our contributors have provided an introduction that sets it in its context—its original setting, so far as that can be determined; the wider corpus of which it is a part; its genre; and its place within Judaism—and provides an overview of the issues involved in reading it. Like many traditional rabbinic texts, the main text, here the NJPS translation, is surrounded by commentary, or more precisely annotations, often quite extensive, that comment on specific points in the text but also bring the reader back to the larger issues raised in the introduction and elsewhere. These annotations frequently refer to other portions of the biblical text, and further insight can be gained by checking these references and reading those texts and their associated annotations.

Besides the essays described above, the volume has further information. A timeline lists rulers in the land of Israel and the surrounding empires during the biblical period. A chart of weights and measures gives modern approximations to the quantities specified at various points in the text (these are usually explained in the annotations as well). A table of chapter/verse numbering differences between the Hebrew text and standard, non-Jewish English translations, will be of help to those who come to this volume from a different translation tradition. A list of biblical readings provides the citations of texts for use in the synagogue. A glossary, explaining technical terms in biblical studies, various literary terms, and numerous words specific to the Jewish interpretive tradition, provides further information for the technical vocabulary that was sometimes unavoidable. An index to the entirety of the study materials—book introductions, annotations, and essays—keyed by page number, facilitates pursuing particular topics through the full range of the study materials. Finally, a set of full-color maps and a map index present geographical background for the events detailed in the text, the annotations, and the historical essays.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In order to produce a work of this length and complexity, many people must play a role. We especially wish to thank Dr. Ellen Frankel, chief executive and editor-in-chief of the Jewish Publication Society, who first suggested this publishing project to Oxford University Press, and Prof. Michael Fishbane, the academic advisor to JPS, who participated in the initial planning and whose scholarly dedication both to the biblical text and to the tradition of Jewish interpretation served as a model for our endeavors. We are grateful to JPS, and particularly to the Board of Trustees of the Society, for agreeing to make their translation available for this study edition.

We are also mindful of all the scholarship that has gone before us, and on which we have relied throughout the volume. In particular, we have followed the model of the New Oxford Annotated Bible, and have, with the permission of Oxford University Press, adapted some of the excellent auxiliary materials in that work for use in this one. The introductory essays to the three canonical groups, Torah, Nevi'im, and Kethuvim are expanded versions of the essays written for the Annotated: “The Pentateuch” (Marc Z. Brettler), “The Historical Books” (Marc Z. Brettler), “The Poetical and Wisdom Books” (Marc Z. Brettler), and “The Prophetic Books” (Carol A. Newsom). The essay on “The Canonization of the Bible” is adapted from the essay “The Canons of the Bible” (Marc Z. Brettler and PHEME PERKINS). The essay on “Textual Criticism of the Bible” is adapted from “Textual Criticism” by Michael D. Coogan and PHEME

Perkins. The essay on "The Modern Study of the Bible" is adapted from "The Interpretation of the Bible: From the Nineteenth to the Mid-twentieth Centuries" (Michael D. Coogan) and "Contemporary Methods in Biblical Study" (Carol A. Newsom). The essay on "The Historical and Geographical Background to the Bible" is partly based on "The Ancient Near East" (Michael D. Coogan), "The Persian and Hellenistic Periods" (Carol A. Newsom), and "The Geography of the Bible" (Michael D. Coogan).

In addition, the editors would especially like to thank: The editorial staff at Oxford University Press in New York, especially Jennifer Grady and Miriam Gross, who handled the complex and demanding editorial process with care; James R. Getz, Jr., and Sheila Reeder, who checked many cross references and other internal matters in manuscript and made numerous improvements in the study materials; Leslie Phillips, who designed the volume and oversaw the production process; Katrina Gettman, who copy-edited the manuscript and imposed order on our many and varied editorial decisions; Peachtree Editorial and Proofreading Service, who proofread the entire text and kept the process on schedule; Kate Mertes, who prepared the index to the study materials; and Christopher B. Wyckoff, who drew up the bibliography in "Translations of Primary Sources." We are particularly thankful for the guidance, erudition, and encouragement of Donald Kraus, executive editor in the Bible department at Oxford University Press, U.S.A.; he conceived this volume, and his creative and experienced hand may be seen on every page. We also thank the contributors, from whom we have learned so much, and hope that they will be pleased with the whole, to which each contributed an invaluable part. Both editors, coming from different perspectives, have read every word of every annotation and essay, often more than once. Our editing sessions became wonderful opportunities for serious discussion between ourselves and with our contributors on a wide range of fundamental issues in biblical and Jewish studies. We invite our readers to partake of the fruits of this productive collaboration, the seventy faces of the Torah that await them in this volume.

We are completing our work on this volume as we approach the holiday of Shavu'ot, the time when, according to postbiblical Jewish tradition, the Torah was given to Moses. The volume is being published close to the holiday of Simḥat Torah, the Rejoicing of the Torah, when the annual liturgical reading cycle of the Torah is completed and immediately begun again. As we have worked on this Bible for the last three years, we have gained even greater respect and appreciation for the "gift" of the Bible and for the never-ending, ever-renewing Jewish interpretive traditions. We share with even more profound conviction the sentiment of the psalmist with whose words we opened this introduction:

O how I love your teaching!
It is my study all day long.

Preface to the 1985 JPS Edition

THIS TRANSLATION OF TANAKH, THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, produced by the Jewish Publication Society, was made directly from the traditional Hebrew text into the idiom of modern English. It represents the collaboration of academic scholars with rabbis from the three largest branches of organized Jewish religious life in America. Begun in 1955, the ongoing translation was published in three main stages: The Torah in 1962, The Prophets (Nevi'im) in 1978, and The Writings (Kethuvim) in 1982. These three volumes, with revisions, are now brought together in a complete English Tanakh (Torah-Nevi'im-Kethuvim), the latest link in the chain of Jewish Bible translations.

ON THE HISTORY OF BIBLE TRANSLATION

Bible translation began about 2200 years ago, in the 3rd century BCE, as the large Jewish population of Alexandria, Egypt, came under the influence of Hellenism. When the Greek language replaced Hebrew and Aramaic as their vernacular, and the Torah in its Hebrew original was no longer commonly understood, a translation into Greek was made for the Jewish community of Alexandria. This translation came to be known as the Septuagint, Latin for "seventy," because of the legend that the committee of translators numbered seventy-two, six elders from each of the twelve tribes of Israel.

In the last few centuries BCE, the Jews who lived to the north and east of Judea also found the Hebrew Bible difficult to understand, for their spoken language had become largely Aramaic. Translations into Aramaic, first of the Torah and then of the rest of the Bible, became known as the Targums.

The Septuagint and the Targums are not only the oldest translations of the Bible but also the most influential. Down to our own day, virtually every Christian translation has followed the methods of the Jewish translators who created the Septuagint, and generally followed their renderings of the Hebrew as well. The Christian translators also were influenced by the interpretation of the Hebrew text set forth in the Targums (much of it in oral form at the time) and by the writings of the Jewish philosopher-interpreter Philo of Alexandria (died about 45 CE).

The forerunners and leaders of the Renaissance and the Reformation (14th–15th centuries), and especially Martin Luther and William Tyndale (16th century), made use of Latin translations of the classic Jewish commentators Rashi, Ibn Ezra, and Kimḥi (11th–13th centuries), whose works were imbued with the direct knowledge of the Targums. Luther was greatly indebted to Nicholas of Lyre (1270–1349), who had adopted Rashi's exegesis for his Latin Bible commentary. Rashi's influence on all authorized and most unofficial English translations of the Hebrew Bible becomes evident when Tyndale's dependence on Luther is considered. Tyndale is central to many subsequent English translations: the King James Version of 1611, the (British) Revised Version of 1881–1885, the American Standard Version of 1901, and especially the Revised Standard Version of 1952.

Alongside the close, literal method of Bible translation, the earliest Jewish translators were also influenced by the widely held view that, along with the Written Law (torah she-bikhtav), God had given Moses on Mount Sinai an Oral Law (torah she-be'al peh) as well; so that to comprehend God's Torah fully and correctly, it was essential to make use of both. Thus, when a translation of the Hebrew Bible into the Judeo-Arabic vernacular was deemed necessary for Jewry in Moslem countries toward the end of the first millennium, the noted philologist, philosopher, and community leader Saadia Gaon (882–942) produced a version that incorporated traditional Jewish interpretation but was not based on word-for-word translation; at the same time, it was a model of clarity and stylistic elegance. The present version is in the spirit of Saadia.

With the growth of Christianity in the 1st century, the Church adopted the Septuagint as its Bible, and the Septuagint was translated into the languages of the various Christian communities. As Greek began to give way to Latin in the Roman empire, it was only a matter of time before a Latin translation of Scripture became the recognized Bible of the Church. The Church father Jerome (ca. 340–420) produced the official Latin version. Drawing on Jewish tradition and consulting Jewish teachers, he achieved what came to be known as the Vulgate, the Bible in the language of the common people. The Vulgate, the Bible of European Christianity until the Reformation, is clearly the most significant Bible translation after the Septuagint.

With the rise of Protestantism in Europe, scholars within this movement set themselves the task of making the Bible available in the various vernaculars of the time. By 1526 the first parts of two notable translations began to appear: Martin Luther's in German and William Tyndale's in English. The latter, by way of several subsequent revisions, became the King James Version of 1611. The more modern English versions—such as The Holy Scriptures by the American rabbi Isaac Leeser (1855), the (British) Revised Version (1881–1885), the American Standard Version (1901), the Jewish Publication Society's The Holy Scriptures (1917), and the (American) Revised Standard Version (1952)—made extensive use of the King James.

ON THE MAKING OF THE NEW TRANSLATION

After World War II, when the Jewish Publication Society began to consider a new edition of the Bible, the idea of a modest revision of the 1917 translation met with resistance, and the concept of a completely new translation gradually took hold. The proposed translation would reproduce the Hebrew idiomatically and reflect contemporary scholarship, thus laying emphasis upon intelligibility and correctness. It would make critical use of the early rabbinic and medieval Jewish commentators, grammarians, and philologists and would rely on the traditional Hebrew text, avoiding emendations. The need for this new translation was the focus of the Jewish Publication Society's annual meeting in 1953. Later that year the Society announced its intention to proceed with the project, and in 1955 the committee of translators began their task.

Harry M. Orlinsky, Professor of Bible at Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion (New York), was asked to serve as editor-in-chief for the new translation, along with H. L. Ginsberg, Professor of Bible at the Jewish Theological Seminary, and Ephraim A. Speiser, Professor of Semitic and Oriental Languages at the University of Pennsylvania, as fellow editors. Associated with them were three rabbis: Max Arzt, Bernard J. Bamberger, and Harry Freedman, representing the Conservative, Reform, and Orthodox branches of organized Jewish religious life. Solomon Grayzel, editor of the Jewish Publication Society, served as secretary of the committee.

The committee profited much from the work of previous translators; the present rendering, however, is essentially a new translation. A few of its characteristics may be noted. The committee undertook to follow faithfully the traditional Hebrew text, but there were certain points at which footnotes appeared necessary: (1) where the committee had to admit that it did not understand a word or passage; (2) where an alternative rendering was possible; (3) where an old rendering, no longer retained, was so well known that it would very likely be missed, in which case the traditional translation was given in the name of "Others" (usually referring to the Society's version of 1917); (4) where the understanding of a passage could be facilitated by reference to another passage elsewhere in the Bible; and (5) where important textual variants are to be found in some of the ancient manuscripts or versions of the Bible.

The translators avoided obsolete words and phrases and, whenever possible, rendered Hebrew idioms by means of their normal English equivalents. For the second person singular, the modern "you" was used instead of the archaic "thou," even when referring to the Deity ("You"). A further obvious difference between this translation and most of the older ones is in the rendering of the Hebrew particle waw, which is usually translated "and." Biblical Hebrew demanded the frequent use of the waw, but in that style it had the force not only of "and" but also of "however, "but," "yet," "when," and any number of other such words and particles, or none at all that can be translated into English. Always to render it as "and" is to misrepresent the Hebrew rather than be faithful to it. Consequently, the committee translated the particle as the sense required, or left it untranslated.

The chapter and verse divisions found in the printed Bible are indispensable as a system of precise reference, but they do not always coincide with the organic divisions of the text. The chapter divisions, whose origin is neither ancient nor Jewish but medieval Christian, sometimes join or separate the wrong paragraphs, sentences, or even parts of sentences. The verse divisions, though considerably older and of Jewish origin, sometimes join together parts of different sentences or separate from each other parts of the same sentence. The translation of Saadia Gaon often does not correspond to our chapter divisions, which did not exist in his day. More noteworthy is the readiness with which he joined separate verses of the Hebrew text (whose authority he did not question) into single sentences when the sense required it. Thus, in joining Genesis 7.24 and 8.1 into a single sentence, or combining the last part of 1 Kings 6.38 with 7.1, the present translation is following the example of Saadia. The attentive reader will discover other instances in which the translators have followed what they considered to be the logical units of meaning even when they did not coincide with the conventional chapters and verses. The latter, however, are marked and numbered throughout.

The preface to the first edition of The Torah was dated September 25, 1962, Erev Rosh Ha-Shanah 5723. A second edition, incorporating some changes by the translators, came out five years later. The committee also produced translations of The Five Megilloth and Jonah (1969), Isaiah (1973), and Jeremiah (1974). The latter two books and Jonah were incorporated, with some corrections and revisions, into the complete translation of The Prophets (Nevi'im). For this volume, which was published in 1978, Professor Ginsberg served as editor, in association with Professor Orlinsky. Whereas Professor Orlinsky had initially prepared a draft translation of the entire Torah, individual members of the committee undertook to prepare a draft of an entire prophetic book or part of a book; but, as in translating the Torah, everyone had an opportunity to criticize the draft and to offer detailed suggestions at periodic committee sessions, which were presided over by Rabbi Bamberger. Differences of opinion were settled by majority vote.

In preparing the translation of The Prophets, the translators faced a recurring problem that deserves special mention. The prophetic books contain many passages whose meaning is uncertain. Thus, in order to provide an intelligible rendering, modern scholars have resorted to emending the Hebrew text. Some of these emendations derive from the ancient translators, especially of the Septuagint and the Targums, who had before them a Hebrew text that sometimes differed from today's traditional text. Where these ancient versions provide no help, some scholars have made conjectural emendations of their own. Many modern English versions contain translations of emended texts, sometimes without citing any departure from the traditional Hebrew text.

Like the translation of The Torah, the present translation of the prophetic books adheres strictly to the traditional Hebrew text; but where the text remains obscure and an alteration provides marked clarification, a footnote is offered with a rendering of the suggested emendation. If the emendation is based on one or two ancient versions, they are mentioned by name; if more than two versions agree, they are summed up as "ancient versions." Conjectural emendations are introduced by "Emendation yields." Sometimes, however, it was deemed sufficient to offer only a change of vowels, and such modifications are indicated by "Change of vocalization yields." In all cases, the emendation is given in a footnote, which may be readily disregarded by those who reject it on either scholarly or religious grounds. The only exceptions involve such changes in grammatical form as those, say, from second person to third or from singular to plural. In such rare instances, the change is incorporated in the text, and the traditional Hebrew is translated in a footnote.

The committee of translators for The Writings (Kethuvim), the third part of the Hebrew Bible, was set up by the Jewish Publication Society in 1966. It consisted of Moshe Greenberg, now Professor of Bible at the Hebrew University, Jonas C. Greenfield, then Professor of Semitic Languages at the Hebrew University, and Nahum M. Sarna, then Professor of Biblical Studies at Brandeis University, in association with Rabbis Saul Leeman, Martin S. Rozenberg, and David Shapiro of the Conservative, Reform, and Orthodox movements. Chaim Potok, then editor of the Society, served as secretary of the committee.

The present English rendering of Kethuvim, like Torah and Nevi'im, is based on the traditional Hebrew text—its consonants, vowels, and syntactical divisions—although the traditional accentuation occasionally has been replaced by an alternative construction. Following the approach of the original committee, the entire gamut of biblical interpretation, ancient and modern, Jewish and non-Jewish, has been consulted, and, whenever possible, the results of modern study of the languages and cultures of the ancient Near East have been brought to bear on the biblical text. In choosing between alternatives, however, just as antiquity was not in itself a disqualification, so modernity was not in itself a recommendation. Divergences of the present translation from recent renderings reflect the committee's judgment that certain innovations, though interesting, are too speculative for adoption in the present state of knowledge. The as-yet-imperfect understanding of the language of the Bible, or what appears to be some disorder in the Hebrew text, makes sure translation of many passages impossible. This uncertainty in Kethuvim is indicated in a note, and, where the Hebrew text permits, alternative renderings have been offered. However, emendations of the text of Kethuvim—except for the five Megilloth—were not proposed, and notes were kept to a minimum.

Some passages in Kethuvim are identical or very similar to passages in Torah and Nevi'im. The rendering of these passages in Kethuvim generally follows the wording in the earlier books; on occasion, however, owing to various considerations, divergences in style and translation will be found. For example, in the presentation of the poetry of the Psalms, it was deemed fitting, because of their liturgical use, to indicate the thought units through appropriate indentation. The text of Kethuvim frequently presented the translators with extraordinary difficulties, for it is hardly possible to convey in English the fullness of the Hebrew, with its ambiguities, its overtones, and the richness that it carries from centuries of use. Still, it was their goal to transmit something of the directness, the simplicity, and the uniquely Israelite expressions of piety that are so essential to the sublimity of the Hebrew Bible.

The committee's translation of The Psalms appeared in 1973; of The Book of Job, in 1980. The two were incorporated, with revisions, into the complete translations of The Writings (Kethuvim), which appeared in 1982.

For this one-volume English edition of Tanakh, the translation of The Torah, first published twenty years earlier, underwent more revision than the more recent publications of The Prophets and The Writings. A number of the changes had already been projected in Notes on the New Translation of the Torah, edited by Harry M. Orlinsky and published by the Society in 1969. Subsequent research on the text has led to further revisions in the translation of Torah and some revisions in Nevi'im as well.

Ephraim Speiser, of the original committee, died in June 1965. Max Arzt, also an active member of the original committee, died in 1975, when the work of translating the prophetic books was almost complete. Since the appearance of The Prophets and The Writings, Bernard J. Bamberg, Solomon Grayzel, and Harry Freedman have also passed on.* Their memory, and their scholarship, will be for a blessing.

The Jewish Publication Society joins the members of the committees of translators in the hope that the results of their labors will find favor with God and man.

TANAKH TRANSLATION

TORAH

Terminology, Contents, and Traditional Views of Authorship

THE TERM TORAH, “TEACHINGS, INSTRUCTION,” derives from the root y-r-h, “to shoot (an arrow),” and thus etymologically refers to that which “hits the mark.” Jewish tradition, from the late biblical period on, uses “Torah” to refer to the first section of the Bible, the books Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These books are also called “The Five Books of Moses” or the “Pentateuch,” which derives (via Latin) from the Greek penta (five) teuchoi (books). As early as the 1st century CE, these five books were written on one long scroll, signaling that they are one unit. Unlike other canonical divisions, where there is significant debate within and between different religious traditions (see the essay on “Canonization,” pp. 2072–77), both Jewish and Christian traditions view the books Genesis through Deuteronomy in this order as a single unit, standing first in the Bible. The unanimity of tradition and the initial placement of these five books reflect their significant place within religious life. In Judaism, the Torah is accorded the highest level of sanctity, above that of the other books of the Bible.

Despite their traditional perception as a unity, it is not so obvious how these five books cohere. They certainly do not form a single book in the modern sense, with a single author; modern scholarship has persuasively argued that each of these books is composite, reflecting many traditions and sources (see below). While the plot progresses chronologically, from the creation of the world to the end of the wandering in the wilderness, a large part of this story is retold in Deuteronomy. Moreover, the story does not end here, but continues into the book of Joshua and beyond. While Moses is the central human character in much of the Torah, he is introduced only in ch 2 of Exodus, and is absent from all of Genesis. There are several major themes, including the early development of Israel as a people, the covenant between God and Israel, and the promise of the land; but none of these is present throughout the Torah and all continue beyond it. Theme alone does not define what the Torah is. In fact, if this final theme of promise of the land and its fulfillment is determinative, we should speak of the Hexateuch, the six books of Genesis through Joshua, rather than the Pentateuch or Torah.

The Hebrew terms torah and torat moshe (“the Torah of Moses”), already in use in late biblical literature to describe what is later called the Torah, offer a better clue to the nature and unity of these books. Torah is often understood as “law,” and indeed this is one of its frequent meanings in the Bible, as in Exod. 12.49: “There shall be one law [Heb torah] for the citizen and for the stranger who dwells among you.” Law is a predominant genre of the Torah, which contains not only the Decalogue in Exod. ch 20 and Deut. ch 5, but extensive legal collections in Exod. chs 21–23, Lev. chs 17–26, and Deut. chs 12–26, as well as selected laws within various narratives, such as the law of circumcision in the narrative about Abraham in Gen. ch 17 and the law concerning inheritance of the land by women in Num. ch 36, embedded within a section about the possession of the land. Many narrative sections also contain material that is of legal significance. For example, the first creation story in Genesis culminates with the “creation” of the Sabbath (Gen. 2.2–3), though this would only be legislated in Exod. ch 16, and then as part of the Decalogue, in Exod. 20.8–11. Similarly, the story of the construction of the Tabernacle (Exod. chs 25–40), a temporary temple for God in the wilderness, is not narrated for its own sake, but as an introduction to the various laws of sacrifice, narrated at the beginning of Leviticus, the book that immediately follows these chapters.

Yet “law” is not the only possible translation of torah, and the Torah should not be typified as a book of law. The Heb term torah also means “instruction” or “teaching,” as in Prov. 1.8, “My son, heed the discipline of your father, / And do not forsake the instruction [Heb torah] of your mother.” Teaching is not confined to law; indeed narratives or stories are as effective a medium of instruction. Given the predominance of narrative in significant portions of the Torah, especially in Genesis, the beginning of Exodus, and Numbers, it is best to understand the biblical term torat moshe, the earliest extant term for these five books, as “the instruction of Moses.” This instruction was realized through narratives and laws, which together elucidate the proper norms of living and the relationship between God and the world. That the Torah is more than a set of laws is made explicit in the comments of Rashi, the great Jewish medieval interpreter, who, quoting earlier sources, defends the fact that Torah begins with the stories of Genesis rather than with the laws of Exodus.

The terms torat moshe, and torat (ha)elohim/YHVH, “God’s/the LORD’s torah,” are found predominantly in various late biblical sections and books, such as Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. These phrases suggest that the Torah was then understood to be a divine revelation mediated by Moses, as explicitly stated in Ezra 7.6 (cf. Neh. 8.1), “The Torah of Moses which the LORD God of Israel had given.” The Torah in the time of Ezra is more or less identical to the Torah as it now exists. It is significant, however, that these terms for it never appear in the Torah itself, suggesting that in the Torah, the word torah never refers to the Torah. In fact, the Torah does not explicitly suggest that it was compiled by Moses himself. (The phrase “the Torah” in passages such as Deut. 4.44, “This is the torah that Moses set before the Israelites,” never refers to the complete Torah.)

After the books came to be viewed as authoritative, it was natural that they should be considered a coherent body of writing given by God through one special “author,” Moses. In several places, the Bible suggests that Moses stayed on Mount Sinai for forty days and forty nights (Exod. 24.18; 34.28; Deut. 9.9; 10.10). Clearly, this was too long a time for short legal collections such as Exod. chs 21–23 to have been conveyed to him, and thus traditions developed that Moses received the entire written Torah from God at that point; according to the classical rabbis, Moses simultaneously received the oral law, which served as the authoritative interpretation of the written law. In other words, the concept of the divinely inspired Torah expanded to include the Written Torah and all that would derive from it. The Written Torah, according to all rabbinic sources (which are followed by the early church), included events before the time of Moses—the book of Genesis, which thus represents God’s authoritative narration to Moses of the early history of the world and of Abraham and his family—and the death of Moses. Some rabbinic sources suggest that the final chapter of the Torah, Deut. ch 34, which narrates the death of Moses, was dictated by God to Moses, who wrote it with his tears. The view that the Torah is the divine word mediated by Moses was the standard view through the Renaissance.

This view is explicitly contradicted by the Torah’s narrative, as was sometimes (though rarely) recognized in the Middle Ages. Thus, Abraham Ibn (son of) Ezra, a 12th-century CE exegete, noted that Gen. 12.6 states that “The Canaanites were then in the land.” The word “then” suggests that when the author of this passage wrote it, the Canaanites were no longer in the land. In other words, the text must have been written after the time of Moses, because during Moses’ time the Canaanites were still in the land. A small number of other places that suggest authorship later than Moses were pointed out by a few medieval scholars, but these were not systematized into a thesis which could challenge the dominant view concerning Moses’ authorship of the Torah.

Modern Source Theories

SLOWLY, WITH THE RISE OF RATIONALISM, particularly as associated with figures such as Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) and Benedict (Baruch) Spinoza (1632–1677), the view that the Torah was a unified whole, written by Moses, began to be questioned. (For additional information on this development, see “Modern Jewish Interpretation,” pp. 1908–19, and “Modern Study of the Bible,” pp. 2084–96.) This culminated in the development of the model of the Documentary Hypothesis in the 19th century, according to which the Torah (or Hexateuch) is comprised of four main sources or documents which were edited or redacted together: J, E, P, and D. Each of these sources or documents is embedded in a (relatively) complete form in the current Torah, and is typified by vocabulary, literary style, and theological perspective.

J and E are so called after the names for God that each of them uses in Genesis: J uses the name “Yahveh” (German “Jahwe,” hence “J”), translated in NJPS as “LORD,” though it is really a personal name whose exact meaning is unknown; E prefers to call the deity “Elohim” (translated “God”), an epithet which also serves as the generic term for God or gods in the Bible. P, which also uses “Elohim,” is an abbreviation for the Priestly material, and D refers to the Deuteronomist, primarily in Deuteronomy.

The difference in divine names, however, is not the main criterion used by scholars for suggesting that the Torah is not a unified composition. Much more significant are doublets and contradictions, in both narrative and legal material. For example, it has long been noted that Gen. chs 1–3 twice narrate the creation of the world. People are created first in 1.27—“And God created man in His image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them”—and then again in 2.7—“The LORD God formed man from the dust of the earth. He blew into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being.” Furthermore, the second creation account does not simply mirror or repeat the first, but differs from the first in both outline and detail. Gen. 1.1–2.3, the first account, narrates the creation of a highly symmetrical world by a very powerful deity who creates through the word. In this story, for example, man and woman are created together (1.27) after the creation of the land animals (1.25). In contrast, the second story, in 2.4–3.24, suggests that man was created (2.7), then the animals (2.19), and then woman (2.21–22). Its focus is on the creation of humanity, not of the entire physical world, and God anthropomorphically “forms” various beings, rather than creating them through the spoken word. Thus, these are two separate stories, written by two authors, representing different world-views about the nature of creation, humanity, and God.

The two creation stories appear as two totally separate blocks of material in 1.1–2.3 and 2.4–3.24. In several cases, however, the sources do not appear in distinct, long blocks but are intertwined. This is the case in the flood story, a combination of J and P. According to P, two of each type of animal shall come into the ark (Gen. 6.19–20), but J says that of the clean animals, seven pairs shall come in, and of the unclean, one pair (Gen. 7.2). Similarly, the story of the plague of blood (Exod. 7.14–24) contains two accounts which are intertwined; in one (J), Moses is the protagonist, and the blood only affects the Nile (e.g., vv. 17–18), while in the other (P), Aaron appears as well, and the flood affects all Egyptian water sources (e.g., vv. 19, 24). In such cases, the narratives are combined with great skill, though careful attention to plot and vocabulary help to discern the original building blocks or sources of the story in its final form.

In addition to narrative, the legal material in the Torah is also the product of several sources. For example, slave laws concerning the Hebrew or Israelite slave are found in the Torah in Exod. 21.1–6, Lev. 25.39–46, and Deut. 15.12–18. These laws cannot be reconciled in a straightforward fashion since they represent three different notions of slavery. Most significant is the way in which Exodus differentiates between the treatment of a male and female slave, whereas Deuteronomy insists that they should both be treated similarly. While Exodus and Deuteronomy agree that a slave who loves his master may opt to remain a slave “for life” (Exod. 21.6) or “in perpetuity” (Deut. 15.17), Lev. ch 25 insists that slavery of Israelites does not really exist, since slaves must be treated “as a hired or bound laborer,” and they may only serve “until the jubilee year” (v. 40). Such legal differences are not surprising once we are open to the hypotheses that the Bible is composite, and the different legal collections reflect norms or ideals of different groups living in different time periods. Traditional Jewish interpretation, on the other hand, reconciles these various traditions through a process of harmonization, by assuming, for example, that “for life” or “in perpetuity” should in these cases be interpreted as “until the jubilee year.”

It is possible to trace distinctive styles and theological notions that typify individual Torah sources. For example, the J source is well known for its highly anthropomorphic God, who has a close relationship with humans, as seen in Gen. 2.4–3.24, which includes, for example, a description of God “moving about [or walking] in the garden” (3.8) and says that God “made garments of skins for Adam and his wife, and clothed them” (3.21). On the other hand, in E, the Elohist source, God is more distant from people, typically communicating with them by dreams or via intermediaries, such as heavenly messengers (NJPS “angels”) and prophets. The P or Priestly source is characterized by a strong interest in order and boundaries (see Gen. ch 1), as well as an overriding concern with the priestly family of Aaron and the Temple-based religious system. D, or Deuteronomy, is characterized by a unique hortatory or preaching style, and insists strongly that God cannot be seen, as in this source’s description of revelation: “The LORD spoke to you out of the fire; you heard the sound of words but perceived no shape—nothing but a voice” (Deut. 4.12). This explains why this source, uniquely, insists that God does not physically dwell in the Temple or Tabernacle; rather, the Temple is “the site where the LORD your God will choose to establish His name” (Deut. 12.11 and elsewhere). D also emphasizes that this one God must be worshipped in one place only (see esp. Deut. ch 12); this place is understood to be Jerusalem.

The narrative sources J, E, P, and D also have legal collections associated with them. The Covenant Collection (see Exod. 24.7) in Exod. 20.19–23.33 is associated with J or E. The Holiness Collection of Lev. chs 17–26 is so named because of its central injunction (Lev. 19.2), “You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy.” Though not composed by the Priestly author (P), it represents Priestly theology. The Deuteronomic law collection appears in Deut. chs 12–26. These blocks of material were called “codes” by earlier scholars; since the blocks are neither complete nor organized for the law court, however, as a “code” might be, the term “collection” is more suitable.

Critical biblical scholarship, through the latter part of the 20th century, was quite confident in dating each of these Torah sources along with the legal collections that they incorporated. Thus, J was seen as the earliest collection, often dated to the period of David and Solomon in the 10th century BCE, followed by E, which was often associated with the Northern Kingdom. D was connected to the reform of King Josiah in the late 7th century, and P was seen as deriving from the 6th century. The arguments for these specific dates were in some cases tinged with anti-Semitism, because they tended to devalue rabbinic Judaism, seeing it as a degeneration of the more ideal, early Hebrew religion. There was also an element of Christian supersessionism among some source critics: Biblical Israel is held in high esteem; early Judaism (in the late biblical and postbiblical periods) is not, for it was to be superseded by Christianity. For this reason, many Jewish scholars have until recently shied away from source-critical models.

Scholars now agree that the reasons usually given for assigning these dates to the individual sources are problematic, and a lively debate has developed concerning such fundamental issues as the relative order of these sources and the extent to which any of them are as early as previous scholars had suggested. The existence of E as a complete source has been questioned as well, especially since E first appears well after the beginning of the Torah and is very difficult to disentangle from J after the beginning of Exodus. Thus, many scholars now talk of JE together as an early narrative source, incorporating diverse traditions. Additionally, most scholars no longer see each source as representative of a single author writing at one particular time but recognize that each may reflect a long historical period within a single group or “school.” Thus, it is best to speak of streams or strands of tradition and to contrast their basic underpinnings, rather than to speak of sources reflecting a single author, period, and locale. For example, despite the unraveling of a consensus on the exact date of the sources, it is still valid to contrast the Deuteronomic view of Israel’s fundamental, intrinsic holiness—as seen, for example, in Deut. 7.6, “For you are a people consecrated [holy] to the LORD your God”—with the Priestly view, articulated most clearly in the Holiness Collection (H), which suggests that Israel must aspire to holiness—as in Lev. 19.2, “You shall be holy.” These fundamental differences cannot easily be reconciled, suggesting that despite certain problems with the classical source-critical method, certain elements of source criticism remain useful alongside other methods of analyzing biblical texts.

Compilation and Redaction of the Torah

WE DO NOT KNOW HOW THESE VARIOUS SOURCES and legal collections, which now comprise the Torah, came together to form a single book. Scholars have posited an editor or series of editors or redactors, conveniently called R, who combined the various sources, perhaps in several stages, over a long time. Certainly not all ancient Israelite traditions were preserved in the Torah. Much was probably lost. Without knowing what was lost, we cannot suggest how and why the redactor(s), R, made their selection and by what principles they ordered their materials. It must suffice to note that in contrast to modern editing, which works toward articulating a single viewpoint, the redaction of the Torah, like the editing of other ancient works, did not create a purely consistent, singular perspective but incorporated a variety of voices and perspectives.

The ultimate result of this redaction, most likely completed during the Babylonian exile (586–538 BCE) or soon thereafter in the early Persian period, was the creation of a very long book, narrating what must have been felt to be the formative period of Israel, from the period of the creation of the world through the death of Moses. The events narrated in Gen. chs 1–11 describing the creation of the world and its population by many nations serve as an introduction to the singling out of one nation, Israel. The stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the ancestors of Israel, form the national prehistory. Israel comes into existence as a nation in Exodus, and the foremost events of its national history are the exodus from Egypt, the revelation at Sinai, and the coming to the promised land. These events are central to Exodus-Deuteronomy.

The ancient Near Eastern world produced no other work of comparable length in the span of time its narrative covers or in the inclusiveness of the literary genres and sources incorporated into it. This extensive and inclusive nature of the Torah creates a fundamental and interesting problem for biblical interpreters. Should we concentrate on interpreting the individual sources, on hearing the voices of the component parts of the text before they were redacted together? Or should we follow the traditional way in which the Bible was read for many centuries before the rise of modern source criticism, and focus on the final product, an approach that has been called holistic reading? In the annotations of the biblical books that follow we will aim for a balance, maintaining our critical stance toward the sources but never forgetting that it is their combination into a whole that has preserved them and given them meaning. We will show how meaning may be uncovered by looking both at the early building blocks of the text, and at the text in its final, redacted form.

Genesis

THE BOOK OF GENESIS RECEIVED its English name from the Greek translation of the Hebrew word toledot, which is used thirteen times in Genesis and is translated as “story” (2.4), “record” (5.1), or “line” (10.1). In Heb, it is known, like many books in the Tanakh, by its first word, bereshit, which means, “In the beginning.” Genesis is indeed a book about beginnings—the beginning of the natural world, the beginning of human culture, and the beginning of the people Israel, whose story occupies most of this book and will dominate the rest of the Torah. In the ancient Near Eastern world in which Israel emerged, beginnings were deemed to be crucial, for the origins of things were thought to disclose their character and purpose. In Genesis, the origins of Israel—the people known later as the “Jews”—lie in a mysterious promise of God to a Mesopotamian whose name is Abram (changed in ch 17 to “Abraham”). The essence of the promise is that He will make of him a great nation, bless him abundantly, and grant him the land of Canaan. Ostensibly absurd when it first comes, the promise faces one obstacle after another throughout the course of Genesis—principally, the barrenness of Abraham’s primary wife (and of other matriarchs in the next two generations) and the murderous fraternal rivalry among his descendants. And yet, by the end of Genesis, all the obstacles notwithstanding, the twelve tribes that make up the people Israel have indeed come into existence, an Israelite effectively rules a superpower (Egypt), and the promise of the land, though far from fulfillment (which comes about only in the book of Joshua), is anything but forgotten.

The book of Genesis is thus, in more senses than one, a primary source for Jewish theology. It presents its ideas on the relationship of God to nature, to the human race in general, and to the people Israel in particular in ways that are, however, foreign to the expectations of most modern readers. It is therefore all too easy to miss the seriousness and profundity of its messages. For the vehicle through which Genesis conveys its worldview is neither the theological tract nor the rigorous philosophical proof nor the confession of faith. That vehicle is, rather, narrative. The theology must be inferred from stories, and the lived relationship with God takes precedence over abstract theology. Those who think of stories (including mythology) as fit only for children not only misunderstand the thought-world and the literary conventions of the ancient Near East; they also condemn themselves to miss the complexity and sophistication of the stories of Genesis. For these are narratives that have evoked interpretation upon interpretation from biblical times into our own day and have occupied the attention of some of the keenest thinkers in human history.

One aspect of narrative in Genesis that requires special attention is its high tolerance for different versions of the same event, a well-known feature of ancient Near Eastern literature, from earliest times through rabbinic midrash. The book presents, for example, two accounts of Abram/Abraham's attempting to pass his wife off as his sister (12.10–20; 20.1–18; cf. 26.1–11), two accounts of God's making a covenant with him (ch 15 and 17), and two accounts of how Jacob's name was changed to Israel (32.23–33; 35.9–15). In these instances, most modern biblical scholars see different antecedent documents that editors (known as redactors) have combined to give us the text now in our hands. This could not have happened, however, if the existence of variation were seen as a serious defect or if rigid consistency were deemed essential to effective storytelling. Rather, the redactors have chosen a different approach, refusing to discard many variants as inauthentic or inaccurate, instead treating the different versions as sequential events in the same longer story. The result is a certain measure of repetition, to be sure, but the repetition is in the service of a sophisticated presentation of themes with variations in a book rich in narrative analogy, revealing echo, and suggestive contrast. For the Rabbis of Talmudic times and their successors through the centuries, the exploration of those subtle literary features provided an indispensable insight not only into the first book of the Torah (the most sacred part of the Tanakh) but also into the mind of God Himself.

The book is composed of four major sections: 1.1–11.26, the primeval story; 11.27–25.18, the story of Abraham; 25.19–36.43, the Jacob cycle; and 37.1–50.26, the story of Joseph. (There is little independent narrative about Isaac, the second patriarch.)

The first section, the primeval history, takes us from the creation of the world through the birth of Abram's father nineteen generations later. Its stories are short, loosely strung together, and connected only by genealogies that identify the generation in which the action takes place. There is, however, an overriding theme: the spread of human wickedness, the refusal of humankind to accept their creaturely status, as they seek to blur the all-important boundary between the human and the divine and, as a result, bring catastrophe upon themselves. The center of attention is God, who is portrayed rather anthropomorphically and speaks directly and frequently to human beings, condemning or sparing, announcing His judgment or His merciful forbearance.

Largely because of its focus on creation, the primeval history exhibits a number of contacts with Mesopotamian mythology. The account of creation with which Genesis opens (1.1–2.3), for example, has affinities with Enuma elish, a Babylonian epic, which tells how one god, Marduk, attained supremacy over the others and created the world by splitting his aquatic enemy in half. The story of Adam and Eve's sin in the garden of Eden (2.25–3.24) displays similarities with Gilgamesh, an epic poem that tells how its hero lost the opportunity for immortality and came to terms with his humanity. And the story of Noah (6.5–9.17) has close connections with Atrahasis, a Mesopotamian story in which the gods send a flood to wipe out the human race, with the exception of one man from whom humankind begins afresh (the story was eventually incorporated into Gilgamesh as well). In each case, the biblical narrator has adapted the Mesopotamian forerunner to Israelite theology. The primeval history thus evidences both the deep continuities and the striking points of discontinuity of biblical Israel with its Mesopotamian antecedents and contemporaries.

In the story of Abraham (11.27–25.11), the narrative has become more continuous. Abraham dominates almost every episode. Seeing him in a wide variety of situations, we have a sense of his personality and of the human dimension of the events that God has mysteriously set into motion. Whereas God's relationship to human beings in the primeval history is marked mostly (but not exclusively) by judgment, expulsion, and exile, in the story of Abraham the dominant notes are the contrasting ones of blessing and promise, especially the promise of the land. But the narrative does not spare us the knowledge that while the blessings and promises are as yet unrealized, Abraham's family have their moments of anguish and even ugliness. God, portrayed for the most part less anthropomorphically than in the primeval history, overcomes the obstacles to His promises and blessings, so that Abraham finally acquires both the son from whom the promised nation shall descend and a foothold in the promised land. The LORD accomplishes this partly through palpable miracles and partly through His silent guidance of the course of human events. As the story of Abraham unfolds, its human protagonist, despite some arguably serious lapses, gradually assumes the role of the ideal religious person—obedient to God's commands (even at the cost of the most painful sacrifice), faithful even when the promise seems impossible, gracious, generous, and hospitable, yet committed to justice and compassion even to the point of firmly (if deferentially) questioning God's counsel.

The stories in the Jacob cycle (25.19–36.43) are even more connected and less self-contained than those in the story of Abraham. Here, we are entitled to speak not simply of a general theme, like the theme of blessing and promise in the Abraham story (which continues in this section), but of a plot as well. In its broadest outlines, the plot has to do with how the second son acquires his older brother's superior status and the attendant rights to the Abrahamic promise, yet eventually reconciles with the brother he has wronged and emerges legitimately as the patriarch from whom the people Israel takes its name. Various types of trickery play a major role as this plot develops. The human dimension is more central here than in the Abraham narrative, and the resourcefulness of the protagonists, especially Jacob himself and his mother Rebekah, proportionately more important. Accordingly, God speaks less frequently and intervenes less dramatically. Indeed, His presence is less available and assumes an eerie cast ("Surely the LORD is present in this place, and I did not know it!" [28.16]).

The closing section of the book of Genesis, the story of Joseph (37.1–50.26), represents a narrative so coherent and so continuous that it has justly been termed a novella. Indeed, it offers the deepest psychological portraits and the most subtle and complex plot in Genesis and constitutes one of the gems of biblical prose narrative. Whereas in the first section of Genesis, the primeval history, God booms forth His pronouncements, in this last section

He does not speak at all, with the exception of one apparition to Jacob while he is still in Canaan (46.1–4). Rather, He communicates through dreams (in which, significantly, He does not appear) and, more importantly, through people, especially Joseph’s God-given wisdom to interpret dreams and to administer effectively. Here, even more than in the Jacob cycle, God works through the ambivalent and devious designs of flawed human beings, providentially bringing good out of human evil and arranging “the survival of many people” (50.20)—including the brothers who, seething with resentment, once plotted Joseph’s death and enslavement but now graciously accept subordination to the younger brother who has saved their lives.

How much history lies behind the story of Genesis? Because the action of the primeval story is not represented as taking place on the plane of ordinary human history and has so many affinities with ancient mythology, it is very far-fetched to speak of its narratives as historical at all. In the cases of the succeeding three large sections of the book, the matter is more complicated, for scholars continue to sift the evidence and to debate the question. Although enormous amounts of data about ancient Mesopotamia, Canaan, and Egypt have been uncovered over the last two centuries, no evidence has turned up that establishes that Abraham, (his son) Isaac, Jacob, or Joseph existed. At best, we can speak of accurate local color, although this may mean only that the Israelites knew something about the lands in which they placed their legendary forebears (see “Historical and Geographical Background to the Bible,” pp. 2048–62). Negative evidence, however, is not necessarily evidence of a negative, and historians are likely to continue examining the reports of Israel’s Mesopotamian origins and Egyptian sojourn for the foreseeable future.

The authorship of Genesis is a similarly controversial issue, although here the consensus among critical scholars is somewhat more secure (see “Modern Study of the Bible,” pp. 2084–96). The book itself names no one as its author, and makes no claim to be divinely revealed or inspired (though it does contain many reports of divine speech). When other biblical books refer to a Torah of Moses, they cite legal texts, and there is no reason to think that Genesis formed part of the corpus so designated. Indeed, there are several indications that the Genesis narrative assumes a post-Mosaic narrator without embarrassment (see the comments on 12.6, 14.14, and 36.31). In Second Temple and rabbinic Judaism, however, Genesis is treated as part of the Torah of Moses. Despite a number of demurrals on a few particular passages by major rabbis in the Middle Ages, this became the consensus of the tradition. Historical-critical scholarship, however, has identified three main sources, which it denotes with the symbols J, E, and P, that have been woven together to produce Genesis (see “Torah,” pp. 1–7). The relationship of compositional history to religious faith is not a simple one. If Moses is the human author of Genesis, nothing ensures that God is its ultimate Author. If J, E, P, and various equally anonymous redactors are its human authors, nothing ensures that God is not its ultimate Author.

1.1-2.3: Creation in seven days.

The book of Genesis—and thus the Bible itself—opens with an account of creation that is extraordinary for its austerity. Other ancient Near Eastern evocations of God's (or the gods') world-ordering activity, including many in the Bible itself (e.g., Ps. 104), provide high drama and graphic description of the events and their protagonists (even the LORD). Gen. 1.1-2.3, however, is utterly devoid of sensory detail. This eerie abstractness, combined with the highly schematic and formulaic structure of the narrative, conveys a sense of the awe-inspiring majesty and inviolable sovereignty of the God on whom the narrative is unswervingly focused. This narrative is structured by a pattern of seven days, six in which God accomplishes all His creative labors, and one in which He rests in regal repose, blessing and hallowing that climactic day. The correlations between things created on the various days exhibit a high degree of symmetry (diagram, below). The first three days describe the creation of generalities or domains; the next three chronicle the creation of the specifics or the inhabitants of the domains in the same order. Creation comes to its culmination, however, only in the one day that has no counterpart, the Sabbath ("Shabbát" in modern Heb, or "Shábbes" in the Eastern European pronunciation), here observed by God above and not yet enjoined upon His people Israel (who first hear of it in Exodus 16). The organization of time into seven-day units has become so familiar and so widespread that it is easy to forget that unlike the month (which in the Bible is lunar) and the year (which in the Bible never moves too far from its solar base), the biblical week corresponds to no astronomical event. The notion that seven signifies completeness and that things come to their fit conclusion on the seventh day did, however, have wide resonance in the ancient Near Eastern world in which Israel emerged, and that idea doubtless stands in the background of our passage. The role of the number seven in 1.1-2.3 extends, in fact, beyond the obvious division of the acts of creation into a seven-day sequence. For example, the expression, And God saw that [something He made] was good or very good occurs seven times, but not on every day of the primordial week. Missing on the second and seventh, it appears twice on the adjacent third and sixth days (1.10, 12, 25, 31). Similarly, the word "God" occurs exactly thirty-five times (i.e., five times seven) in our passage, and the section devoted to the seventh day (2.1-3) has exactly thirty-five words in the Heb. The organization of the process of creation into a sequence of seven days is familiar to most readers not only from the opening of the Tanakh but also from the Sabbath commandment of the Decalogue in Exod. 20.8-11. But we must not forget that this connection is far from universal in the Tanakh. In fact, most biblical descriptions of creation know nothing of a seven-day sequence ¹¹And God said, "Let the earth sprout vegetation: seed-bearing plants, fruit trees of every kind on earth that bear fruit with the seed in it." And it was so. ¹²The earth brought forth vegetation: seed-bearing plants of every kind, and trees of every kind bearing fruit with the seed in it. And God saw that this was good. ¹³And there was evening and there was morning, a third day.

¹⁴God said, "Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate day from night; they shall serve as signs for the set times—the days and the years; ¹⁵and they serve as lights in the expanse of the sky to shine upon the earth." And it was so. ¹⁶God made the two great lights, the greater light to dominate the day and the lesser light to dominate the night, and the stars. ¹⁷And God set them in the expanse of the sky to shine upon the earth, ¹⁸to dominate the day and the night, and to separate light from darkness. And God saw that this was good. ¹⁹And there was evening and there was morning, a fourth day.

(e.g., Ps. 104; Prov. 8.22–31), and most texts about the Sabbath (including the version of the Decalogue in Deut. 5.12–15) make no reference to creation. The suspicion arises that 1.1–2.3 derives from a distinct school of thought, one that dates to a relatively late period in the history of Israelite religion. On the basis of these considerations, and a multitude of others, critical scholars attribute the passage to the P (for "Priestly") source. And God does function here in ways reminiscent of a "kohen" (priest), giving blessings, for example (1.22, 28; 2.3; cf. Lev. 9.22–23; Num. 6.22–27), and consecrating the Sabbath (2.3; cf. Ezek. 44.24). The concern shown in this story for order and clear boundaries typifies the Priestly corpus. More importantly, the creation of the world in 1.1–2.3 bears several striking resemblances to the construction of the Tabernacle mandated in Exod. chs 25–31 and executed in Exod. chs 35–40 (e.g., see Gen. 2.1–3; Exod. 39.32, 42–43)—the prototype of the Jerusalem Temple and the focus of the priestly service of the LORD. Note that other ancient Near Eastern creation stories conclude with the construction of a temple for the creation god. In the Tanakh, the world is sometimes seen as the LORD's temple, and the Temple as a microcosm (e.g., Isa. 66.1–2).

1: A tradition over two millennia old sees 1.1 as a complete sentence: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." In the 11th century, the great Jewish commentator Rashi made a case that the verse functions as a temporal clause. This is, in fact, how some ancient Near Eastern creation stories begin—including the one that starts at 2.4b. Hence the translation, When God began to create heaven and earth. 2: This clause describes things just before the process of creation began. To modern people, the opposite of the created order is "nothing," that is, a vacuum. To the ancients, the opposite of the created order was something much worse than "nothing." It was an active, malevolent force we can best term "chaos." In this verse, chaos is envisioned as a dark, undifferentiated mass of water. In 1.9, God creates the dry land (and the Seas, which can exist only when water is bounded by dry land). But in 1.1–2.3, water itself and darkness, too, are primordial (contrast Isa. 45.7). In the midrash, Bar Kappara upholds the troubling notion that the Torah shows that God created the world out of preexistent material. But other rabbis worry that acknowledging this would cause people to liken God to a king who had built his palace on a garbage dump, thus arrogantly impugning His majesty (Gen. Rab. 1.5). In the ancient Near East, however, to say that a deity had subdued chaos is to give him the highest praise.

3–5: Since the sun is not created until the fourth day (1.14–19), the light of the first three days is of a different order from what we know. A midrash teaches that when God saw the corruption of the generations of the flood and of the tower of Babel, He hid that primordial light away for the benefit of the righteous in the world-to-come (b. Hag. 12a). Other ancient Near Eastern myths similarly assume the existence of light before the creation of the luminaries.

6–8: The word translated expanse refers to a piece of metal that has been hammered flat. Here, the function of the sky is to separate the waters above (which fall as rain) from the subterranean waters (which rise as springs; see 7.11).

16: The sun and moon are created only on the fourth day and are not named, but referred to only as the greater light and the lesser light. This may be an implicit polemic against the worship of astral bodies (see 2 Kings 23.5). 21: A similar point can be made about the creation of the great sea monsters on the fifth day. In some ancient myths—and biblical texts as well (see Ps. 74.12–17; Job 26.5–14)—creation results from the slaying of a sea the waters brought forth in swarms, and all the winged birds of every kind. And God saw that this was good. ²²God blessed them, saying, “Be fertile and increase, fill the waters in the seas, and let the birds increase on the earth.” ²³And there was evening and there was morning, a fifth day.

²⁴God said, “Let the earth bring forth every kind of living creature: cattle, creeping things, and wild beasts of every kind.” And it was so. ²⁵God made wild beasts of every kind and cattle of every kind, and all kinds of creeping things of the earth. And God saw that this was good. ²⁶And God said, “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. They shall rule the fish of the sea, the birds of the sky, the cattle, the whole earth, and all the creeping things that creep on earth.” ²⁷And God created man in His image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them. ²⁸God blessed them and God said to them, “Be fertile and increase, fill the earth and master it; and rule the fish of the sea, the birds of the sky, and all the living things that creep on earth.”

²⁹God said, “See, I give you every seed-bearing plant that is upon all the earth, and every tree that has seed-bearing fruit; they shall be yours for food. ³⁰And to all the animals on land, to all the birds of the sky, and to everything that creeps on earth, in which there is the breath of life, [I give] all the green plants for food.” And it was so. ³¹And God saw all that He had made, and found it very good. And there was evening and there was morning, the sixth day.

2 The heaven and the earth were finished, and all their array. ²On the seventh day God finished the work that He had been doing, and He ceased^a on the seventh day from all the work that He had done. ³And God blessed the seventh day and declared it holy, because on it God ceased from all the work of creation that He had done.

monster. Isa. 27.1 uses the same word to describe the frightening sea monster that the LORD will kill at the end of time. 26–28: The plural construction (Let us . . .) most likely reflects a setting in the divine council (cf. 1 Kings 22.19–22; Isa. ch 6; Job chs 1–2): God the King announces the proposed course of action to His cabinet of subordinate deities, though He alone retains the power of decision. The midrash manifests considerable uneasiness with God’s proposal to create something so capable of evil as human beings are. Playing on Ps. 1.6, one midrash reports that God told his ministering angels only of “the way of the righteous” and hid from them “the way of the wicked” (Gen. Rab. 8.4). Another one reports that while the angels were debating the proposal among themselves, God took the matter in hand. “Why are you debating?” he asked them. “Man has already been created!” (Gen. Rab. 8.5). Whereas the earth and the waters (at God’s command) bring forth the plants, fish, birds, and other animals (1.12, 20, 24), humankind has a different origin and a different character. In the ancient Near East, the king was often said to be the “image” of the god and thus to act with divine authority. So here, the creation of humanity in God’s image and likeness carries with it a commission to rule over the animal kingdom (1.26b, 28b; cf. Ps. 8.4–9). Some have seen in that commission a license for ecological irresponsibility. The fact is, however, that the Tanakh presents humanity not as the owner of nature but as its steward, strictly accountable to its true Owner (see Lev. 25.23–24). This theology is one source of the important institutions of the sabbatical and jubilee years (see Exod. 23.10–11; Lev. ch 25). Whereas the next account of human origins (Gen. 2.4b–24) speaks of God’s creation of one male from whom one female subsequently emerges, Gen. ch 1 seems to speak of groups of men and women created simultaneously. The division of humankind into two sexes is closely associated with the divine mandate to Be fertile and increase. In Jewish law, this is a positive commandment, although it is obligatory only on Jewish men, not women (b. Yebam. 65b). 29–30: Humankind, animals, and birds all seem originally meant to be neither vegetarians nor carnivores, but frugivores, eating the seeds of plants and trees. 2.1–3: In the Jewish liturgy, this passage serves as an introduction to the kiddush, the prayer over wine to sanctify the Sabbath that is recited just before the first meal of the holy day, on Friday night (see Exod. 20.8–11). It also appears in the traditional Friday evening service. The passage is characterized by the type of repetition that suggests it might have served as a liturgy already in antiquity.

⁴Such is the story of heaven and earth when they were created.

When the LORD God made earth and heaven—⁵when no shrub of the field was yet on earth and no grasses of the field had yet sprouted, because the LORD God had not sent rain upon the earth and there was no man to till the soil, ⁶but a flow would well up from the ground and water the whole surface of the earth—⁷the LORD God formed man^a from the dust of the earth.^b He blew into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living being.

⁸The LORD God planted a garden in Eden, in the east, and placed there the man whom He had formed. ⁹And from the ground the LORD God caused to grow every tree that was pleasing to the sight and good for food, with the tree of life in the middle of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and bad.

¹⁰A river issues from Eden to water the garden, and it then divides and becomes four branches. ¹¹The name of the first is Pishon, the one that winds through the whole land of Havilah, where the gold is. (¹²The gold of that land is good; bdellium is there, and lapis lazuli.^c) ¹³The name of the second river is Gihon, the one that winds through the whole land of Cush. ¹⁴The name of the third river is Tigris, the one that flows east of Asshur. And the fourth river is the Euphrates.

Whereas 1.1–2.3 presented a majestic God-centered scenario of creation, 2.4–25 presents a very different but equally profound story of origins. This second account of creation is centered more on human beings and familiar human experiences, and even its deity is conceived in more anthropomorphic terms. Source critics attribute the two accounts to different documents (P and J, respectively) later combined into the Torah we now have. The classical Jewish tradition tends to harmonize the discrepancies by intertwining the stories, using the details of one to fill in the details of the other. Even on the source-critical reading, however, the contrast and interaction of the two creation accounts offer a richer understanding of the relationship of God to humankind than we would have if the accounts were read in isolation from each other. 4: The Jewish textual tradition places a major break between 2.3 and 2.4, rather than in the middle of v. 4, where many modern interpreters put it, and for good reason. If the latter verse, or even its first half (2.4a), is read with 1.1–2.3, then several of the multiples of seven in 1.1–2.3, of which we gave a sample above (see intro. to 1.1–2.3), disappear. Most likely, 2.4a is an editorial linkage between the two accounts of creation. 5–6: For the first time, we see the Tetragrammaton (YHWH) or the four-letter proper name of the God of Israel, the pronunciation of which rabbinic law forbids categorically. The name is conventionally rendered in English as "LORD" and in Heb as "Adonai" (in prayer and in liturgical reading of Scripture) or "ha-Shem" (in other contexts). The use of this name is one of several features that cause source critics to attribute this second creation account to the J source. Note that the expression "heaven and earth" (1.1; 2.4a) now appears in the reverse order ("earth and heaven"), as befits the more earth-centered character of this story. Whereas in the first account of creation the primordial problem was too much water, requiring God to split the waters and create dry land (1.6–7, 9–10), here the problem is too little water. The variation may reflect the difference between the situation in Babylonia, in which the saline waters of the sea threatened human life, and a setting in the land of Israel, where a deficiency of water was (and is) a constant threat. 7: Here, man has a lowlier origin than in the parallel in 1.26–28. He is created not in the image of God but from the dust of the earth. But he also has a closer and more intimate relationship with his Creator, who blows the breath of life into him, transforming that lowly, earth-bound creature into a living being. In this understanding, the human being is not an amalgam of perishable body and immortal soul, but a psychophysical unity who depends on God for life itself. 8–11: The root of Eden denotes fertility. Where the wondrously fertile garden was thought to have been located (if a realistic location was ever conceived) is unclear. The Tigris and Euphrates are the two great rivers of Mesopotamia (now found in modern Iraq). But the Pishon is unidentified, and the only Gihon in the Bible is a spring in Jerusalem (1 Kings 1.33, 38). Adam is conceived as a farmer, and work—albeit in an exceedingly easy form, given the miraculous fertility of Eden—is part of the divine plan.

¹⁸The LORD God said, “It is not good for man to be alone; I will make a fitting helper for him.” ¹⁹And the LORD God formed out of the earth all the wild beasts and all the birds of the sky, and brought them to the man to see what he would call them; and whatever the man called each living creature, that would be its name. ²⁰And the man gave names to all the cattle and to the birds of the sky and to all the wild beasts; but for Adam no fitting helper was found. ²¹So the LORD God cast a deep sleep upon the man; and, while he slept, He took one of his ribs and closed up the flesh at that spot. ²²And the LORD God fashioned the rib that He had taken from the man into a woman; and He brought her to the man. ²³Then the man said,

Is bone of my bones
And flesh of my flesh.
This one shall be called Woman,^a
For from man^b was she taken.”

²⁴Hence a man leaves his father and mother and clings to his wife, so that they become one flesh.

²⁵The two of them were naked,^c the man and his wife, yet they felt no shame. ¹Now the serpent was the shrewdest of all the wild beasts that the LORD God had made. He said to the woman, “Did God really say: You shall not eat of any tree of the garden?” ²The woman replied to the serpent, “We may eat of the fruit of the other trees of the garden. ³It is only about fruit of the tree in the

16–17: Knowledge of good and bad may be a merism, a figure of speech in which polar opposites denote a totality (like heaven and earth in 1.1). But knowledge can have an experiential, not only an intellectual, sense in biblical Heb, and “good and bad” can mean either “weal and woe” or “moral good and moral evil.” The forbidden tree offers an experience that is both pleasant and painful; it awakens those who partake of it to the higher knowledge and to the pain that both come with moral choice. 18–24: Man’s fulfillment requires companionship. As a talmudic rabbi observes about v. 18, “Even though a man has several sons, it is forbidden to him to be without a wife” (b. Yebam. 61b). The LORD’s creation of woman from man emphasizes the close connection between them and lays the groundwork for the understanding of marriage (and its association with procreation) in v. 24. The creation of the woman after the man and from a part of his body need not imply the subordination of women to men. According to Ramban (Nahmanides, a great 13th-century Spanish rabbi), the point of v. 24 is that men are to be different from the males of the animal world, who mate and move on to the next partner: A man “wishes [his wife] to be with him always.” Promiscuity is thus a degradation of God’s intentions in creating human beings male and female. It is interesting that although polygamy is amply attested in the Tanakh, v. 24 indicates that the ideal, Edenic condition is monogamy (see also Mal. 2.14–16; Prov. 5.15–23).

2.25–3.24: Disobedience, knowledge, exile. 2.25–3.1a: That the primal couple were nude (Heb “arummim”) but not ashamed attests to their innocence but also to their ignorance. It contrasts with the shrewd (“arum”) nature of the snake who will tempt them into losing both. Unlike some later Jewish and Christian literature, Genesis does not identify the talking snake with Satan or any other demonic being. 3.1b–3: His question is tricky and does not admit of a yes-or-no answer. The woman, who has never heard the commandment directly (2.16–17), paraphrases it closely. Why she adds the prohibition on touching the fruit is unclear. A talmudic rabbi sees here an illustration of the dictum that “he who adds [to God’s words] subtracts [from them]” (b. Sanh. 29a). Another rabbinic source presents a more complicated explanation. In relating the prohibition to his wife, Adam has obeyed the rabbinic principle that one should “make a [protective] hedge for the Torah” (m. Avot 1.1). Tragically, this praiseworthy act gave the snake his opening. He middle of the garden that God said: 'You shall not eat of it or touch it, lest you die.' " ⁴And the serpent said to the woman, "You are not going to die, ⁵but God knows that as soon as you eat of it your eyes will be opened and you will be like ^adivine beings who know ^a good and bad." ⁶When the woman saw that the tree was good for eating and a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was desirable as a source of wisdom, she took of its fruit and ate. She also gave some to her husband, and he ate. ⁷Then the eyes of both of them were opened and they perceived that they were naked; and they sewed together fig leaves and made themselves loincloths.

⁸They heard the sound of the LORD God moving about in the garden at the breezy time of day; and the man and his wife hid from the LORD God among the trees of the garden. ⁹The LORD God called out to the man and said to him, "Where are you?" ¹⁰He replied, "I heard the sound of You in the garden, and I was afraid because I was naked, so I hid." ¹¹Then He asked, "Who told you that you were naked? Did you eat of the tree from which I had forbidden you to eat?" ¹²The man said, "The woman You put at my side—she gave me of the tree, and I ate." ¹³And the LORD God said to the woman, "What is this you have done!" The woman replied, "The serpent duped me, and I ate." ¹⁴Then the LORD God said to the serpent,

"Because you did this,
More cursed shall you be
Than all cattle
And all the wild beasts:
On your belly shall you crawl
And dirt shall you eat
All the days of your life.

¹⁵ I will put enmity
Between you and the woman,
And between your offspring and hers;
They shall strike at your head,
And you shall strike at their heel."

¹⁶And to the woman He said,
"I will make most severe
Your pangs in childbearing;
In pain shall you bear children.
Yet your urge shall be for your husband,
And he shall rule over you."

¹⁷To Adam He said, "Because you did as your wife said and ate of the tree about which I commanded you, 'You shall not eat of it,'

"touched the tree with his hands and his feet, and shook it until its fruits dropped to the ground," thus undermining the credibility of God's entire commandment in the woman's mind (Avot. R. Nat. A.1). 4-5: The serpent impugns God's motives, attributing the command to jealousy. Whereas in the first creation account human beings are God-like creatures exercising dominion (1.26-28), here their ambition to be like God or like divine beings is the root of their expulsion from Eden. 6: The fatal progression in the woman's mind begins with the physical (eating), moves to the aesthetic (a delight to the eyes), and culminates in the intellectual (a source of wisdom). The progression may reflect the process of rationalization to which she succumbed just before she engaged in humanity's first act of disobedience. 7: As the serpent had predicted (v. 5), their eyes are opened, and they have enhanced knowledge (v. 7). 8-17: But with the new knowledge comes the shame of nudity that they had lacked in their childlike innocence (vv. 10-11; cf. 2.25), a symbol of a much more encompassing sense of guilt and an ominous estrangement between God and the primal couple. The man lamely attempts to pass the buck to his wife, and thus, also to the God who put her at his side (v. 12). She, with more credibility, blames the serpent (v. 13). 14-19: The LORD God then reverses the order and punishes the malefactors in the order of their misdeeds. The serpent is to lose his legs, slither in the dirt, and suffer from the hostility of human beings (vv. 14-15). The woman will suffer pain in childbirth, experience sexual desire for her husband, yet be subordinate to him (v. 16). The man, for having obeyed her rather than God, will toil over unproductive soil all the days of his life, until the ground from which he was taken reabsorbs him (vv. 17-19; cf. 2.7). The primal couple have left the magical garden of their childhood and their innocence and entered into the harsh world of adulthood and

 And to dust you shall return.”

²⁰The man named his wife Eve,^a because she was the mother of all the living.^b ²¹And the LORD God made garments of skins for Adam and his wife, and clothed them.

²²And the LORD God said, “Now that the man has become like one of us, knowing good and bad, what if he should stretch out his hand and take also from the tree of life and eat, and live forever!” ²³So the LORD God banished him from the garden of Eden, to till the soil from which he was taken. ²⁴He drove the man out, and stationed east of the garden of Eden the cherubim and the fiery ever-turning sword, to guard the way to the tree of life.

4 Now the man knew^c his wife Eve, and she conceived and bore Cain, saying, “I have gained^d a male child with the help of the LORD.” ²She then bore his brother Abel. Abel became a keeper of sheep, and Cain became a tiller of the soil. ³In the course of time, Cain brought an offering to the LORD from the fruit of the soil; ⁴and Abel, for his part, brought the choicest of the firstlings of his flock. The LORD paid heed to Abel and his offering, ⁵but to Cain its painful realities. 20–21: God’s clothing the naked indicates that His anger was not the last word in the divine-human relationship. The Jewish ethical tradition finds in this unmerited kindness a paradigm for human behavior, as well. “Great are acts of kindness,” a talmudic rabbi remarks, “for the Torah begins with an act of kindness and ends with an act of kindness”—it begins with God’s clothing the naked and ends with His burying the dead (Moses) (Deut.

34.6) (b. Sof. 14a). 22–24: Neither the first nor the second account of creation portrays humankind as created immortal. Nor does the punishment of v. 19, which speaks of Adam’s returning to the ground from which he was taken, mean that he would have lived forever, had it not been for his disobedience. In this passage, the LORD, alarmed at the very real, God-like status that the man has suddenly attained, resolves to deny him the opportunity to make himself immortal and banishes him from the garden in which the tree of life was found. The cherubim are supernatural beings who sometimes act as protectors of sacred items or places (e.g., Exod. 25.17–22; 1 Kings 8.6–7). The stance of jealousy about His status and anxiety about human beings’ acquiring immortality is not the only one taken by the God of Israel. Prov. 3.18 asserts that the tree of life, in the form of Wisdom (therein personified as a woman), remains available to “those who grasp her.” The Rabbis identified wisdom with Torah and could therefore cite Prov. 3.18 in support of their characteristic affirmation that Torah “gives life to those who practice it, in this world and in the world-to-come” (m. ’Avot 6.7). In Judaism, the estrangement caused by the innate human appetite for evil does not require an act of messianic redemption to be healed. Rather, the practice and study of Torah renew intimacy with the God of Israel and lead to eternal life. “The Holy One (blessed be He) created the Evil Inclination; He created Torah as its antidote” (b. B. Bat. 16a).

4.1–16: The first murder. This story of the LORD’s preference for the younger brother and the older brother’s resentment and exile looks both back to the episode in the garden of Eden and forward to other stories of mysterious divine preference, sibling rivalry, and exile later in the book of Genesis (chs 21, 27, 37). 1: The verb translated knew may have the sense of “had known” in this context. Rashi thinks the conception of Cain occurred in the garden of Eden before his parents had sinned. 3–5: The Torah does not say why the LORD accepted Abel’s offering, but not Cain’s. Perhaps we are to infer that Abel offered his with greater devotion (the choicest of the firstlings as opposed to the fruit of the soil). Alternately, the episode may evidence the high regard for shepherds and the pastoral life manifest, for example, in the early life of national heroes such as Jo-and his offering He paid no heed. Cain was much distressed and his face fell. ⁶And the LORD said to Cain, “Why are you distressed,

And why is your face fallen?
⁷ Surely, if you do right,
There is uplift.
But if you do not do right
Sin couches at the door;
Its urge is toward you,
Yet you can be its master.”

⁸Cain said to his brother Abel^b . . . and when they were in the field, Cain set upon his brother Abel and killed him. ⁹The LORD said to Cain, “Where is your brother Abel?” And he said, “I do not know. Am I my brother’s keeper?” ¹⁰Then He said, “What have you done? Hark, your brother’s blood cries out to Me from the ground! ¹¹Therefore, you shall be more cursed than the ground,^c which opened its mouth to receive your brother’s blood from your hand. ¹²If you till the soil, it shall no longer yield its strength to you. You shall become a ceaseless wanderer on earth.”

¹³Cain said to the LORD, “My punishment is too great to bear! ¹⁴Since You have banished me this day from the soil, and I must avoid Your presence and become a restless wanderer on earth—anyone who meets me may kill me!” ¹⁵The LORD said to him, “I promise, if anyone kills Cain, sevenfold vengeance shall be taken on him.” And the LORD put a mark on Cain, lest anyone who met him should kill him. ¹⁶Cain left the presence of the LORD and settled in the land of Nod, east of Eden.

¹⁷Cain knew his wife, and she conceived and bore Enoch. And he then founded a city, and named the city after his son Enoch. ¹⁸To Enoch was born Irad, and Irad begot Mehujael, and Mehujael^d begot Methusael, and Methusael begot Lamech. ¹⁹Lamech took to himself two wives: the name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other was Zillah. ²⁰Adah bore Jabal; he was the ancestor of those who dwell in tents and amidst herds. ²¹And the name of his brother was Jubal; he was the ancestor of all who play the lyre and the pipe. ²²As for Zillah, she bore Tubal-cain, who forged all implements of copper and iron. And the sister of Tubal-cain was Naamah.

seph, Moses, and David. Like Abel, however, all the latter—and many others chosen by God in the Tanakh (e.g., Isaac, Jacob, and Solomon)—were younger brothers. The story of Cain and Abel thus demonstrates a theme widespread in the Tanakh: the difference between God’s will and human conventions, such as primogeniture. In this text, the emphasis falls, however, not on the reasons for God’s preference, but on Cain’s fatal and culpable refusal to reconcile himself to it.

7: The end of the verse is strikingly reminiscent of the words of God to Eve in 3.16, just as Cain’s punishment in 4.11–12 recalls Adam’s in 3.17–19. It is possible that the story of Cain and Abel itself once served as an account of the primal sin and the expulsion from paradise. 9: The LORD’s question to Cain recalls that to Adam in 3.9. In both cases, He asks about more than location. Cain’s flippant answer offends against the Torah’s ethic of responsibility for one’s kinsman and neighbor (e.g., Lev. 19.16; Deut. 21.1–9).

13–15: Although murder is a capital offense in biblical law (e.g., Exod. 21.12), the LORD yields to Cain’s plea and protects him from the fate he inflicted on Abel. The irony is pungent: The man who could not tolerate God’s inscrutable grace now benefits from it. A midrash sees Cain as the first penitent and attributes his pardon to his repentance (Gen. Rab. 22.13).

4.17–26: The growth of culture. This highly compressed passage may be an epitome of well-known legends that have not survived. The emergence of occupations and technologies that it records is reminiscent of the Mesopotamian tradition about the pre-flood sages who founded the basic institutions of civilization. The culminating v. 26 speaks of what is, in the Jewish view, the most important of these: the proper worship of the true God. This comes not from the line of Cain, but from Adam and Eve’s third son, Seth. The poem of Lamech in vv. 23–24 continues the

²³ And Lamech said to his wives,
 “Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
 O wives of Lamech, give ear to my speech.
 I have slain a man for wounding me,
 And a lad for bruising me.

²⁴ If Cain is avenged sevenfold,
 Then Lamech seventy-sevenfold.”

²⁵ Adam knew his wife again, and she bore a son and named him Seth, meaning, “God has ^aprovided me with^a another offspring in place of Abel,” for Cain had killed him. ²⁶ And to Seth, in turn, a son was born, and he named him Enosh. It was then that men began to invoke the LORD by name.

5 This is the record of Adam’s line.—When God created man, He made him in the likeness of God; ² male and female He created them. And when they were created, He blessed them and called them Man.—³ When Adam had lived 130 years, he begot a son in his likeness after his image, and he named him Seth. ⁴ After the birth of Seth, Adam lived 800 years and begot sons and daughters. ⁵ All the days that Adam lived came to 930 years; then he died.

⁶ When Seth had lived 105 years, he begot Enosh. ⁷ After the birth of Enosh, Seth lived 807 years and begot sons and daughters. ⁸ All the days of Seth came to 912 years; then he died.

⁹ When Enosh had lived 90 years, he begot Kenan. ¹⁰ After the birth of Kenan, Enosh lived 815 years and begot sons and daughters. ¹¹ All the days of Enosh came to 905 years; then he died.

¹² When Kenan had lived 70 years, he begot Mahalalel. ¹³ After the birth of Mahalalel, Kenan lived 840 years and begot sons and daughters. ¹⁴ All the days of Kenan came to 910 years; then he died.

¹⁵ When Mahalalel had lived 65 years, he begot Jared. ¹⁶ After the birth of Jared, Mahalalel lived 830 years and begot sons and daughters. ¹⁷ All the days of Mahalalel came to 895 years; then he died.

5.1–32: The ten generations from Adam to Noah. This genealogy can be seen, in part, as the parallel to the list in 4.17–26. Note the similarity or identity of many of the names in the two genealogies: Cain/Kenan, Enoch/Enoch, Irad/Jared, Mehujael/Mehalalel, Methusael/Methuselah, Lamech/Lamech. Even if these figures were originally thought to be descendants of Cain, ch 5 treats them all as descendants of Seth. Cain’s line will not survive the flood, and the people Israel will emerge from the lineage of the younger son’s replacement (4.25), not from that of the murderous first-born son of Adam. 1–3: The ostensibly natural process of procreation has high theological import: It continues the creation of human beings in God’s likeness (1.26–28). 5: The enormous life spans of Adam and his antediluvian descendants find a parallel in the Sumerian King List, a very ancient Mesopotamian text, in which the pre-flood kings rule much longer than those who came afterward (the longest reign was 65,000 years). The underlying conception is that things proceeded on a grander scale in those days. These life spans are thus akin to the biblical allusions to primordial giants or heroes (e.g., 6.4; Deut. 2.20–21). 21–23: Significantly, Enoch occupies the seventh position and lives only 365 years (suggesting a connection with the solar cycle). Like Noah (6.9), he walked with God, though the meaning of the statement that God took him is unclear. Rashi thinks it means that God caused his death prematurely to spare him from sinning. It is possible that Enoch’s earthly life, like Elijah’s (2 Kings 2.11–12), ended without death. 29: The allusion to 3.17 is one of several indications that Noah is the new Adam—a righteous antidote to the wickedness of the father of universal mankind. Remarkably an early days of Enoch came to 365 years. ²⁴Enoch walked with God; then he was no more, for God took him.

²⁵When Methuselah had lived 187 years, he begot Lamech. ²⁶After the birth of Lamech, Methuselah lived 782 years and begot sons and daughters. ²⁷All the days of Methuselah came to 969 years; then he died.

²⁸When Lamech had lived 182 years, he begot a son. ²⁹And he named him Noah, saying, "This one will provide us relief^a from our work and from the toil of our hands, out of the very soil which the LORD placed under a curse." ³⁰After the birth of Noah, Lamech lived 595 years and begot sons and daughters. ³¹All the days of Lamech came to 777 years; then he died.

³²When Noah had lived 500 years, Noah begot Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

6 When men began to increase on earth and daughters were born to them, ²the divine beings^b saw how beautiful the daughters of men were and took wives from among those that pleased them.—³The LORD said, "My breath shall not abide^c in man forever, since he too is flesh; let the days allowed him be one hundred and twenty years."—⁴It was then, and later too, that the Nephilim appeared on earth—when the divine beings cohabited with the daughters of men, who bore them offspring. They were the heroes of old, the men of renown.

⁵The LORD saw how great was man's wickedness on earth, and how every plan devised by his mind was nothing but evil all the time. ⁶And the LORD regretted that He had made man on earth, and His heart was saddened. ⁷The LORD said, "I will blot out from the earth the men whom I created—men together with beasts, creeping things, and birds of the sky; for I regret that I made them."

⁸But Noah found favor with the LORD.

⁹This is the line of Noah.—Noah was a righteous man; he was blameless in his age; Noah walked with God.—

¹⁰Noah begot three sons: Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

¹¹The earth became corrupt before God; the earth was rabbi, "When a righteous person comes into the world, goodness comes into the world" (b. Sanh. 113b). 31: The suspicious figure of 777 is undoubtedly related to (the Cainite) Lamech's mention of

"sevenfold" and "seventy-sevenfold" in 4.24.

6.1-8: The prelude to the flood.
1-4: This brief narrative reads like a condensation of a much longer, well-known myth. It records yet another breach of the all-important boundary between the divine and the human (vv. 1-2) and explains why human beings no longer attain to the great ages of their primordial forebears (v. 3). It also explains the origin of the Nephilim (v. 4), the preternatural giants that Israelite tradition thought once dwelt in the land (Num. 13.31-33). 5-8: Whereas in ch 1 God seven times "saw" what He had made and pronounced it "good," this passage reports that He saw how great was man's wickedness and regretted that He had made man. The flood narrative that ensues, a characteristically Israelite adaptation of a well-known and widespread Mesopotamian story, emphasizes human immorality as the provocation for the cataclysm. Most strikingly, the narrator depicts God's heart as saddened. The sudden mention of Noah (v. 8)—whose Heb name ("n-ḥ") is "favor" ("h-n") spelled backwards—indicates that human perversion and divine grief will not be the last word.

6.9-9.17: The flood: corruption, destruction, re-creation, covenant.

6.9-10: The mention of Noah's righteousness and blamelessness serves as a counterpoint to the reports of human wickedness and lawlessness that both precede and follow it (vv. 1-7, 11-13). 8: The favor that Noah found . . . with the LORD derives, in part or in whole, from his lonely role as the one moral man in an immoral society. As such, he also serves as the one who provides relief from the LORD's curse, as his father predicted when he named him (5.29). 11-16: The word translated ark occurs only in the flood story of Genesis and in the account of Moses' mother's effort to save her baby by putting him in the Nile in Exod. 2.3 (where the term is rendered "basket"). Noah foreshadows Moses, even as Moses, removed from the water, foreshadows the people Israel, whom he leads to safety through the death-dealing sea that drowns their oppressors filled with lawlessness. ¹²When God saw how corrupt the earth was, for all flesh had corrupted its ways on earth, ¹³God said to Noah, “I have decided to put an end to all flesh, for the earth is filled with lawlessness because of them: I am about to destroy them with the earth. ¹⁴Make yourself an ark of gopher wood; make it an ark with compartments, and cover it inside and out with pitch. ¹⁵This is how you shall make it: the length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, its width fifty cubits, and its height thirty cubits. ¹⁶Make an opening for daylight in the ark, and “terminate it within a cubit of the top.” Put the entrance to the ark in its side; make it with bottom, second, and third decks.

¹⁷“For My part, I am about to bring the Flood—waters upon the earth—to destroy all flesh under the sky in which there is breath of life; everything on earth shall perish. ¹⁸But I will establish My covenant with you, and you shall enter the ark, with your sons, your wife, and your sons’ wives. ¹⁹And of all that lives, of all flesh, you shall take two of each into the ark to keep alive with you; they shall be male and female. ²⁰From birds of every kind, cattle of every kind, every kind of creeping thing on earth, two of each shall come to you to stay alive. ²¹For your part, take of everything that is eaten and store it away, to serve as food for you and for them.” ²²Noah did so; just as God commanded him, so he did.

7 Then the LORD said to Noah, “Go into the ark, with all your household, for you alone have I found righteous before Me in this generation. ²Of every clean animal you shall take seven pairs, males and their mates, and of every animal that is not clean, two, a male and its mate; ³of the birds of the sky also, seven pairs, male and female, to keep seed alive upon all the earth. ⁴For in seven days’ time I will make it rain upon the earth, forty days and forty nights, and I will blot out from the earth all existence that I created.” ⁵And Noah did just as the LORD commanded him.

⁶Noah was six hundred years old when the Flood came, waters upon the earth. ⁷Noah, with his sons, his wife, and his sons’ wives, went into the ark because of the waters of the Flood. ⁸Of the clean animals, of the animals that are (Exod. chs 14–15). The great biblical tale of redemption occurs first in a shorter, universal form, then in a longer, particularistic one.

14–16: The cubit being roughly one and a half feet, the ark measures about 150 m × 25 m × 15 m (450 ft × 75 ft × 45 ft). Unlike other ancient boats, it is entirely enclosed, with the exception of the opening for daylight (v. 16). Covered inside and out with pitch (v. 14) to protect its passengers from the cataclysm, the ark symbolizes the tender mercies and protective grace with which God envelops the righteous even in the harshest circumstances.

6.17–22: Further introduction and a pledge. 18: This v. records the first mention of covenant (“berit”) in the Tanakh. In the ancient Near East, a covenant was an agreement that the parties swore before the gods, and expected the gods to enforce. In this case, God is Himself a party to the covenant, which is more like a pledge than an agreement or contract (this was sometimes the case in the ancient Near East as well). The covenant with Noah will receive longer treatment in 9.1–17. 19–20: This contradicts 7.2, in which the LORD instructs Noah to take seven pairs of the clean animals and two of the unclean (“clean” and “unclean” refer to ritual categories and not to hygiene; the terminology of “pure” and “impure” would be less misleading). Critical scholars explain the contradiction by attributing 6.19–20 to the Priestly source (P) but 7.2 to the J. Only the latter reports Noah’s sacrifice when he emerges from the ark (8.20–21). If there were only one pair of each animal, this sacrifice would lead to the counterproductive result that the species offered would thereby become extinct. The source-critical explanation receives corroboration from the use of God in 6.9–22 but “LORD” in 7.1–5, and from the rest of the flood story, which suggests that two slightly differing stories have been interwoven. Traditional commentators have other explanations, for example, that two in 6.19 means “at least two” (Rashi) or that a pair of each species would come of their own accord, but Noah would later have to capture seven of the “clean” species to use for the sacrifice (Ramban).

7.1–23: The flood comes. 4: The forty days and forty nights of rainfall here and in v. 12 conflict with the one hundred fifty days of not clean, of the birds, and of everything that creeps on the ground, ⁹two of each, male and female, came to Noah into the ark, as God had commanded Noah. ¹⁰And on the seventh day the waters of the Flood came upon the earth.

¹¹In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month, on that day All the fountains of the great deep burst apart, And the floodgates of the sky broke open.

(¹²The rain fell on the earth forty days and forty nights.)

¹³That same day Noah and Noah's sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, went into the ark, with Noah's wife and the three wives of his sons—¹⁴they and all beasts of every kind, all cattle of every kind, all creatures of every kind that creep on the earth, and all birds of every kind, every bird, every winged thing. ¹⁵They came to Noah into the ark, two each of all flesh in which there was breath of life. ¹⁶Thus they that entered comprised male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded him. And the LORD shut him in.

²⁴And when the waters had swelled on the earth one hundred and fifty days, ¹God remembered Noah and all the beasts and all the cattle that were with him in the ark, and God caused a wind to blow across the earth, and the waters subsided. ²The fountains of the deep and the floodgates of the sky were stopped up, and the rain from the sky was held back; ³the waters then receded steadily from the earth. At the end of one hundred and fifty days the waters diminished, ⁴so that in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, the ark came to rest on the mountains of Ararat. ⁵The waters went on diminishing until the tenth month; in the tenth month, on the first of the month, the tops of the mountains became visible.

swelling waters in v. 24. Once again, critical scholars detect a difference between J and P, respectively.

8.1: The statement that God remembered Noah is the turning point of the whole flood narrative, marking the triumph of mercy over judgment. It recalls other incidents in the Torah in which God remembers Abraham and rescues: remembering Abraham and thus saving his nephew Lot from death in Sodom (19.29); remembering Rachel and thus rescuing her from the humiliation of infertility (30.22); and, most importantly, remembering "His covenant with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob" and finally saving Israel from enslavement to Pharaoh (Exod. 2.23–25). Here, too, the remembrance at issue is associated with God's reliable faithfulness to His covenant (7.18). 4: The mountains of Ararat refers to the hill country of ancient Urartu, a country in eastern Asia Minor occupying parts of what is now Turkey, Iraq, Armenia, and Iran (cf. 2 Kings 19.37; Jer. 51.27). Contrary to a common misimpression, the Tanakh knows of no individual mountain named "Ararat."

⁶At the end of forty days, Noah opened the window of the ark that he had made ⁷and sent out the raven; it went to and fro until the waters had dried up from the earth. ⁸Then he sent out the dove to see whether the waters had decreased from the surface of the ground. ⁹But the dove could not find a resting place for its foot, and returned to him to the ark, for there was water over all the earth. So putting out his hand, he took it into the ark with him. ¹⁰He waited another seven days, and again sent out the dove from the ark. ¹¹The dove came back to him toward evening, and there in its bill was a plucked-off olive leaf! Then Noah knew that the waters had decreased on the earth. ¹²He waited still another seven days and sent the dove forth; and it did not return to him any more.

¹³In the six hundred and first year, in the first month, on the first of the month, the waters began to dry from the earth; and when Noah removed the covering of the ark, he saw that the surface of the ground was drying. ¹⁴And in the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, the earth was dry.

²⁰Then Noah built an altar to the LORD and, taking of every clean animal and of every clean bird, he offered burnt offerings on the altar. ²¹The LORD smelled the pleasing odor, and the LORD said to Himself: “Never again will I doom the earth because of man, since the devisings of man’s mind are evil from his youth; nor will I ever again destroy every living being, as I have done.

²² So long as the earth endures,
Seedtime and harvest,
Cold and heat,
Summer and winter,
Day and night
Shall not cease.”

9 God blessed Noah and his sons, and said to them, “Be fertile and increase, and fill the earth. ²The fear and the dread of you shall be upon all the beasts of the earth and upon all the birds of the sky—everything with which the earth is astir—and upon all the fish of the sea; they are

13: At some point in Israelite tradition, the first day of the first month (which occurs in the spring, two weeks before Passover) must have served as New Year’s Day. In rabbinic law, it is listed, in fact, as one of four New Year’s Days, the most familiar being the autumnal holiday known today as Rosh Ha-Shanah (m. Rosh Hash. 1.1). It is significant that in the Tanakh, the first day of the first month is the day that the Tabernacle—the portable temple of the wilderness period—goes up (Exod. 40.2, 17). For the Mesopotamian epic known as Eruma elish, which was associated with a New Year’s festival, the date celebrates both the creation of the world from the severed body of the creator god’s aquatic enemy and the raising of a palace to the victorious creator. In Gen. ch 8, too, the world is, as it were, being created anew from the watery chaos that had undone God’s original work of creation. A new beginning is at hand, with Noah as the new Adam.

20–22: Nothing would seem more natural to a biblical Israelite who had survived a life-threatening crisis than to offer a sacrifice to the God of his salvation (v. 20). In this case, the sacrifice appeases the LORD (cf. Num. 17.8–15), who thus moves from anger at human beings to acceptance of them in their weakness. The correspondence of v. 21, at the end of the flood narrative, with 6.5, at its beginning, is striking: Human beings have not improved. “Harsh indeed is the Evil Inclination,” goes a saying in the Talmud that quotes v. 21, “for even its own Creator called it evil.” (b. Kid. 30b). Yet God will spare them nonetheless, and the rhythm of human life goes on (v. 22).

9.1–17: The covenant with Noah. Having rescued the righteous remnant from the lethal waters, God now makes a covenant with them, just as He will with the people Israel at Sinai after enabling them to escape across the Sea of Reeds (Exod. chs 14–15, 19). The closest parallel to our passage, however, is Gen. 17 (the covenant with given into your hand. ³Every creature that lives shall be yours to eat; as with the green grasses, I give you all these.

⁵But for your own life-blood I will require a reckoning: I will require it of every beast; of man, too, will I require a reckoning for human life, of every man for that of his fellow man!

⁶ Whoever sheds the blood of man,
By man shall his blood be shed;
For in His image
Did God make man.

⁸And God said to Noah and to his sons with him, ⁹"I now establish My covenant with you and your offspring to come, ¹⁰and with every living thing that is with you—birds, cattle, and every wild beast as well—all that have come out of the ark, every living thing on earth. ¹¹I will maintain My covenant with you: never again shall all flesh be cut off by the waters of a flood, and never again shall there be a flood to destroy the earth."

¹²God further said, "This is the sign that I set for the covenant between Me and you, and every living creature with you, for all ages to come. ¹³I have set My bow in the clouds, and it shall serve as a sign of the covenant between Me and the earth. ¹⁴When I bring clouds over the earth, and the bow appears in the clouds, ¹⁵I will remember My covenant between Me and you and every living creature among all flesh, so that the waters shall never again become a flood to destroy all flesh. ¹⁶When the bow is in the clouds, I will see it and remember the everlasting covenant between God and all living creatures, all flesh that is on earth. ¹⁷That," God said to Noah, "shall be the sign of the covenant that I have established between Me and all flesh that is on earth."

¹⁸The sons of Noah who came out of the ark were Shem, Ham, and Japheth—Ham being the father of Canaan. ¹⁹These three were the sons of Noah, and from these the whole world branched out.

²⁰Noah, the tiller of the soil, was the first to plant a vineyard. ²¹He drank of the wine and became drunk, and he Abraham), also ascribed to P. In each case, God makes an everlasting covenant or "pact" (9.16; 17.13, 19) memorialized by a distinctive sign, the rainbow in the case of Noah (9.12, 13, 17) and circumcision in the case of Abraham and the Jewish people who, he is promised, shall descend from him (17.11). 1–4: V. 1 repeats the charge to primordial humanity (1.28) verbatim (if only in part), but then enhances mankind's status relative to the animals: The animals shall be afraid of them, and God licenses humans to use them for food (vv. 2–3). The only qualification is that the blood, which the Tanakh identifies with the life-force (Lev. 17.11, 14; Deut. 12.23), must be drained out first. This is the origin of kashering, the Jewish practice of salting meat so as to absorb the blood before cooking. 5–6: By man in v. 6 may be more accurately rendered as "in compensation for a human being." Human life is sharply distinguished from animal life; the idea that human beings are created in the image of God (1.26–27) requires a higher degree of respect for human life. In the Talmud, v. 5 is interpreted as a prohibition of killing oneself (b. B. K. 91b), and v. 6 is cited in support of the prohibition of abortion (b. Sanh. 57b). Jewish law strictly forbids suicide and allows abortion only in extreme situations and never for the purpose of birth control. 8–17: In the Talmud, it is taught that "descendants of Noah"—that is, universal humanity—are obligated by seven commandments: (1) to establish courts of justice, (2) to refrain from blaspheming the God of Israel, as well as from (3) idolatry, (4) sexual perversion, (5) bloodshed, and (6) robbery, and (7) not to eat meat cut from a living animal (b. Sanh. 56a). Whereas Jews have hundreds of commandments in addition to these seven (traditionally, 613 altogether), Gentiles who observe the "seven commandments of the descendants of Noah" can meet with God's full approval.

9.18–28 The sin of Ham and the cursing of Canaan. 20–21: The ancient Rabbis saw in Noah an object lesson about the dangers of intoxication (Gen. Rab. 36.4), but whether the first person to grow grapes should have foreseen the degrading consequences of excessive alcohol consumption is unclear. In any event, mentioning the failures of its human heroes is characteristic of the Tanakh; only God is perfect, and even He is at times the uncovered himself within his tent. ²²Ham, the father of Canaan, saw his father's nakedness and told his two brothers outside. ²³But Shem and Japheth took a cloth, placed it against both their backs and, walking backward, they covered their father's nakedness; their faces were turned the other way, so that they did not see their father's nakedness. ²⁴When Noah woke up from his wine and learned what his youngest son had done to him, ²⁵he said,

"Cursed be Canaan;
The lowest of slaves
Shall he be to his brothers."

²⁶And he said,

"Blessed be the LORD,
The God of Shem;
Let Canaan be a slave to them.

²⁷May God enlarge^a Japheth,
And let him dwell in the tents of Shem;
And let Canaan be a slave to them."

²⁸Noah lived after the Flood 350 years. ²⁹And all the days of Noah came to 950 years; then he died.

target of protest (e.g., see 18.22–33). 22–24: This perplexing passage serves as an explanation of the sexual perverseness that Israelite culture sometimes thought to be typical of the Canaanites (cf. Lev. 18.3–4, 24–30). Note that it is Canaan who is cursed (Gen. 9.25), although Ham perpetuated the atrocity. The author (or perhaps a redactor) softens the contradiction by twice pointing out that Ham is the father of Canaan (vv. 18, 22). The identity of the act in question is murky. "To uncover the nakedness" of a man means to have sexual relations with his wife (e.g., Lev. 20.11). This makes Ham guilty of incest. In Lev. 20.17, the less common expression "to see the nakedness" means to have sex. This would make Ham guilty of homosexual rape. In an effort to explain why Canaan is cursed for Ham's sin, on the other hand, the midrash sees Ham as castrating his father. Just as Ham prevented Noah from ever having a fourth son, so will his own fourth son, Canaan (10.6), be cursed (Gen. Rab. 36.7). V. 23, however, suggests that the words saw his father's nakedness are better taken literally. If so, Ham violated two norms highly stressed in both the Tanakh and rabbinic Judaism, the ethic of bodily modesty and the norm to honor and respect one's parents. 25–27: The cursing of Canaan may be intended, in part, to explain why non-Israelite slaves do not have to be emancipated (e.g., Lev. 25.39–46). Understanding Japheth to be Greece, an early rabbi cited v. 27 in defense of his ruling that scriptural scrolls may be written (other than in Heb) only in Greek: "May the beauty ('yefifut') of Japheth ('yefet') be in the tents of Shem" (b. Meg. 9b).

10.1–32: The seventy nations of the world. As if in fulfillment of God's command to Noah and his sons to "Be fertile and increase, and fill the earth" (9.1), the three sons of Noah rapidly engender nations that branched out over the earth (v. 32). The fluidity of identity, which allows a name to refer both to an individual and to a nation, is characteristic of the Tanakh and especially prominent in Genesis. This table of nations, strikingly universal in scope, represents an early exercise in ethnography. But, as in biblical genealogies generally, political relationships are at least as important as ethnicity and linguistic affinity in establishing lines of descent. Thus, the Canaanites are classed with Egypt (Mizraim) as Hamites (v. 6), though the geographic and linguistic relations of the Canaanites ought to put them in the same class as Israel (who have not yet emerged), the class of Shemites. The genealogy probably reflects the political reality that for a long time prior to the emergence of Israel, Egypt had dominated Canaan. Race in our contemporary sense of the term is not a basis for human division in Gen. ch 10, and no mention of physical characteristics is made. 3: Ashkenaz refers to the Scythians, who occupied the

²¹Sons were also born to Shem, ancestor of all the descendants of Eber and older brother of Japheth. ²²The descendants of Shem: Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram. ²³The descendants of Aram: Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash. ²⁴Arpachshad begot Shelah, and Shelah begot Eber. ²⁵Two sons were born to Eber: the name of the first was Peleg, for in his days the earth was divided;^c and the name of his brother was Joktan. ²⁶Joktan begot Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, ²⁷Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, ²⁸Obal, Abimael, Sheba, ²⁹Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab; all these were the descendants of Joktan. ³⁰Their settlements extended from Mesha as far as Sephar, the hill country to the east. ³¹These are the descendants of Shem according to their clans and languages, by their lands, according to their nations.

area to the north of the Black Sea (cf. Jer. 51.27). In the Middle Ages, Jews reused the term to refer to Germany and, later, to the Jewish communities of central and north-eastern Europe. 8–12: Nimrod joins the growing company of inventors of culture (cf. 4.17–22; 9.20). He is the first emperor (the term mighty hunter has royal connotations), uniting different parts of Mesopotamia under his rule. It is likely that these verses allude to a lost epic about the figure of Nimrod. Interpreting his name as a form of the Heb verb that means "to rebel," a midrash sees him as the archetypal rebel against the will of God (Tg. Ps.-J.)—to which Rabbi Abraham Ibn Ezra, the 12th-century commentator, replies, "Don't look for a reason for every name"!

11 Everyone on earth had the same language and the same words. ²And as they migrated from the east, they came upon a valley in the land of Shinar and settled there. ³They said to one another, “Come, let us make bricks and burn them hard.”—Brick served them as stone, and bitumen served them as mortar.—⁴And they said, “Come, let us build us a city, and a tower with its top in the sky, to make a name for ourselves; else we shall be scattered all over the world.” ⁵The LORD came down to look at the city and tower that man had built, ⁶and the LORD said, “If, as one people with one language for all, this is how they have begun to act, then nothing that they may propose to do will be out of their reach. ⁷Let us, then, go down and confound their speech there, so that they shall not understand one another’s speech.” ⁸Thus the LORD scattered them from there over the face of the whole earth; and they stopped building the city. ⁹That is why it was called Babel,^a because there the LORD confounded^b the speech of the whole earth; and from there the LORD scattered them over the face of the whole earth.

¹⁰This is the line of Shem. Shem was 100 years old when he begot Arpachshad, two years after the Flood. ¹¹After the birth of^c Arpachshad, Shem lived 500 years and begot sons and daughters.

¹²When Arpachshad had lived 35 years, he begot Shelah. ¹³After the birth of Shelah, Arpachshad lived 403 years and begot sons and daughters.

¹⁴When Shelah had lived 30 years, he begot Eber. ¹⁵After the birth of Eber, Shelah lived 403 years and begot sons and daughters.

¹⁶When Eber had lived 34 years, he begot Peleg. ¹⁷After the birth of Peleg, Eber lived 430 years and begot sons and daughters.

¹⁸When Peleg had lived 30 years, he begot Reu. ¹⁹After the birth of Reu, Peleg lived 209 years and begot sons and daughters.

²⁰When Reu had lived 32 years, he begot Serug. ²¹After the birth of Serug, Reu lived 207 years and begot sons and daughters.

²²When Serug had lived 30 years, he begot Nahor. ²³After the birth of Nahor, Serug lived 200 years and begot sons and daughters.

²⁴When Nahor had lived 29 years, he begot Terah.

11.1–9: The tower of Babel.

Whereas ch 10 presents post-flood humanity as divided into nations, “each with its language” (v. 5), 11.1–9 attributes the emergence of linguistic difference to an act of Promethean hubris on the part of a humankind still unwilling to accept subordination to their Creator. 4: Since the narrative serves as an account of how Babylon got its name, the ambition of the builders to erect a tower with its top in the sky is properly compared with the prideful boast of the king of Babylon, “I will climb to the sky; / Higher than the stars of God / I will set my throne. . . . I will match the Most High” (Isa. 14.13–14). In our passage, one senses both astonishment at the advanced technological level of Babylonian culture and a keen sense that technology poses grave dangers when it is not accompanied by reverence for God. 5: A nice touch: Human beings erect the highest building they can, but even to see it, the LORD must descend from His heavenly dwelling. 7: As in 1.26, the plural (Let us) probably reflects an address to the divine council. 8–9: Human disunity and exile are not God’s final wish, however, as the next chapter shows. Whereas the builders of Babel sought “to make a name for [them]selves” on their own, the LORD, in the next ch, promises to make Abram’s “name great” Himself (12.2). And whereas they feared being “scattered all over the world” (11.4), the LORD calls Abram out of Mesopotamia and promises him a land of his own (12.1, 7). Whereas the builders of Babel are cursed with an inability to understand each other (11.7, 9), the LORD blesses not only Abram but all those who bless him (12.2–3).

11.10–32: Ten generations from Shem to Abram. The text rapidly works its way from Noahide humankind to the particular subject that will dominate the rest of the Torah: God’s dealing with the people Israel, descended from Abram and thus from Shem. Compared to ²⁵After the birth of Terah, Nahor lived 119 years and begot sons and daughters.

³¹Terah took his son Abram, his grandson Lot the son of Haran, and his daughter-in-law Sarai, the wife of his son Abram, and they set out together from Ur of the Chaldeans for the land of Canaan; but when they had come as far as Haran, they settled there. ³²The days of Terah came to 205 years; and Terah died in Haran.

place names. 31–32: The idea that Abram began his trek to Canaan together with his father contradicts the impression one receives from 12.1, wherein Abram leaves his “father’s house” to go to an unnamed land that turns out, of course, to be Canaan (cf. 15.7). Source critics solve the problem by assigning vv. 31–32 to P, but the account of Abram’s leaving his “father’s house” for Canaan to J. The more traditional approach would be to speak of two stages to Abram’s trek, the first from Ur to Haran with Terah, the second from Haran to Canaan without him. Note that if one computes the life span of 205 years given for Terah in v. 32 with other numbers in the life of Abram—born when his father is seventy (v. 26), seventy-five when he left Haran (12.4)—then Terah lived for sixty years after Abram’s departure. The difference between the narrative order and the chronological order provides Rashi with the basis for pungent observation: “The wicked are called ‘dead’ even in their lifetime” (according to Josh. 24.2, Terah was an idolater).

12.1–9: The command and the promise to Abram. 1–3: The universalism that marked Gen. chs 1–11 having now failed, the LORD begins anew, singling out one Mesopotamian—in no way distinguished from his peers as yet—and promising to make of him a great nation, not numbered in the seventy nations of ch 10. What the LORD promises Abram (his name is changed to “Abraham” only in ch 17)—land, numerous offspring, and blessing—constitutes to a large extent a reversal of some of the curses on Adam and Eve—exile, pain in childbirth, and uncooperative soil (3.16–24). The twin themes of land and progeny inform the rest of the Torah. In Gen. ch 12, these extraordinary promises come like a bolt from the blue, an act of God’s grace alone; no indication has been given as to why or even whether Abram merits them. In 22.15–18, they will be reinterpreted as the LORD’s condign response to Abraham’s great act of obedience when he proved willing to sacrifice his beloved son, Isaac. In Second Temple and rabbinic sources, various details of Abraham’s early life are filled in, and he sometimes appears as the first monotheist, discovering the one true God even before God calls him.

arrived in the land of Canaan, ⁶ Abram passed through the land as far as the site of Shechem, at the terebinth of Moreh. The Canaanites were then in the land.

⁷ The LORD appeared to Abram and said, "I will assign this land to your offspring." And he built an altar there to the LORD who had appeared to him. ⁸ From there he moved on to the hill country east of Bethel and pitched his tent, with Bethel on the west and Ai on the east; and he built there an altar to the LORD and invoked the LORD by name. ⁹ Then Abram journeyed by stages toward the Negeb.

¹⁰ There was a famine in the land, and Abram went down to Egypt to sojourn there, for the famine was severe in the land. ¹¹ As he was about to enter Egypt, he said to his wife Sarai, "I know^a what a beautiful woman you are. ¹² If the Egyptians see you, and think, 'She is his wife,' they will kill me and let you live. ¹³ Please say that you are my sister, that it may go well with me because of you, and that I may remain alive thanks to you."

¹⁷ But the LORD afflicted Pharaoh and his household with mighty plagues on account of Sarai, the wife of Abram. ¹⁸ Pharaoh sent for Abram and said, "What is this you have done to me! Why did you not tell me that she was your wife? ¹⁹ Why did you say, 'She is my sister,' so that I took her as my wife? Now, here is your wife; take her and be-gone!" ²⁰ And Pharaoh put men in charge of him, and they sent him off with his wife and all that he possessed.

6: The statement that The Canaanites were then in the land poses an obstacle to the doctrine of Mosaic authorship, since the Canaanites were still firmly in control of the land when Moses died. Ibn Ezra suggests that the Canaanites may have taken the land from some prior occupants, and "if not, [this verse] has a great secret." The "great secret," according to Joseph Bonfils, a commentator on Ibn Ezra, was that "Joshua or another of the other prophets wrote it. . . .

And since we are to have trust in the words of tradition and the prophets," Bonfils concludes, "what should I care whether it was Moses or another prophet who wrote it, since the words of all of them are true and inspired?" (Tsafenat Pa'aneah)

12.10–20: Exile and danger. No sooner has Abram been promised the land and taken his tour of it than the promise is thrown into great danger. In the extreme and life-threatening circumstance of famine, Abram leaves Canaan for Egypt, a land that had a reputation in the Israelite mind for sexual impropriety (e.g., Gen. ch 39; Lev. ch 18; Ezek. 23.1–3, 8, 19, 21, 27). Although Abram is sometimes chastised for passing his beautiful wife off as his sister, it is hard to see how Sarai (whose name becomes "Sarah" in ch 17) would have fared better if he died at the hands of the lecherous and adulterous Egyptians. Ramban, however, makes a powerful theological criticism of Abram, observing that the patriarch "committed a great sin inadvertently" by not trusting in God's protection, leaving the promised land, and subjecting his righteous wife to the possibility of sexual victimization. This, Ramban remarks, will be the cause of his descendants' painful exile in Egypt (Ramban on 12.10). 17: The LORD's infliction of plagues on Pharaoh foreshadows the story of the exodus. Indeed, Abram's experience in 12.10–20 pre-enacts major themes of his descendants' experience at the end of Genesis and in exodus: descent into Egypt because of famine, the death (feared or realized) of the male and survival of the female (cf. Exod. 1.15–22), discussions with Pharaoh, plagues, release, and the acquisition of great wealth (cf. Exod. 12.35). "None of the events that happened to the father failed to happen to the descendants" (Ramban on 12.10, based on Gen. Rab. ad loc.). The wife-sister motif, in this instance ascribed to J, recurs with King Abimelech of Gerar in Pharaoh's place in ch 20 (ascribed to E) and with Isaac and Rebekah, instead of Abraham and Sarah, confronting Abimelech in 26.6–11 (again attributed to J). Thus, no one source repeats the story with the same couple and the same king.

13 From Egypt, Abram went up into the Negeb, with his wife and all that he possessed, together with Lot. ²Now Abram was very rich in cattle, silver, and gold. ³And he proceeded by stages from the Negeb as far as Bethel, to the place where his tent had been formerly, between Bethel and Ai, ⁴the site of the altar that he had built there at first; and there Abram invoked the LORD by name.

⁵Lot, who went with Abram, also had flocks and herds and tents, ⁶so that the land could not support them staying together; for their possessions were so great that they could not remain together. ⁷And there was quarreling between the herdsmen of Abram's cattle and those of Lot's cattle.—The Canaanites and Perizzites were then dwelling in the land.—⁸Abram said to Lot, "Let there be no strife between you and me, between my herdsmen and yours, for we are kinsmen. ⁹Is not the whole land before you? Let us separate:^a if you go north, I will go south; and if you go south, I will go north." ¹⁰Lot looked about him and saw how well watered was the whole plain of the Jordan, all of it—this was before the LORD had destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah—all the way to Zoar, like the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt. ¹¹So Lot chose for himself the whole plain of the Jordan, and Lot journeyed eastward. Thus they parted from each other; ¹²Abram remained in the land of Canaan, while Lot settled in the cities of the Plain, pitching his tents near Sodom. ¹³Now the inhabitants of Sodom were very wicked sinners against the LORD.

¹⁴And the LORD said to Abram, after Lot had parted from him, "Raise your eyes and look out from where you are, to the north and south, to the east and west, ¹⁵for I give all the land that you see to you and your offspring forever. ¹⁶I will make your offspring as the dust of the earth, so that if one can count the dust of the earth, then your offspring too can be counted. ¹⁷Up, walk about the land, through its length and its breadth, for I give it to you." ¹⁸And Abram moved his tent, and came to dwell at the terebinths of Mamre, which are in Hebron; and he built an altar there to the LORD.

13.1–18: Lot and Abram separate. Abram's childlessness (11.30) has raised the suspicion that the "great nation" that God promises to make of him will descend, biologically, from his nephew Lot, whom he may have adopted (11.31; 12.5). Now, the blessing on Abram having worked too well, so to speak, the land cannot support the huge flocks that the two kinsmen have acquired, and they must separate.

8–13: Abram is characteristically generous and conciliatory, offering Lot the first choice of land (vv. 8–9). Lot, by contrast, is self-interested and immediately selects what he mistakenly takes to be the best. The narrator's comparison of his portion to the garden of the LORD, a place of disobedience and curse, and to Egypt, a place of exile and oppression, suggests the short-sightedness of Lot's choice (v. 10). His settling near the archetypal sinners of Sodom contrasts with Abram, who faithfully remained in the land of Canaan (vv. 12–13). 14–18: Whereas Lot "raised his eyes" (v. 10, translated here as "looked about him"), Abram does not do likewise until the LORD so instructs him (v. 14). Whereas Lot "chose for himself" land that the LORD would, in his own lifetime, destroy utterly (v. 11; 19.23–25), the LORD gives Abram and his progeny the land of Canaan forever (v. 15). And whereas Lot pitches his tent near the arch-sinners of Sodom (vv. 12–13), Abram dwells in Hebron and builds an altar to the God he serves. This contrast of the two kinsmen, with Lot serving as a foil for his uncle, will appear again in chs 18–19.

14.1–24: Abram's heroic campaign. 1–9: Both in content and in style, ch 14 is very different from the rest of the story of Abram/Abraham. Its depiction of him as a warrior is unusual. Vv. 1–9 read like an excerpt from a battle report in an ancient Near Eastern royal inscription. Whether or not this indicates a historical basis for the campaigns reported here has been a matter of debate. Although most Sea.^a ⁴Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled. ⁵In the fourteenth year Chedorlaomer and the kings who were with him came and defeated the Rephaim at Ashteroth-karnaim, the Zuzim at Ham, the Emim at Shaveh-kiriathaim, ⁶and the Horites in their hill country of Seir as far as El-paran, which is by the wilderness. ⁷On their way back they came to En-mishpat, which is Kadesh, and subdued all the territory of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites who dwelt in Hazazon-tamar. ⁸Then the king of Sodom, the king of Gomorrah, the king of Admah, the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar, went forth and engaged them in battle in the Valley of Siddim: ⁹King Chedorlaomer of Elam, King Tidal of Goiim, King Amraphel of Shinar, and King Arioch of Ellasar—four kings against those five.

¹⁰Now the Valley of Siddim was dotted with bitumen pits; and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, in their flight, threw themselves into them, while the rest escaped to the hill country. ¹¹[The invaders] seized all the wealth of Sodom and Gomorrah and all their provisions, and went their way. ¹²They also took Lot, the son of Abram's brother, and his possessions, and departed; for he had settled in Sodom.

¹⁷When he returned from defeating Chedorlaomer and the kings with him, the king of Sodom came out to meet him in the Valley of Shaveh, which is the Valley of the King. ¹⁸And King Melchizedek of Salem brought out bread and wine; he was a priest of God Most High.^c ¹⁹He blessed him, saying,

“Blessed be Abram of God Most High,
Creator of heaven and earth.

²⁰ And blessed be God Most High,
Who has delivered your foes into your hand.”

of the nations mentioned can be identified, confirmation of the individuals involved has not been forthcoming. Note that the names of the four Canaanite kings are arranged in two sets of alliterating pairs, Bera-Birsha, Shinab-Shemeber (v. 2), and that at least the names of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah seem to be symbolic (Bera = “in evil,” Birsha = “in wickedness”). 12–13: The narrowing of the vast international perspective to Lot and Sodom and the mention of Abram's dwelling at the terebinths of Mamre connect this anomalous narrative to the previous chapter (cf. 13.10–13, 18). Why Abram is called the Hebrew (if this is the correct translation) is unclear. In the Tanakh, the term seems to refer to an ethnic group (e.g., 39.14; Exod. 1.19; Jonah 1.9). Here, the ethnic group not having as yet appeared, it may be anachronistic. 14: It is surprising that Abram has 318 retainers. Although the previous stories have mentioned his rapid acquisition of wealth (12.16; 13.2), he remains a humbler and more vulnerable figure throughout the other narratives and is never again portrayed with his own army. Sensing the anomaly, an ancient rabbi identifies the 318 retainers with Abram's steward, Eliezer (15.2) alone, the letters of whose name, if assigned numerical equivalents, total 318 (Gen. Rab. 43.2). Since the town of Dan did not acquire that name until long after Abram's time (Josh. 19.47; Judg. 18.27–29), Dan here is also anachronistic, reflecting the situation of a much later (human) author. 16: Separated from Abram, Lot is weak and despoiled (v. 12). Rejoined with Abram (through the latter's heroism), he is restored and recovers his property (cf. 12.3; 19.29). 18–20: The blessing on Abram of Melchizedek, king of Salem (probably Jerusalem, cf. Ps. 76.3), abruptly interrupts the approach of the king of Sodom, which resumes in v. 21. The term God Most High is known from Ugaritic texts of the Late Bronze Age (Ugarit was a Canaanite city along the coast of

²¹Then the king of Sodom said to Abram, "Give me the persons, and take the possessions for yourself." ²²But Abram said to the king of Sodom, "I swear^a to the LORD, God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth: ²³I will not take so much as a thread or a sandal strap of what is yours; you shall not say, 'It is I who made Abram rich.' ²⁴For me, nothing but what my servants have used up; as for the share of the men who went with me—Aner, Eshkol, and Mamre—let them take their share."

15 Some time later, the word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision. He said,
 "Fear not, Abram,
 I am a shield to you;
 Your reward shall be very great."

²But Abram said, "O Lord GOD, what can You give me, seeing that I shall die childless,^b and the one in charge of my household is Dammesek Eliezer!"^b ³Abram said further, "Since You have granted me no offspring, my steward will be my heir." ⁴The word of the LORD came to him in reply, "That one shall not be your heir; none but your very own issue shall be your heir." ⁵He took him outside and said, "Look toward heaven and count the stars, if you are able to count them." And He added, "So shall your offspring be." ⁶And because he put his trust in the LORD, He reckoned it to his merit.

⁷Then He said to him, "I am the LORD who brought you out from Ur of the Chaldeans to assign this land to you as a possession." ⁸And he said, "O Lord GOD, how shall I know that I am to possess it?" ⁹He answered, "Bring Me a three-year-old heifer, a three-year-old she-goat, a three-

what is now Syria). There it is applied to the god El, with whom the LORD is often equated in the Tanakh (e.g., 33.20; Num. 23.8). God Most High is itself a not uncommon epithet of the LORD (e.g., Ps. 47.3). That a foreigner should recognize and revere the God of Israel is not unusual in Genesis, though it is so in much of the rest of the Tanakh. The account of Abram's interaction with the priest-king of Salem may have served to establish the antiquity of Israel's holiest site and the priestly and royal dynasties associated with it. (Jerusalem/Salem is never again mentioned by name in the Torah.) 21–24: Refusing the Sodomite king's offer to split the booty, Abram again displays his generosity and his graciousness. In v. 22, he employs the liturgical language Melchizedek introduced in v. 19, only this time explicitly equating God Most High with the LORD, as Melchizedek did not. Vv. 22–24 underscore Abram's exemplary faith in God: In Abram's view, the true hero of the victorious campaign is not himself, but the LORD.

15.1–21: The LORD promises Abram an heir and a land. This ch falls into two sections, the first

(vv. 1–6) focused on God's promise to provide Abram with an heir who will be his own son, and the second (vv. 7–20) on God's covenantal pledge to redeem Abram's descendants from enslavement abroad and to give them a land. Note that in each section, Abram raises a question that expresses some doubt about the promise (vv. 2–3, 8), and in each case the LORD responds with a renewed promise of staggering proportions (vv. 5, 13, 18–20). 2–3: These difficult verses (v. 3 reads like a gloss on v. 2) may imply that Abram had adopted Eliezer, on the presumption, of course, that he would have no children of his own. In any event, the mention of Abram's childlessness draws our attention again to Sarai's infertility (11.30) and to the pointlessness of all Abram's recent financial and military success in the absence of a son from whom the promised "great nation" (12.2) can descend. 6: With nothing more than an extravagant reiteration of the promise of offspring, Abram drops his question and trusts in the LORD. "And thus you find," observes an ancient midrash about this verse, "that our father Abraham inherited this world and the world-to-come only as a reward for the faith that he had" (Mek. of Rabbi Ishmael, beshallah 7). In the Tanakh, faith does not mean believing in spite of the evidence. It means trusting profoundly in a person, in this case the personal God who has reiterated His promise. 7: The resemblance to the beginning of the Decalogue (Exod. 20.2) further reinforces the sense that Abraham's life foreshadows that of his descendants, the people of Israel, whose enslavement in Egypt and subsequent exodus is about to be predicted (15.13–14). 9–11: The ritual of cutting animals in half and passing between them is found both in the Bible and in Mesopotamia. The parallel in Jer. 34.17–22 makes it likely that the essence of the ritual is a self-curse: Those walking between the pieces will be like the dead animals if they violate the covenant. In the year-old ram, a turtledove, and a young bird.”¹⁰ He brought Him all these and cut them in two, placing each half opposite the other; but he did not cut up the bird.¹¹ Birds of prey came down upon the carcasses, and Abram drove them away.¹² As the sun was about to set, a deep sleep fell upon Abram, and a great dark dread descended upon him.¹³ And He said to Abram, “Know well that your offspring shall be strangers in a land not theirs, and they shall be enslaved and oppressed four hundred years;¹⁴ but I will execute judgment on the nation they shall serve, and in the end they shall go free with great wealth.¹⁵ As for you,

You shall go to your fathers in peace;
You shall be buried at a ripe old age.

¹⁶ And they shall return here in the fourth generation, for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete.”

¹⁷ When the sun set and it was very dark, there appeared a smoking oven, and a flaming torch which passed between those pieces.¹⁸ On that day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, “To your offspring I assign this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates:¹⁹ the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites,²⁰ the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim,²¹ the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.”

16 Sarai, Abram’s wife, had borne him no children. She had an Egyptian maidservant whose name was Hagar.² And Sarai said to Abram, “Look, the LORD has kept me from bearing. Consort with my maid; perhaps I shall have a son³ through her.” And Abram heeded Sarai’s request.³ So Sarai, Abram’s wife, took her maid, Hagar the Egyptian—after Abram had dwelt in the land of Canaan ten years—and gave her to her husband Abram as concubine.⁴ He cohabited with Hagar and she conceived; and when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was lowered in her esteem.⁵ And Sarai said to Abram, “The wrong done me is your fault! I myself put my maid in your bosom; now that she sees that she is pregnant, I case at hand, remarkably, it is the LORD, symbolized by the “smoking oven” and “flaming torch” (15.17) who invokes the self-curse, and nothing is said about any covenantal obligations that Abram is to fulfill. This type of covenant is called a covenant of grant, which is a reward for past loyalty, and does not involve any obligations upon the grantee. The same pattern is prominent in texts about the covenant with David (2 Sam. 7.8–16; Ps. 89.20–37).

12–16: The good news that has marked Abram’s previous interactions with God here gives way to a dark prophecy of his offspring’s separation from the promised land and enslavement in Egypt. Like the birds of prey swooping toward the carcasses of the severed animals (v. 11), horrors will befall the people Israel, but Israel will go free and return to the land. Amorites in v. 16 is used as a general term for all the Canaanite nations. They lose the land not only because of the LORD’s promise to Abram, but also because of their own sin (cf. Lev. 18.24–30).

18–21: These are the maximal borders of the promised land given in the Tanakh. They encompass, for example, much more territory than the borders specified in Num. 34.1–12, and may reflect an ideal that was never realized. The expression “river of Egypt” is unparalleled. It may refer to an eastern arm of the Nile or to the Wadi el-Arish, a body of water between the Negev and the Sinai Peninsula. The Heb words for “river” and for “wadi” are very similar.

16.1–16: A tale of two women.

1–3: God’s uncompromising reiterations of the promise of offspring in the previous chapter (15.4–5, 13–16, 18) render Sarai’s infertility all the more problematic: ten years in Canaan but still no child! Nothing in the promises given to Abram to date having specified the matriarch of the great nation to come, Sarai takes matters into her own hands and, in accordance with documented ancient Near Eastern practice, offers her slave woman as a surrogate mother. Abram (who might have solved his problem by divorcing Sarai but stayed with her nonetheless) accepts. 4: Given the high estimation of motherhood in biblical culture, the status of Sarai and Hagar now reverses. Among the four things at which “the earth shudders,” according to the book of Proverbs, is “a slave-girl who supplants her mistress” (Prov. 30.23). 5–6: Sarai demands justice from Abram, and he gives her a carte blanche. A midrash sees in Sarai’s behavior an object lesson in the dangers of litigiousness: Had she not been so single-mindedly and insensitively preoccupied in am lowered in her esteem. The LORD decide between you and me!"⁶ Abram said to Sarai, "Your maid is in your hands. Deal with her as you think right." Then Sarai treated her harshly, and she ran away from her.

⁷An angel of the LORD found her by a spring of water in the wilderness, the spring on the road to Shur,⁸ and said, "Hagar, slave of Sarai, where have you come from, and where are you going?" And she said, "I am running away from my mistress Sarai."

⁹And the angel of the LORD said to her, "Go back to your mistress, and submit to her harsh treatment."¹⁰ And the angel of the LORD said to her,

"I will greatly increase your offspring,
And they shall be too many to count."

¹¹The angel of the LORD said to her further,

"Behold, you are with child
And shall bear a son;
You shall call him Ishmael,^a

For the LORD has paid heed to your suffering.

¹² He shall be a wild ass of a man;

His hand against everyone,
And everyone's hand against him;

He shall dwell alongside of all his kinsmen."

¹³And she called the LORD who spoke to her, "You Are El-roi,"^b by which she meant, "^cHave I not gone on seeing after He saw me!"^c ¹⁴Therefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi;^d it is between Kadesh and Bered.—¹⁵Hagar bore a son to Abram, and Abram gave the son that Hagar bore him the name Ishmael. ¹⁶Abram was eighty-six years old when Hagar bore Ishmael to Abram.

17 When Abram was ninety-nine years old, the LORD appeared to Abram and said to him, "I am El Shaddai.^e Walk in My ways and be blameless. ²I will establish My covenant between Me and you, and I will make you exceedingly numerous."

³Abram threw himself on his face; and God spoke to him further, ⁴"As for Me, this is My covenant with you: You shall be the father of a multitude of nations. ⁵And demanding justice for herself, her life span would have equaled Abram's. Instead, whereas he lived to 175, she died at 127 (25:7; 23:1) (Gen. Rab. 45:5). 7–9: The flight of the oppressed slave into the wilderness, only to meet a divine being there, foreshadows again the experience of the exodus, prophesied in the previous chapter (15.13–14; cf. Exod. 3.1–2). But this time the oppressor is Israelite, the slave is Egyptian, and the angel of the LORD commands the escapee to return to her cruel mistress and submit to her harsh treatment. God's sympathy with the oppressed is potent in the Tanakh, but so is his election of Israel, and it is the latter that trumps in this instance. 10–12: But God does take note of Hagar's suffering and rewards her with the Abrahamic blessing of offspring . . . too many to count (cf. 13.16; 15.5). Indeed, her high-spirited and militarily formidable son will bear the name Ishmael ("God heeds/heeded") as testimony to the LORD's concern about her affliction. 13–14: The basis for Hagar's exclamation at the end of v. 13 is the idea that one who sees a divine being must die (cf. Exod. 33.20; Judg. 13.22).

17.1–27: An everlasting covenant with Abraham and a promise about Sarah. Source critics identify ch 17 as the P(riestly) version of the covenant with Abraham (of which the J version appears in ch 15). Nothing in ch 17 indicates any awareness that the covenant mandated therein has, in fact, already been established two chapters earlier. In our chapter, the two chief innovations are that the covenant acquires a sign (circumcision, v. 10) and that it is Sarah who, despite her advanced age, shall bear the promised son (vv. 15–16, 19). The closest parallel to ch 17 in style and diction is 9.1–17, the account of the covenant with Noah. 1: El Shaddai is believed to have originally meant "God, the One of the Mountain" and thus to have expressed the association of a deity with his mountain abode well known in Canaanite literature (cf. the "LORD, Him of Sinai" in Judg. 5.5). In the Priestly conception, the four-letter name translated as LORD was disclosed only in the time of Moses (Exod. 6.2–3), and El Shaddai was the name by which God revealed Himself to the patriarchs. 5: The change of name here and in v. 15 signifies a change in destiny: The childless couple you shall no longer be called Abram, but your name shall be Abraham,^a for I make you the father of a multitude of nations. ⁶I will make you exceedingly fertile, and make nations of you; and kings shall come forth from you. ⁷I will maintain My covenant between Me and you, and your offspring to come, as an everlasting covenant throughout the ages, to be God to you and to your offspring to come. ⁸I assign the land you sojourn in to you and your offspring to come, all the land of Canaan, as an everlasting holding. I will be their God."

⁹God further said to Abraham, "As for you, you and your offspring to come throughout the ages shall keep My covenant. ¹⁰Such shall be the covenant between Me and you and your offspring to follow which you shall keep: every male among you shall be circumcised. ¹¹You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and that shall be the sign of the covenant between Me and you. ¹²And throughout the generations, every male among you shall be circumcised at the age of eight days. As for the home-born slave and the one bought from an outsider who is not of your offspring, ¹³they must be circumcised, home-born, and purchased alike. Thus shall My covenant be marked in your flesh as an everlasting pact. ¹⁴And if any male who is uncircumcised fails to circumcise the flesh of his foreskin, that person shall be cut off from his kin; he has broken My covenant."

¹⁵And God said to Abraham, "As for your wife Sarai, you shall not call her Sarai, but her name shall be Sarah.^b ¹⁶I will bless her; indeed, I will give you a son by her. I will bless her so that she shall give rise to nations; rulers of peoples shall issue from her." ¹⁷Abraham threw himself on his face and laughed, as he said to himself, "Can a child be born to a man a hundred years old, or can Sarah bear a child at ninety?" ¹⁸And Abraham said to God, "O that Ishmael might live by Your favor!" ¹⁹God said, "Nevertheless, Sarah your wife shall bear you a son, and you shall name him Isaac;^c and I will maintain My covenant with him as an everlasting covenant for his offspring to come. ²⁰As for Ishmael, I have heeded you.^d I hereby bless him. I will make him fertile and exceedingly numerous. He shall be the father of twelve chieftains, and I will make of him a great nation. ²¹But My covenant I will maintain with Isaac, whom Sarah shall bear to you at this season next year." ²²And when He was done speaking with him, God was gone from Abraham.

will become the ancestors of many nations, including royal dynasties (v. 6). 9–14: Just as the rainbow is the sign of the Noahide covenant (9.12–17), so is circumcision the sign of the Abrahamic. It thus becomes a matter of the highest importance in Judaism. A Second Temple source reports that when the Seleucid King Antiochus IV prohibited circumcision (a favorite target of anti-Semites), Jewish mothers chose martyrdom over neglect of the commandment (1 Macc. 1.60–61). Rabbinic law requires that a (healthy) Jewish boy be circumcised on the eighth day of his life (v. 12) even if it is the Sabbath. Although arguments for the hygienic value of circumcision have been made since the mid-19th century, the Torah knows nothing of these and sees circumcision ("berit milah") as a religious duty incumbent only on Jews. The procedure of hygienic circumcision is not identical to that performed by a "mohel" (ritual circumciser) in a "berit milah."

15–22: Unlike its parallel in ch 15 (J), the P account of the Abrahamic covenant specifies Sarah as the mother of the promised son, and thus makes her indispensable to the fulfillment of the promise to her husband. The natural impossibility of her giving birth at 90 (not to mention her lifelong infertility) only highlights the supernatural character of Isaac and the nation descended from him (v. 17). Ishmael, however, is not dispossessed. Whereas only Isaac inherits the covenant (and its attendant promise of land), Ishmael inherits a large measure of the Abrahamic promise (vv. 20–21; 12.2). Like his nephew Jacob (35.22b–26), he will become the patriarch of a twelve-tribe confederation and thus the father of a great nation (v. 20; cf. 25.12–18; 12.2).

²³Then Abraham took his son Ishmael, and all his homeborn slaves and all those he had bought, every male in Abraham's household, and he circumcised the flesh of their foreskins on that very day, as God had spoken to him. ²⁴Abraham was ninety-nine years old when he circumcised the flesh of his foreskin, ²⁵and his son Ishmael was thirteen years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. ²⁶Thus Abraham and his son Ishmael were circumcised on that very day; ²⁷and all his household, his homeborn slaves and those that had been bought from outsiders, were circumcised with him.

18 The LORD appeared to him by the terebinths of Mamre; he was sitting at the entrance of the tent as the day grew hot. ²Looking up, he saw three men standing near him. As soon as he saw them, he ran from the entrance of the tent to greet them and, bowing to the ground, ³he said, "My lords,^a if it please you, do not go on past your servant. ⁴Let a little water be brought; bathe your feet and recline under the tree. ⁵And let me fetch a morsel of bread that you may refresh yourselves; then go on—seeing that you have come your servant's way." They replied, "Do as you have said."

⁶Abraham hastened into the tent to Sarah, and said, "Quick, three seahs of choice flour! Knead and make cakes!" ⁷Then Abraham ran to the herd, took a calf, tender and choice, and gave it to a servant-boy, who hastened to prepare it. ⁸He took curds and milk and the calf that had been prepared and set these before them; and he waited on them under the tree as they ate.

⁹They said to him, "Where is your wife Sarah?" And he replied, "There, in the tent." ¹⁰Then one said, "I will return to you next year,^b and your wife Sarah shall have a son!" Sarah was listening at the entrance of the tent, which was behind him. ¹¹Now Abraham and Sarah were old, advanced in years; Sarah had stopped having the periods of women. ¹²And Sarah laughed to herself, saying, "Now that I am withered, am I to have enjoyment—with my husband so old?" ¹³Then the LORD said to Abraham, "Why did Sarah laugh, saying, 'Shall I in truth bear a child, old as I am?' ¹⁴Is anything too wondrous for the LORD? I will return to you at the same season next year, and Sarah shall have a son." ¹⁵Sarah lied, saying, "I did not laugh," for she was frightened. But He replied, "You did laugh."

18.1–19.37: The conception of Isaac and the destruction of Sodom. Chs 18 and 19 display a chiasmic structure (ABB'A'): 18.1–15 is the annunciation of Isaac's conception (A); 18.16–33 is the announcement of Sodom's destruction (B); 19.1–29 reports the destruction of Sodom (B'); and 19.30–38 reports Moab's and Ammon's conception (A'). In the process, Abraham emerges again as a heroic figure, one who deeply reveres God yet politely demands justice from Him. Lot is once again (as in ch 13) a foil for Abraham—self-interested, passive, and, finally, victimized. 18.1–2: The relationship of the LORD to the men is unclear. Perhaps, as in some Canaanite literature, we are to imagine a deity accompanied by his two attendants (cf. 22.2). 3–8: Note the contrast between Abraham's self-deprecating language (a little water, a morsel) and the enormous efforts to which he goes to serve his guests. 9–18: Source analysis identifies this as the J parallel to the annunciation of Isaac's birth in ch 17 (P). Note that in 17.17 it is Abraham, whereas in 18.12 it is Sarah, who laughs (and thus gives Isaac his name). 13: The LORD's citation to Abraham of Sarah's monologue in the preceding verse is not quite accurate (old as I am as opposed to with my husband so old). "Great is peace," remarks a rabbi in the Talmud about this point, "for even the Holy One (blessed be He) made a change on account of it," sparing the couple the discord that might have come had Abraham known Sarah's true thought (b. B. M. 87a).

¹⁶The men set out from there and looked down toward Sodom, Abraham walking with them to see them off. ¹⁷Now the LORD had said, "Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do, ¹⁸since Abraham is to become a great and populous nation and all the nations of the earth are to bless themselves by him? ¹⁹For I have singled him out, that he may instruct his children and his posterity to keep the way of the LORD by doing what is just and right, in order that the LORD may bring about for Abraham what He has promised him." ²⁰Then the LORD said, "The outrage of Sodom and Gomorrah is so great, and their sin so grave!" ²¹I will go down to see whether they have acted altogether according to the outcry that has reached Me; if not, I will take note."

²²The men went on from there to Sodom, while Abraham remained standing before the LORD. ²³Abraham came forward and said, "Will You sweep away the innocent along with the guilty? ²⁴What if there should be fifty innocent within the city; will You then wipe out the place and not forgive it for the sake of the innocent fifty who are in it? ²⁵Far be it from You to do such a thing, to bring death upon the innocent as well as the guilty, so that innocent and guilty fare alike. Far be it from You! Shall not the Judge of all the earth deal justly?" ²⁶And the LORD answered, "If I find within the city of Sodom fifty innocent ones, I will forgive the whole place for their sake." ²⁷Abraham spoke up, saying, "Here I venture to speak to my Lord, I who am but dust and ashes: ²⁸What if the fifty innocent should lack five? Will You destroy the whole city for want of the five?" And He answered, "I will not destroy if I find forty-five there." ²⁹But he spoke to Him again, and said, "What if forty should be found there?" And He answered, "I will not do it, for the sake of the forty." ³⁰And he said, "Let not my Lord be angry if I go on: What if thirty should be found there?" And He answered, "I will not do it if I find thirty there." ³¹And he said, "I venture again to speak to my Lord: What if twenty should be found there?" And He answered, "I will not destroy, for the sake of the twenty." ³²And he said, "Let not my Lord be angry if I speak but this last time: What if ten should be found there?" And He answered, "I will not destroy, for the sake of the ten."

³³When the LORD had finished speaking to Abraham, He departed; and Abraham returned to his place.

19 The two angels arrived in Sodom in the evening, as Lot was sitting in the gate of Sodom. When Lot saw them, he rose to greet them and, bowing low with his face to the ground, ²he said, "Please, my lords, turn aside to your servant's house to spend the night, and bathe your feet; then you may be on your way early." But they said, "No, we will spend the night in the square." ³But he urged them strongly, so they turned his way and entered his house. He prepared a feast for them and baked unleavened bread, and they ate.

16–33: In this section, God treats Abraham as a prophet (cf. 20.7), disclosing His plans to him (vv. 17–21; cf. Amos 3.7), and Abraham, like one of the prophets of Israel, eloquently demands justice from God (vv. 23–25; cf. Jer. 12.1–4) and pleads for mercy (Gen. 18.26–32; cf. Amos 7.1–6). 24: Notice that Abraham's demand is not that the guilty be punished and the innocent spared, but rather that the LORD forgive [the entire city] for the sake of the innocent . . . who are in it. The point is made more explicit in v. 26. The underlying theology maintains that the righteous effect deliverance for the entire community. This idea, found elsewhere in the Tanakh (e.g., Jer. 5.1), is prominent in rabbinic literature, where it underlies the notion of the thirty-six righteous individuals for whose sake the world endures. Other biblical texts such as Ezek. 14.12–23; ch 18, however, insist upon individual responsibility and retribution. 27: Recognizing the sovereignty of God and his own subordinate status, Abraham speaks with great deference and scrupulously avoids chutzpah (also in vv. 30–32). The Talmud remarks about this verse, "The Holy One (blessed be He) said to Israel, I deeply love you, for even when I give you abundant greatness, you make yourselves small before Me. I gave greatness to Abraham, and he said I who am but dust and ashes" (b. Hul. 89a). 19.1–3: The contrast between Abraham and Lot (discussed above, on ch 13) continues. Whereas Abraham sees the LORD (18.1), Lot sees only His two angelic attendants (19.1). Whereas Abraham runs to greet his visitors (18.2), Lot only rises (19.1). Whereas Abraham offers a sumptuous feast (18.6–8), Lot offers unleavened bread (19.3).

⁴They had not yet lain down, when the townspeople, the men of Sodom, young and old—all the people to the last man—gathered about the house. ⁵And they shouted to Lot and said to him, "Where are the men who came to you tonight? Bring them out to us, that we may be intimate with them." ⁶So Lot went out to them to the entrance, shut the door behind him, ⁷and said, "I beg you, my friends, do not commit such a wrong. ⁸Look, I have two daughters who have not known a man. Let me bring them out to you, and you may do to them as you please; but do not do anything to these men, since they have come under the shelter of my roof." ⁹But they said, "Stand back! The fellow," they said, "came here as an alien, and already he acts the ruler! Now we will deal worse with you than with them." And they pressed hard against the person of Lot, and moved forward to break the door. ¹⁰But the men stretched out their hands and pulled Lot into the house with them, and shut the door. ¹¹And the people who were at the entrance of the house, young and old, they struck with blinding light, so that they were helpless to find the entrance.

¹²Then the men said to Lot, "Whom else have you here? Sons-in-law, your sons and daughters, or anyone else that you have in the city—bring them out of the place. ¹³For we are about to destroy this place; because the outcry against them before the LORD has become so great that the LORD has sent us to destroy it." ¹⁴So Lot went out and spoke to his sons-in-law, who had married his daughters, and said, "Up, get out of this place, for the LORD is about to destroy the city." But he seemed to his sons-in-law as one who jests.

¹⁵As dawn broke, the angels urged Lot on, saying, "Up, take your wife and your two remaining daughters, lest you be swept away because of the iniquity of the city." ¹⁶Still he delayed. So the men seized his hand, and the hands of his wife and his two daughters—in the LORD's mercy on him—and brought him out and left him outside the city. ¹⁷When they had brought them outside, one said, "Flee for your life! Do not look behind you, nor stop anywhere in the Plain; flee to the hills, lest you be swept away." ¹⁸But Lot said to them, "Oh no, my lord! ¹⁹You

4–5: The story in Judg. 19.10–30 is quite possibly patterned after this episode. The wrong that the men of Sodom attempt involves not only the sin of homosexual conduct (defined as an "abhorrence" in Lev. 18.22), but also a gross violation of the conventions of hospitality. According to one opinion in the Mishnah, a lack of generosity is characteristic of Sodom, as epitomized in the saying, "What is mine is mine; what is yours is yours" (m. 'Avot 5.10; cf. Ezek. 16.46–50). 7–8: Lot's offer of his two daughters is surely connected to the tragicomic scene at the end of the chapter when they get him drunk and engage in incestuous relations with him (19.30–38).

10: Lot's passivity is patent and contrasts with Abraham's daring challenge to God's justice in the previous chapter (18.22–33). Gen. 19.29 will make it explicit that Lot's escape is owing not to his own deeply irresolute character, but to God's reliable commitment to Abraham. 14: Whereas Abraham, taking the impending destruction with the utmost seriousness, functions prophetically in hopes of averting the catastrophe, Lot is taken for a buffoon even by his own sons-in-law and cannot save them. Since Lot's two daughters mentioned in v. 8 are unmarried, these sons-in-law are either engaged to them (so the Vulgate and Rashi) or married to two other daughters, who die in the conflagration along with their husbands. 15–22: Lot's weakness and inconsistency would have done him in, had it not been for the LORD's mercy on him (v. 16). His weakness and self-interest, however, result in the sparing of one town (vv. 18–22), whereas Abraham's audacious and principled intervention (18.22–33) proved unable to save anyone.

have been so gracious to your servant, and have already shown me so much kindness in order to save my life; but I cannot flee to the hills, lest the disaster overtake me and I die.²⁰ Look, that town there is near enough to flee to; it is such a little place! Let me flee there—it is such a little place—and let my life be saved.”²¹ He replied, “Very well, I will grant you this favor too, and I will not annihilate the town of which you have spoken.²² Hurry, flee there, for I cannot do anything until you arrive there.” Hence the town came to be called Zoar.^a ²³As the sun rose upon the earth and Lot entered Zoar,²⁴ the LORD rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah sulfurous fire from the LORD out of heaven.²⁵ He annihilated those cities and the entire Plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities and the vegetation of the ground.²⁶ Lot’s^b wife looked back,^c and she thereupon turned into a pillar of salt.

²⁷Next morning, Abraham hurried to the place where he had stood before the LORD,²⁸ and, looking down toward Sodom and Gomorrah and all the land of the Plain, he saw the smoke of the land rising like the smoke of a kiln.

²⁹Thus it was that, when God destroyed the cities of the Plain and annihilated the cities where Lot dwelt, God was mindful of Abraham and removed Lot from the midst of the upheaval.

³⁰Lot went up from Zoar and settled in the hill country with his two daughters, for he was afraid to dwell in Zoar; and he and his two daughters lived in a cave.³¹ And the older one said to the younger, “Our father is old, and there is not a man on earth to consort with us in the way of all the world.³² Come, let us make our father drink wine, and let us lie with him, that we may maintain life through our father.”³³ That night they made their father drink wine, and the older one went in and lay with her father; he did not know when she lay down or when she rose.³⁴ The next day the older one said to the younger, “See, I lay with Father last night; let us make him drink wine tonight also, and you go and lie with him, that we may maintain life through our father.”³⁵ That night also they made their father drink wine, and the younger one went and lay with him; he did not know when she lay down or when she rose.

³⁶Thus the two daughters of Lot came to be with child by their father.³⁷ The older one bore a son and named him Moab;^d he is the father of the Moabites of today.³⁸ And the younger also bore a son, and she called him Ben-ammi;^e he is the father of the Ammonites of today.

26: The report of the fate of Lot’s wife serves as an explanation for salt formations still evident in the vicinity of the Dead Sea.

30–38: This passage has strong affinities with the story of Ham’s sin in 9.20–27. Here, however, it is possible to construct a defense of Lot’s daughters on the grounds that they genuinely and plausibly believed that the human race would die out unless they bore children from the one surviving male, their hapless father (vv. 31–32). The passage is partly a comic inversion of the opening of this two-chapter section, which centers on the unlikely birth of a son to Sarah (18.1–15). Note the similarity of Sarah’s remark “with my husband so old” (18.12) and the older daughter’s words, our father is old (19.31). Gen. 19.30–38 provides an unflattering account of the origins of two of Israel’s traditional enemies, the Moabites and the Ammonites (cf. Deut. 23.4–7). Nonetheless, a midrash sees in these acts the origins of two of the great mothers of Israel, the Moabite Ruth, ancestor of King David (Ruth 4.13–22), and the Ammonite Naamah, wife of King Solomon and mother of his successor King Rehoboam (1 Kings 14.21). “I found David” (Ps. 89.21), a rabbi observed. “Where did He find him?—in Sodom!” A seed of messianic redemption thus lies in the squalid events of Gen. 19.30–38 (Gen. Rab. 41.4).

20.1–17: Abraham and Sarah in Abimelech’s court. Attributed by source criticism to the Elohist (E), this episode parallels the accounts of Abram and Sarai in Pharaoh’s court in 12.10–20 and of Isaac and Rebekah in Abimelech’s court in 26.1–11 (both ascribed to J). In this version, the emphasis lies on points of law and ethics and on the motivation of the protagonists, and the moral and psychological situation is much more complex than in either of the parallel narratives. 3–7: Even though Abimelech has not consummated his relationship with Sarah (v. 6), he is still culpable for abducting another 20 Abraham journeyed from there to the region of the Negeb and settled between Kadesh and Shur. While he was sojourning in Gerar, ²Abraham said of Sarah his wife, "She is my sister." So King Abimelech of Gerar had Sarah brought to him. ³But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night and said to him, "You are to die because of the woman that you have taken, for she is a married woman." ⁴Now Abimelech had not approached her. He said, "O Lord, will You slay people even though innocent?" ⁵He himself said to me, 'She is my sister!' And she also said, 'He is my brother.' When I did this, my heart was blameless and my hands were clean." ⁶And God said to him in the dream, "I knew that you did this with a blameless heart, and so I kept you from sinning against Me. That was why I did not let you touch her. ⁷Therefore, restore the man's wife—since he is a prophet, he will intercede for you—to save your life. If you fail to restore her, know that you shall die, you and all that are yours."

⁸Early next morning, Abimelech called his servants and told them all that had happened; and the men were greatly frightened. ⁹Then Abimelech summoned Abraham and said to him, "What have you done to us? What wrong have I done that you should bring so great a guilt upon me and my kingdom? You have done to me things that ought not to be done. ¹⁰What, then," Abimelech demanded of Abraham, "was your purpose in doing this thing?" ¹¹"I thought," said Abraham, "surely there is no fear of God in this place, and they will kill me because of my wife. ¹²And besides, she is in truth my sister, my father's daughter though not my mother's; and she became my wife. ¹³So when God made me wander from my father's house, I said to her, 'Let this be the kindness that you shall do me: whatever place we come to, say there of me: He is my brother.'" man's wife (v. 3). V. 7 implies that he may still harbor erotic aspirations toward Sarah and may lack a full understanding of just who Abraham is. 8: The servants' fear gives the lie to Abraham's attempt at self-exoneration on the grounds that "there is no fear of God in this place" (v. 11). 9–10: The image of a Gentile king righteously upbraiding an Israelite prophet (v. 7) for the latter's moral failures is a fine comic inversion of our expectations. 12: Abraham tries a new line of defense based on a semantic ambiguity: Since sister can mean "half-sister" (e.g., Lev. 18.9), he really was not lying. But was Sarah even his half-sister? On the plain sense of the biblical text, there is no evidence that she was. Ibn Ezra thinks that with this claim, Abraham simply "put Abimelech off according to the need of the moment." A midrash, however, identifies Iscah, Abraham's niece (11.29), with Sarah and thus makes Abraham's father Sarah's grandfather (b. Meg. 14a). Since "father" in ancient Heb could also mean grandfather (e.g., 28.13), this midrash serves to validate Abraham's defense. Ramban notes that even if Sarah really was Abraham's half-sister, Abraham was still in the wrong for not mentioning the vastly more important point that she was his wife. 17: "Pray" in biblical Heb very often denotes intercession. Abraham is the first person called a prophet in the Bible, and here functions as a prophetic intercessor, as God predicted he would in v. 7. 18: This conclusion is less surprising than it first seems. It is consistent with 12.17, which speaks of the LORD's afflicting "Pharaoh and his household with mighty plagues" in the analogous situation. It also correlates with the harsh tone that God takes when He first confronts Abimelech in 20.3. Though God recognizes the king's innocence, He also takes special measures to ensure that no untoward act occurs (v. 6).

21 The LORD took note of Sarah as He had promised, and the LORD did for Sarah as He had spoken. ²Sarah conceived and bore a son to Abraham in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken. ³Abraham gave his newborn son, whom Sarah had borne him, the name of Isaac. ⁴And when his son Isaac was eight days old, Abraham circumcised him, as God had commanded him. ⁵Now Abraham was a hundred years old when his son Isaac was born to him. ⁶Sarah said, “God has brought me laughter; everyone who hears will laugh with^a me.” ⁷And she added,

“Who would have said to Abraham
That Sarah would suckle children!
Yet I have borne a son in his old age.”

⁸The child grew up and was weaned, and Abraham held a great feast on the day that Isaac was weaned.

⁹Sarah saw the son whom Hagar the Egyptian had borne to Abraham playing. ¹⁰She said to Abraham, “Cast out that slave-woman and her son, for the son of that slave shall not share in the inheritance with my son Isaac.” ¹¹The matter distressed Abraham greatly, for it concerned a son of his. ¹²But God said to Abraham, “Do not be distressed over the boy or your slave; whatever Sarah tells you, do as she says, for it is through Isaac that offspring shall be continued^b for you. ¹³As for the son of the slave-woman, I will make a nation of him, too, for he is your seed.”

¹⁴Early next morning Abraham took some bread and a skin of water, and gave them to Hagar. He placed them over her shoulder, together with the child, and sent her away. And she wandered about in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. ¹⁵When the water was gone from the skin, she left the child under one of the bushes, ¹⁶and went and sat down at a distance, a bowshot away; for she thought, “Let me not look on as the child dies.” And sitting thus afar, she burst into tears.

21.1–8: The promise to Sarah fulfilled at last. With its heavy emphasis on God’s fulfillment of His promise of a son to Sarah and Abraham (vv. 1–2) and its note that the father circumcised his son on the eighth day in accordance with God’s command (v. 3), this passage marks a major turning point in the story. Despite seemingly insurmountable obstacles (including Abimelech’s abduction of Sarah in the previous chapter), things have gone according to plan. A midrash reports that it was on Rosh Ha-Shanah that The LORD took note of Sarah (b. Rosli Hash. 11a); Gen. ch 21 is thus the Torah reading for the first day of Rosh Ha-Shanah. 5: Abraham’s life divides into seven periods of 25 years each: three of them in Mesopotamia (12.4), one in Canaan without the promised son (21.5), and three in Canaan after Isaac’s birth (25.7). The period of his life in which Abraham lived with the promise unfulfilled, though the shortest, is the pivotal and central one and occupies the most space in the narrative.

21.9–21: The expulsion of Ishmael and Hagar. This passage closely parallels ch 16. Source criticism accounts for this by attributing ch 16 to J, but 21.9–21 to E. Note that the J-name (“LORD”) never appears here; the E-name (“God”) is used throughout.

9: Playing is another pun on Isaac’s name (cf. 17.17; 18.12; 19.14; 26.8). Ishmael was “Isaac-ing,” or “taking Isaac’s place.” 10: Sarah’s omission of the names of the two individuals who have aroused her jealousy indicates the depth of her contempt. 12: Yet it is Sarah’s protection of Isaac’s rights, rather than Abraham’s solicitude for Ishmael, that mediates God’s will in this tragic situation (cf. ch 27). In the Talmud, this is cited as evidence that Sarah was a prophet (b. Meg. 14a). God’s command to Abraham to do as she says uses the same term with which He rebuked Adam for obeying Eve in 3.17—only with the opposite intent.

13: Like 17.20 (and 21.18), this verse stresses that Isaac does not altogether displace Ishmael (whatever Sarah’s designs). Ishmael inherits a substantial portion of the promise to his father Abraham.

14: There is room to wonder just how far Abraham expected Hagar and Ishmael to travel before the bread and skin of water gave out. Did he not realize that by provisioning them so slimly, he was putting them in mortal danger? Ibn Ezra, surmising that Sarah must have determined the provisions, concludes that had Abraham done otherwise, he would have violated God’s command.

15–16: The narrator presupposes a child small enough to be carried by his mother. But since Ishmael was 13 before Isaac was even conceived (17.25), and Isaac’s weaning, which likely occurred at 3, has already taken place (21.8), Ishmael called to Hagar from heaven and said to her, "What troubles you, Hagar? Fear not, for God has heeded the cry of the boy where he is. ¹⁸Come, lift up the boy and hold him by the hand, for I will make a great nation of him." ¹⁹Then God opened her eyes and she saw a well of water. She went and filled the skin with water, and let the boy drink. ²⁰God was with the boy and he grew up; he dwelt in the wilderness and became a bowman. ²¹He lived in the wilderness of Paran; and his mother got a wife for him from the land of Egypt.

²²At that time Abimelech and Phicol, chief of his troops, said to Abraham, "God is with you in everything that you do. ²³Therefore swear to me here by God that you will not deal falsely with me or with my kith and kin, but will deal with me and with the land in which you have sojourned as loyally as I have dealt with you." ²⁴And Abraham said, "I swear it."

²⁵Then Abraham reproached Abimelech for the well of water which the servants of Abimelech had seized. ²⁶But Abimelech said, "I do not know who did this; you did not tell me, nor have I heard of it until today." ²⁷Abraham took sheep and oxen and gave them to Abimelech, and the two of them made a pact. ²⁸Abraham then set seven ewes of the flock by themselves, ²⁹and Abimelech said to Abraham, "What mean these seven ewes which you have set apart?" ³⁰He replied, "You are to accept these seven ewes from me as proof that I dug this well." ³¹Hence that place was called Beer-sheba,^a for there the two of them swore an oath. ³²When they had concluded the pact at Beer-sheba, Abimelech and Phicol, chief of his troops, departed and returned to the land of the Philistines. ³³[Abraham] planted a tamarisk at Beer-sheba, and invoked there the name of the LORD, the Everlasting God. ³⁴And Abraham resided in the land of the Philistines a long time.

22 Some time afterward, God put Abraham to the test. He said to him, "Abraham," and he answered, "Here I am." ²And He said, "Take your son, your favored one, Isaac, whom you love, and go to the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt offering on one of the

is at least 16. In an analysis informed by source criticism, the problem is easily explained, since the present narrative stems from E, but the chronology from P. Calculating Ishmael's age as 27, a midrash takes a different tack: Sarah had cast the evil eye on him and made him ill, thus incapable of walking (Gen. Rab. 53.12).

21.22–34: Abimelech and Abraham make a pact. The focus shifts from the promise of offspring, on whose fulfillment the chapter has so far focused, to the promise of land, as Abraham acquires rights to wells he has dug. Abimelech appears here as another important figure who recognizes Abraham's special status and prospers as a result (cf. 14.18–20; 23.6–16). The passage has close affinities with 26.26–31.

22.1–19: Abraham's last and greatest test. This magnificently told story, known in Judaism as the "Akedah" ("binding"), is one of the gems of biblical narrative. It also comes to occupy a central role in rabbinic theology and eventually to be incorporated into the daily liturgy. Jewish tradition regards the 'Akedah as the tenth and climactic test of Abraham, the first Jew. 1: There is no good English equivalent for the Heb "hineni," translated in this verse as Here I am. The term indicates readiness, alertness, attentiveness, receptivity, and responsiveness to instructions. It serves as a kind of refrain throughout the 'Akedah. Abraham employs it in answer to God here, to Isaac in v. 7 (where it is rendered as "Yes"), and to the angel of the LORD in v. 11. 2: The order of the Heb is "your son, your favored one, the one whom you love, Isaac" and indicates increasing tension. Not only is Isaac the son upon whom Abraham's life has centered; he also loves him. If Abraham did not love Isaac, the commandment to sacrifice him would not have constituted much of a test. The expression go to ("lekh-lekha"), which otherwise occurs only in 12.1, the initial command to Abraham, ties this narrative to the beginning of Abraham's dealings with God. Note also the parallel of on one of the heights that I will point out to you with "to the land that I will show you" (12.1). The location of Moriah (here the name of a land, not a mountain) is unknown. The late biblical book of Chronicles calls the Temple Mount in Jerusalem "Moriah" (2 Chroni-heights that I will point out to you.”³ So early next morning, Abraham saddled his ass and took with him two of his servants and his son Isaac. He split the wood for the burnt offering, and he set out for the place of which God had told him.⁴ On the third day Abraham looked up and saw the place from afar.⁵ Then Abraham said to his servants, “You stay here with the ass. The boy and I will go up there; we will worship and we will return to you.”

⁶ Abraham took the wood for the burnt offering and put it on his son Isaac. He himself took the firestone^a and the knife; and the two walked off together.⁷ Then Isaac said to his father Abraham, “Father!” And he answered, “Yes, my son.” And he said, “Here are the firestone and the wood; but where is the sheep for the burnt offering?”⁸ And Abraham said, “God will see to the sheep for His burnt offering, my son.” And the two of them walked on together.

⁹ They arrived at the place of which God had told him. Abraham built an altar there; he laid out the wood; he bound his son Isaac; he laid him on the altar, on top of the wood.¹⁰ And Abraham picked up the knife to slay his son.¹¹ Then an angel of the LORD called to him from heaven: “Abraham! Abraham!” And he answered, “Here I am.”¹² And he said, “Do not raise your hand against the boy, or do anything to him. For now I know that you fear God, since you have not withheld your son, your favored one, from Me.”¹³ When Abraham looked up, his eye fell upon a^b ram, caught in the thicket by its horns. So Abraham went and took the ram and offered it up as a burnt offering in place of his son.¹⁴ And Abraham named that site

3: The verse resembles 21.14. The expulsion of Ishmael in the preceding chapter and the ’Akedah have much in common, but the latter is the more wrenching, since Abraham is directly commanded to sacrifice his son, and the angelic intervention (vv. 11–12) is thus more surprising. Some have wondered why Abraham, who protested God’s apparent decision to destroy the innocent with the guilty in Sodom (18.22–32), here obeys without objection. The essence of the answer is that the context in ch 18 is forensic, whereas the context of the ’Akedah is sacrificial. A sacrifice is not an execution, and in a sacrificial context the unblemished condition of the one offered does not detract from, but rather commends, the act. 5: Abraham may be concealing the truth from his servants (lest they prevent him from carrying out God’s will), from Isaac (lest he flee), and from himself (lest the frank acknowledgement of his real intention cause his resolve to break). Alternately, he may be expressing his profound trust in God’s promise, casting his faith and hope as a prediction. 6: The image of Isaac’s carrying the wood on which he is to be burned adds enormous power to the story. A midrash relates this to a Roman (not Jewish) method of execution that was sometimes used on Jewish martyrs: “It is like a person who carries his cross on his own shoulder” (Gen. Rab. 56.3). 7: Our ignorance of Isaac’s age makes it difficult to interpret his poignant question. Most rabbinic commentators see him as an adult and thus a willing participant in his own sacrifice—the prototype, that is, of the Jewish martyr. 8: The same possibilities that we outlined for v. 5 apply here as well. The verse ends with the same Heb words with which v. 6 ends. Even after their exchange, father and son still have a single resolve: “the one to bind, and the other to be bound; the one to sacrifice, and the other to be sacrificed” (Gen. Rab. 56.3). 12: In the Tanakh, the “fear of God” denotes an active obedience to the divine will. God is now able to call the last trial of Abraham off because Abraham has demonstrated that this obedience is uppermost for him, surpassing even his paternal love for Isaac. 13: The substitution of a male sheep for the first-born son has parallels in the ancient Near East and foreshadows the story of the paschal lamb (Exod. 12.1–42). Contrary to a widespread misperception, however, the story is not about the superiority of animal to human sacrifice, nor is it a polemic against human sacrifice. Note that God commands the sacrifice of Isaac at the beginning of the story (v. 22.2) and commends and rewards Abraham for being willing to carry it through at the end (vv. 12, 15–18). A midrash has Abraham praying that God “see the blood of this ram as if it were the blood of my son Isaac, the entrails of this ram as if they were the entrails of my son Isaac” (Gen. Rab. 56.9). 14: The name of the otherwise unattested site plays on Abraham’s words in v. 8. This enigmatic verse may connect the site of the ’Akedah

Adonai-yireh,^a whence the present saying, “On the mount of the LORD there is vision.”^b

¹⁵The angel of the LORD called to Abraham a second time from heaven, ¹⁶and said, “By Myself I swear, the LORD declares: Because you have done this and have not withheld your son, your favored one, ¹⁷I will bestow My blessing upon you and make your descendants as numerous as the stars of heaven and the sands on the seashore; and your descendants shall seize the gates of their foes. ¹⁸All the nations of the earth shall bless themselves by your descendants, because you have obeyed My command.” ¹⁹Abraham then returned to his servants, and they departed together for Beer-sheba; and Abraham stayed in Beer-sheba.

²⁰Some time later, Abraham was told, “Milchah too has borne children to your brother Nahor: ²¹Uz the first-born, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram; ²²and Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel”—²³Bethuel being the father of Rebekah. These eight Milchah bore to Nahor, Abraham’s brother. ²⁴And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, also bore children: Tebah, Gaham, Tahash, and Maacah.

23 Sarah’s lifetime—the span of Sarah’s life—came to one hundred and twenty-seven years. ²Sarah died in Kiriath-arba—now Hebron—in the land of Canaan; and Abraham proceeded to mourn for Sarah and to bewail her. ³Then Abraham rose from beside his dead, and spoke to the Hittites, saying, ⁴“I am a resident alien among you; sell me a burial site among you, that I may remove my dead for burial.” ⁵And the Hittites replied to Abraham, saying to him, ⁶“Hear us, my lord: you are the elect of God among us. Bury your dead in the choicest of our burial places; none of us will withhold his burial place from you for burying your dead.” ⁷Thereupon Abraham to the Temple mount (see v. 2 n.). 15–18: The second angelic address conveys the LORD’s final blessing on Abraham, picking up the language of several earlier addresses (cf. 12.3; 13.16; 15.5). Only this time, the earlier promises are reinterpreted as a consequence of the ‘Akedah. Much Jewish prayer calls upon God to remember the ‘Akedah for the benefit of Abraham’s descendants. 19: Too much should not be made of the omission of Isaac. The story closes where it opened (v. 1): with the focus on Abraham alone.

22.20–24: The children of Nahor. Like Abraham’s as yet unborn grandson, Jacob/Israel (35.22b–26), his brother Nahor becomes the patriarch of eight children by his primary wife and four by his secondary wife. Rebekah, who will marry Isaac and thus become the second matriarch of Israel, is the only person of her generation mentioned here (v. 23). One senses that the promise of descendants reiterated and reinterpreted in v. 17 is already on its way to fulfillment. Note the near-identity of v. 17b with the blessing on Rebekah in 24.6o.

23.1–20: Abraham acquires a burial ground. After the climactic episode of the ‘Akedah, all Abraham’s actions are in the nature of putting his affairs in order. In ch 23, he acquires a burial plot for Sarah. In the next chapter, he arranges for a wife for Isaac, and in ch 25, he decrees the distribution of his assets and passes away. 2: Hebron, in the hill country of Judah, 20 miles south-southwest of Jerusalem, was also the first seat of David’s kingship (2 Sam. 2.1–4; 5.1–5). Its principal claim upon the Jewish imagination over the centuries is owing to the biblical reports that not only Sarah but also Abraham, Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob and Leah are buried there (Gen. 23.19; 35.27; 49.29–32; 50.13). 3: The “Hittites” mentioned here probably have no connection to the Indo-European peoples with that name who ruled a mighty empire based in what is now eastern Turkey in the second millennium BCE. Rather, they are more likely to be one of the Canaanite nations (cf. 10.15; 15.20). 4–6: The tension in the story lies in Abraham’s contradictory status. On the one hand, he is but a resident alien without hereditary land-rights or a secure place in the social and legal order. On the other, he is the elect of God (v. 5), to whom the whole land has been promised. Elsewhere in the Tanakh, the entire people Israel is described as resident aliens, living on land owned by God (Lev. 25.23), and the same terms are used to describe the transience of human life and the unworthiness of human beings in the face of God’s bounty (1 Chron. 29.15). 7–8: As a “resident alien,” Abrabowed low to the people of the land, the Hittites,⁸ and he said to them, “If it is your wish that I remove my dead for burial, you must agree to intercede for me with Ephron son of Zohar.⁹ Let him sell me the cave of Machpelah that he owns, which is at the edge of his land. Let him sell it to me, at the full price, for a burial site in your midst.”

¹⁰Ephron was present among the Hittites; so Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the hearing of the Hittites, all who entered the gate of his town,^a saying,¹¹ “No, my lord, hear me: I give you the field and I give you the cave that is in it; I give it to you in the presence of my people. Bury your dead.”¹² Then Abraham bowed low before the people of the land,¹³ and spoke to Ephron in the hearing of the people of the land, saying, “If only you would hear me out! Let me pay the price of the land; accept it from me, that I may bury my dead there.”¹⁴ And Ephron replied to Abraham, saying to him,¹⁵ “My lord, do hear me! A piece of land worth four hundred shekels of silver—what is that between you and me? Go and bury your dead.”¹⁶ Abraham accepted Ephron’s terms. Abraham paid out to Ephron the money that he had named in the hearing of the Hittites—four hundred shekels of silver at the going merchants’ rate.

24 Abraham was now old, advanced in years, and the LORD had blessed Abraham in all things.² And Abraham said to the senior servant of his household, who had charge of all that he owned, “Put your hand under my thigh³ and I will make you swear by the LORD, the God of heaven and the God of the earth, that you will not take a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I dwell,⁴ but will go to the land of my birth and get a wife for my son Isaac.”⁵ And the servant said to him, “What if the woman does not consent to follow me to this land, shall I then take your son back to the land from which you came?”⁶ Abraham answered him, “On no account must you take my son back there!⁷ The ham probably needed the approval of the people of the land (a local council) before he could approach a landowner. 10–16: It would not behoove Abraham, as “the elect of God” (v. 5) and a man of exemplary generosity and hospitality (13.8–9; 18.1–8), to accept a gift (cf. 14.23–24). It is hard to know what the field and its cave were worth on the market. Compared to the 17 shekels that Jeremiah pays to redeem ancestral land (Jer. 32.9), the price of 400 shekels that Abraham paid (v. 16) seems exorbitant, and thus Ephron’s statement in v. 15 seems disingenuous.

24.1–67: Abraham procures a proper wife for Isaac. This sophisticated and beautifully wrought narrative constitutes the longest chapter in Genesis. In certain important ways, it functions as Abraham’s deathbed scene, recapitulating the promise that impelled him on his course and foreshadowing events in the life of his grandson Jacob/Israel, eponymous ancestor of the Jewish people. 2: The rabbinic tradition assumes that Abraham’s senior servant is Eliezer, but the latter is never termed a “servant” (15.2–4), and precise identification of the man, unnamed throughout the story, is unnecessary. Thigh seems to be a euphemism for the male organ (cf. 46.26; Exod. 1.5). Perhaps by touching it, the person swearing the oath calls sterility or loss of children upon himself, should he violate it. The parallel in Gen. 47.29 suggests that ch 24 once functioned as Abraham’s last request. 3: Inter-marriage with the Canaanites, a lethal threat to Abraham’s identity and destiny, is strictly forbidden in Deut. 7.1–4. The prohibition is extended to inter-marriage with other groups in Ezra chs 9–10. 4: The phrasing rather precisely recalls God’s original commandment to Abraham in 12.1 (cf. 24.7, 38, 40). Similarly, Rebekah’s consent (“I will [go],” v. 58) recalls God’s first word to Abraham in that same verse, “Go.” Rebekah thus becomes a kind of

LORD, the God of heaven, who took me from my father's house and from my native land, who promised me on oath, saying, 'I will assign this land to your offspring'—He will send His angel before you, and you will get a wife for my son from there. ⁸ And if the woman does not consent to follow you, you shall then be clear of this oath to me; but do not take my son back there." ⁹ So the servant put his hand under the thigh of his master Abraham and swore to him as bidden.^a

²¹ The man, meanwhile, stood gazing at her, silently wondering whether the LORD had made his errand successful or not. ²² When the camels had finished drinking, the man took a gold nose-ring weighing a half-shekel,^b and two gold bands for her arms, ten shekels in weight. ²³ "Pray tell me," he said, "whose daughter are you? Is there room in your father's house for us to spend the night?" ²⁴ She replied, "I am the daughter of Bethuel the son of Milcah, whom she bore to Nahor." ²⁵ And she went on, "There is plenty of straw^a and feed at home, and also room to spend the night." ²⁶The man bowed low in homage to the LORD ²⁷and said, "Blessed be the LORD, the God of my master Abraham, who has not withheld His steadfast faithfulness from my master. For I have been guided on my errand by the LORD, to the house of my master's kinsmen."

Abraham-figure in her own right. Abraham's dispatch of his senior servant back to his native land and his kinfolk brings his story full circle and ensures his legacy will continue in the next generation.

14: Rashi points out the aptness of the sign that the servant requests: The woman appropriate to marry into Abraham's household must practice the extraordinary kindness and generosity characteristic of her future father-in-law.

²⁸The maiden ran and told all this to her mother's household. ²⁹Now Rebekah had a brother whose name was Laban. Laban ran out to the man at the spring—³⁰ when he saw the nose-ring and the bands on his sister's arms, and when he heard his sister Rebekah say, "Thus the man spoke to me." He went up to the man, who was still standing beside the camels at the spring. ³¹"Come in, O blessed of the LORD," he said, "why do you remain outside, when I have made ready the house and a place for the camels?" ³²So the man entered the house, and the camels were unloaded. The camels were given straw and feed, and water was brought to bathe his feet and the feet of the men with him. ³³But when food was set before him, he said, "I will not eat until I have told my tale." He said, "Speak, then."

³⁴"I am Abraham's servant," he began. ³⁵"The LORD has greatly blessed my master, and he has become rich: He has given him sheep and cattle, silver and gold, male and female slaves, camels and asses. ³⁶And Sarah, my master's wife, bore my master a son in her old age, and he has assigned to him everything he owns. ³⁷Now my master made me swear, saying, 'You shall not get a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites in whose land I dwell; ³⁸but you shall go to my father's house, to my kindred, and get a wife for my son.' ³⁹And I said to my master, 'What if the woman does not follow me?' ⁴⁰He replied to me, 'The LORD, whose ways I have followed, will send His angel with you and make your errand successful; and you will get a wife for my son from my kindred, from my father's house. ⁴¹Thus only shall you be freed from my adjuration: if, when you come to my kindred, they refuse you—only then shall you be freed from my adjuration.'

⁴²"I came today to the spring, and I said: O LORD, God of my master Abraham, if You would indeed grant success to the errand on which I am engaged! ⁴³As I stand by the spring of water, let the young woman who comes out to draw and to whom I say, 'Please, let me drink a little water from your jar,' ⁴⁴and who answers, 'You may drink, and I will also draw for your camels'—let her be the wife whom the LORD has decreed for my master's son.' ⁴⁵I had scarcely finished praying in my heart, when Rebekah came out with her jar on her shoulder, and went down to the spring and drew. And I said to her, 'Please give me a drink.' ⁴⁶She quickly lowered her jar and said, 'Drink, and I will also water your camels.' So I drank, and she also watered the camels. ⁴⁷I inquired of her, 'Whose daughter are you?' And she said, 'The daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor, whom Milcah bore to him.' And I put the ring on her nose and the bands on her arms. ⁴⁸Then I bowed low in homage to the LORD and blessed the LORD, the God of my master Abraham, who led me on the right way to get the daughter of my master's brother for his son. ⁴⁹And now, if you mean to treat my master with true kindness, tell me; and if not, tell me also, that I may turn right or left."

⁵⁰Then Laban and Bethuel answered, "The matter was decreed by the LORD; we cannot speak to you bad or good. ⁵¹Here is Rebekah before you; take her and go, and let her be a wife to your master's son, as the LORD has spoken." ⁵²When Abraham's servant heard their words, he bowed low to the ground before the LORD. ⁵³The servant brought out objects of silver and gold, and garments, and gave them to Rebekah; and he gave presents to her brother and her mother. ⁵⁴Then he and the men with him ate and drank, and they spent the night. When they arose next morning, he said, "Give me leave to go to my master." ⁵⁵But her brother and her mother said, "Let the maiden remain with us ^asome ten days;^a then you may go." ⁵⁶He said to them, "Do not delay me, now that the LORD has made my errand successful. Give me leave that I may go to my master." ⁵⁷And they said, "Let us call the girl and ask for her reply." ⁵⁸They called Rebekah and said to her, "Will you go with this man?" And she said, "I will." ⁵⁹So they sent off their sister Rebekah and her nurse along with Abraham's servant and his men. ⁶⁰And they blessed Rebekah and said to her,

"O sister!
 May you grow
 Into thousands of myriads;
 May your offspring seize
 The gates of their foes."

⁶¹Then Rebekah and her maids arose, mounted the camels, and followed the man. So the servant took Rebekah and went his way.

⁶²Isaac had just come back from the vicinity of Beer-lahai-roi, for he was settled in the region of the Negeb. ⁶³And Isaac went out walking^a in the field toward evening and, looking up, he saw camels approaching. ⁶⁴Raising her eyes, Rebekah saw Isaac. She alighted from the camel ⁶⁵and said to the servant, "Who is that man walking in the field toward us?" And the servant said, "That is my master." So she took her veil and covered herself. ⁶⁶The servant told Isaac all the things that he had done. ⁶⁷Isaac then brought her into the tent of his mother Sarah, and he took Rebekah as his wife. Isaac loved her, and thus found comfort after his mother's death.

25 Abraham took another wife, whose name was Keturah. ²She bore him Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. ³Jokshan begot Sheba and Dedan. The descendants of Dedan were the Asshurim, the Letushim, and the Leummim. ⁴The descendants of Midian were Ephah, Ephher, Enoch,^b Abida, and Eldaah. All these were descendants of Keturah. ⁵Abraham willed all that he owned to Isaac; ⁶but to Abraham's sons by concubines Abraham gave gifts while he was still living, and he sent them away from his son Isaac eastward, to the land of the East.

65: Everywhere else in the chapter, my master refers to Abraham, and Isaac has been called "his/my master's son." Perhaps Abraham has died while his steward was on his sacred mission. If so, the events narrated in 25.1–18 had happened beforehand.

25.1–18: Abraham's death and descendants. Abraham's descendants are here mentioned in the reverse order of their ancestors' births: first the many descendants of Keturah, then Isaac, and, lastly, the line of Ishmael, Abraham's first-born son. This puts Isaac in the central position, and it is he alone who inherits his father's estate, Abraham having honorably discharged his obligations to his other sons through gifts (vv. 5–6). 1: Nothing more is known about the mysterious Keturah. A midrash identifies her with Hagar and explains the name on the grounds that Hagar was "perfumed ('mekuteret') with commandments and good deeds" (Gen. Rab. 61.4). 6: It is possible that by concubines is better translated "by concubinage" and thus refers only to the sons of Keturah listed in v. 2. Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam, northern France, 12th century) thinks the concubines are Hagar and Keturah. 7: If Abraham was 100 when Isaac was born (21.5), Isaac 60 when Esau and Jacob were born (26.26), and Abraham died at 175 (25.7), then Abraham passed away only when his twin grandsons were 15. This suggests that the notice of Abraham's death is premature here. Source critics resolve the problem by attributing the chronology to P, but the bulk of the ancestral narrative to J. ¹⁹This is the story of Isaac, son of Abraham. Abraham begot Isaac. ²⁰Isaac was forty years old when he took to wife Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel the Aramean of Paddan-aram, sister of Laban the Aramean. ²¹Isaac pleaded with the LORD on behalf of his wife, because she was barren; and the LORD responded to his plea, and his wife Rebekah conceived. ²²But the children struggled in her womb, and she said, "If so, why do I exist?"^a She went to inquire of the LORD, ²³and the LORD answered her,

"Two nations are in your womb,
Two separate peoples shall issue from your body;
One people shall be mightier than the other,
And the older shall serve the younger."

²⁴When her time to give birth was at hand, there were twins in her womb. ²⁵The first one emerged red, like a hairy mantle all over; so they named him Esau.^b ²⁶Then his brother emerged, holding on to the heel of Esau; so they named him Jacob.^c Isaac was sixty years old when they were born.

²⁷When the boys grew up, Esau became a skillful hunter, a man of the outdoors; but Jacob was a mild man who stayed in camp. ²⁸Isaac favored Esau because ^dhe had a taste for game;^d but Rebekah favored Jacob. ²⁹Once when Jacob was cooking a stew, Esau came in from the open, famished. ³⁰And Esau said to Jacob, "Give me some of that red stuff to gulp down, for I am famished"—which is why he was named Edom.^e ³¹Jacob said, "First sell me your birthright." ³²And Esau said, "I am at the point of death, so of what use is my birthright to me?" ³³But Jacob said, "Swear to me first." So he swore to him, and sold his birthright to Jacob. ³⁴Jacob then gave Esau bread and lentil stew; he ate and drank, and he rose and went away. Thus did Esau spurn the birthright.

26 There was a famine in the land—aside from the previous famine that had occurred in the days of Abraham—and Isaac went to Abimelech, king of the Philistines, in Gerar. ²The LORD had appeared to him and said, "Do not go down to Egypt; stay in the land which I point out to you. ³Reside in this land, and I will be with you and bless you; I

25.19–34: Birth and birthright.

This passage tells of the birth of Esau and Jacob, and of the former's ominous sale of his status as first-born to the latter.

21: Rebekah's barrenness puts her again in line of succession to her late mother-in-law, Sarah (cf. 24.67), though the narrative about Rebekah is much more compressed and much less complex than the corresponding story of Sarai/Sarah (cf. ch 16). The "barren mother" is a common motif in special birth stories. Compare also Rachel (Gen. ch 30) and Hannah (1 Sam. ch 1). A midrash sees in God's response to Isaac's plea an object lesson in the power of prayer to move God from anger to mercy (b. Yebam. 64a). 25: In addition to the pun on Seir and "se'ar" ("hair"), there is also a play on red ("admoni") and "Edom," another name for Esau and the kingdom descended from him. (See translator's note b and 36.9.) 26: Jacob's naming (as usual in the Tanakh) is based on a folk etymology. "Jacob" probably derives from "y-'k-b-'l," "may God protect."

26.1–33: Episodes in the life of Isaac.

In comparison with the two larger-than-life figures who are his father (Abraham) and his son (Jacob), there is remarkably little narrative about Isaac. Indeed, he generally appears passive and, in places, even comic (e.g., 26.8–9; 27.18–23). Gen. 26.1–33 is the only collection of biblical narrative cen-

will assign all these lands to you and to your heirs, fulfilling the oath that I swore to your father Abraham. ⁴I will make your heirs as numerous as the stars of heaven, and assign to your heirs all these lands, so that all the nations of the earth shall bless themselves by your heirs—⁵inasmuch as Abraham obeyed Me and kept My charge: My commandments, My laws, and My teachings.”

⁶So Isaac stayed in Gerar. ⁷When the men of the place asked him about his wife, he said, “She is my sister,” for he was afraid to say “my wife,” thinking, “The men of the place might kill me on account of Rebekah, for she is beautiful.” ⁸When some time had passed, Abimelech king of the Philistines, looking out of the window, saw Isaac fondling his wife Rebekah. ⁹Abimelech sent for Isaac and said, “So she is your wife! Why then did you say: ‘She is my sister?’” Isaac said to him, “Because I thought I might lose my life on account of her.” ¹⁰Abimelech said, “What have you done to us! One of the people might have lain with your wife, and you would have brought guilt upon us.” ¹¹Abimelech then charged all the people, saying, “Anyone who molests this man or his wife shall be put to death.”

trally devoted to the middle patriarch. 1–5: Here, the LORD affirms the continuity of Isaac with his father, whose experience he in part relives (vv. 1–2; cf. 12.10; 20.1–18). Isaac will fall heir to the Abrahamic promise of offspring, blessing, and land (vv. 3–5; cf. 12.1–3, 7; 15.5). V. 5 may be a reference to the ‘Akedah (cf. 22.15–18), the only explicit one in the Tanakh outside of ch 22. In Judaism, Abraham is generally thought to have exemplified not only faith in God and love for Him but also meticulous obedience to His commands. Traditional commentators differ, however, on the extent of the charge, commandments, laws, and teachings that Abraham had observed, to his son’s benefit (v. 5). Rashi, following strong rabbinic precedents (e.g., b. Yoma 28b), thinks that Abraham observed all categories of Jewish law, even the Oral Torah. His grandson, Rashbam, more dedicated to the plain sense, thinks that Abraham observed only those commandments that had been communicated to him in Genesis or that human reason can intuit without revelation. 6–11: This is the last of the three stories of a patriarch’s attempting unsuccessfully to pass his wife off as his sister (cf. 12.10–20; 20.1–18), and the only one in which the matriarch is never brought into the foreign king’s quarters. A note of comedy relieves its blandness in comparison with the other two when Abimelech sees Isaac (“yitzḥaq”) “fondling” (“metzahaq”) Rebekah and draws the all too obvious conclusion (vv. 8–9). Is Isaac here overconfident, careless, or foolish? 12–33: The image of Isaac as a landholder and farmer (v. 12) is in tension with the picture of him as a semi-nomad (cf. v. 17). His acquisition of vast wealth (vv. 13–14) underscores the continuity with his father (cf. 12.5, 16; 13.2), just as the ensuing conflict with the Philistines (vv. 15–22) recalls the prologue to the separation of Abraham and Lot (13.5–7). Most historians consider the reference to Philistines here (and in v. 1)

²³From there he went up to Beer-sheba. ²⁴That night the LORD appeared to him and said, "I am the God of your father Abraham. Fear not, for I am with you, and I will bless you and increase your offspring for the sake of My servant Abraham." ²⁵So he built an altar there and invoked the LORD by name. Isaac pitched his tent there and his servants started digging a well. ²⁶And Abimelech came to him from Gerar, with Ahuzzath his councilor and Phicol chief of his troops. ²⁷Isaac said to them, "Why have you come to me, seeing that you have been hostile to me and have driven me away from you?" ²⁸And they said, "We now see plainly that the LORD has been with you, and we thought: Let there be a sworn treaty between our two parties, between you and us. Let us make a pact with you ²⁹that you will not do us harm, just as we have not molested you but have always dealt kindly with you and sent you away in peace. From now on, be you blessed of the LORD!" ³⁰Then he made for them a feast, and they ate and drank.

³¹Early in the morning, they exchanged oaths. Isaac then bade them farewell, and they departed from him in peace. ³²That same day Isaac's servants came and told him about the well they had dug, and said to him, "We have found water!" ³³He named it Shibah;^a therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba to this day.

27 When Isaac was old and his eyes were too dim to see, he called his older son Esau and said to him, "My son." He answered, "Here I am." ²And he said, "I am old now, and I do not know how soon I may die. ³Take your gear, your quiver and bow, and go out into the open and hunt me some game. ⁴Then prepare a dish for me such as I like, and bring it to me to eat, so that I may give you my innermost blessing before I die."

anachronistic, since the Philistines did not arrive in Canaan until about 1200 BCE. The dispute about the wells and the covenant-making ceremony that resolves it (vv. 17–33) are highly reminiscent of King Abimelech's previous dealing with Isaac's father in 21.22–32. Incidentally, nothing in this episode, or in the rest of the chapter, gives any indication that the couple's twins have already been born (25.21–26), and one can imagine that the episode once stood elsewhere.

26.34–35: Esau intermarries.

Source critics attribute these verses to P and see them as the prologue to 27.46–28.9, the Priestly explanation for Jacob's flight to his uncle's homestead. In the genealogical notice in 36.2–4, Elon's daughter is not Basemath but Adah; Basemath is the daughter of Ishmael, not Elon; and Judith is absent altogether. Esau's intermarriages are a jarring contrast to Abraham's strenuous effort to find a wife for Isaac from within the clan (ch 24) and demonstrate Esau's unworthiness to serve as the next figure in the patriarchal line.

This story, one of the masterpieces of biblical narrative artistry, exhibits both charming comedy and intense pathos. Jacob, having purchased his brother's status of first-born in a questionable fashion (25.29–34), acquires his paternal blessing as well. He does so in a way that advances the divine plan but also utilizes deceit and brings hardship on all involved. 1–4: Gen. 25:28 has already established Isaac's preference for Esau, who, as the first-born son (27.19), should receive his father's prime blessing anyway. Isaac's instruction to hunt him some game recalls the rather shallow reason for his favoring the uncouth Esau. There may also be a notion here that eating will fortify his innermost self, that is, his life-force ("nefesh," v. 4) so that he may impart a more powerful blessing to his son. Since Isaac is blind, this chapter emphasizes his other senses. He identifies "Esau" by touching his hands, tasting him through a kiss, and smelling his clothing. His sense of hearing tells him that something may be amiss. Esau's response to his aged father's summons, Here I am (v. 1), recalls the refrain of the 'Akedah (22.1, 7, 11), another but very different story of a loving father and the near-loss of his beloved son. 5–13: Once again, it is the mother who arranges the fulfillment of the divine plan, to the benefit of the second-born son, and in a manner

Esau. When Esau had gone out into the open to hunt game to bring home, ⁶Rebekah said to her son Jacob, “I overheard your father speaking to your brother Esau, saying, ⁷‘Bring me some game and prepare a dish for me to eat, that I may bless you, with the LORD’s approval, before I die.’ ⁸Now, my son, listen carefully as I instruct you. ⁹Go to the flock and fetch me two choice kids, and I will make of them a dish for your father, such as he likes. ¹⁰Then take it to your father to eat, in order that he may bless you before he dies.” ¹¹Jacob answered his mother Rebekah, “But my brother Esau is a hairy man and I am smooth-skinned. ¹²If my father touches me, I shall appear to him as a trickster and bring upon myself a curse, not a blessing.” ¹³But his mother said to him, “Your curse, my son, be upon me! Just do as I say and go fetch them for me.”

¹⁸He went to his father and said, “Father.” And he said, “Yes, which of my sons are you?” ¹⁹Jacob said to his father, “I am Esau, your first-born; I have done as you told me. Pray sit up and eat of my game, that you may give me your innermost blessing.” ²⁰Isaac said to his son, “How did you succeed so quickly, my son?” And he said, “Because the LORD your God granted me good fortune.” ²¹Isaac said to Jacob, “Come closer that I may feel you, my son—whether you are really my son Esau or not.” ²²So Jacob drew close to his father Isaac, who felt him and wondered. “The voice is the voice of Jacob, yet the hands are the hands of Esau.” ²³He did not recognize him, because his hands were hairy like those of his brother Esau; and so he blessed him.

that is morally offensive to a high degree (cf. 21.9–13). It is curious, however, that in seeking to allay her favored son’s worry (vv. 11–13), Rebekah never mentions the prenatal oracle that announced the LORD’s preference for the younger twin (25.23). Rashbam thinks it was trust in that oracle that enabled her to discount the curse Jacob fears. But note that the Tanakh gives no indication that Jacob ever saw his mother alive again after this disquieting episode. 18–27: The passage is full of suspense and high drama, as Isaac uses his senses of touch, hearing, taste, and smell to ascertain that it is Esau rather than an impersonator who is serving him the tasty game. There is probably also a note of broad humor in vv. 22–23. Should not a blind man have put more trust in his hearing than in his touch, and just how hairy was Esau that the skin of a goat could be mistaken for his hands? Jacob’s answer in v. 20 beautifully encapsulates the dual causation that drives this narrative. On the one hand, he is lying to his father. On the other, he is expressing, perhaps unwittingly, the fact that it is God’s preference, not his father’s, that has arranged his unlikely success.

Abundance of new grain and wine.
 29 Let peoples serve you,
 And nations bow to you;
 Be master over your brothers,
 And let your mother's sons bow to you.
 Cursed be they who curse you,
 Blessed they who bless you."

³⁰No sooner had Jacob left the presence of his father Isaac—after Isaac had finished blessing Jacob—than his brother Esau came back from his hunt. ³¹He too prepared a dish and brought it to his father. And he said to his father, "Let my father sit up and eat of his son's game, so that you may give me your innermost blessing." ³²His father Isaac said to him, "Who are you?" And he said, "I am your son, Esau, your first-born!" ³³Isaac was seized with very violent trembling. "Who was it then," he demanded, "that hunted game and brought it to me? Moreover, I ate of it before you came, and I blessed him; now he must remain blessed!" ³⁴When Esau heard his father's words, he burst into wild and bitter sobbing, and said to his father, "Bless me too, Father!" ³⁵But he answered, "Your brother came with guile and took away your blessing." ³⁶[Esau] said, "Was he, then, named Jacob that he might supplant me^a these two times? First he took away my birthright and now he has taken away my blessing!" And he added, "Have you not reserved a blessing for me?" ³⁷Isaac answered, saying to Esau, "But I have made him master over you: I have given him all his brothers for servants, and sustained him with grain and wine. What, then, can I still do for you, my son?" ³⁸And Esau said to his father, "Have you but one blessing, Father? Bless me too, Father!" And Esau wept aloud. ³⁹And his father Isaac answered, saying to him,
 "See, your abode shall ^benjoy the fat of the earth
 And ^bthe dew of heaven above.
 40 Yet by your sword you shall live,
 And you shall serve your brother;
 But when you grow restive,
 You shall break his yoke from your neck."

⁴¹Now Esau harbored a grudge against Jacob because of the blessing which his father had given him, and Esau said to himself, "Let but the mourning period of my father come, and I will kill my brother Jacob." ⁴²When the words of her older son Esau were reported to Rebekah, she sent for her younger son Jacob and said to him, "Your brother Esau is consoling himself by planning to kill you. ⁴³Now,

29: Jacob's mastery over his brothers (the plural need not be taken literally) is probably connected to King David's subjection of the Edomites (2 Sam. 8.13–14). Note also the Abrahamic resonance of the end of the verse (cf. Gen. 12.3). 34–35: The pathos is palpable, and the sympathy for Esau is in marked contrast to exilic and postexilic literature in which Esau/Edom epitomizes evil and betrayal (e.g., Ps. 137.7; Jer. 49.7–22; Obadiah; Isa. 34.5; 63.1–6). In rabbinic and medieval Jewish literature, he becomes a cipher for the Roman empire and then Christendom, and the highly pejorative portrayal of him there reflects the painful experience of the Jews at the hands of those powers. 36: Birthright ("bekhora") and blessing ("berakha") have the same three consonants. Though continuing to believe passionately in the chosenness of Jacob/Israel, the prophet Jeremiah sees in Jacob's deceit a paradigm of the chosen people at their worst and just cause for God's impending punishment (Jer. 9.3–8). 37: The reversal of the order of fertility and domination of vv. 28–29 reflects the reversal of Esau's expectations. 39–40: Like Ishmael (17.20; 21.13, 18), Esau receives a blessing that is formidable but inferior to his younger brother's. The prophecy of Esau's breaking free from subjugation to Jacob may be connected to Edom's successful rebellions in the 9th or 8th centuries (2 Kings 8.20–22; 2 Chron. 28.17). 41–45: Esau's murderous grudge (v. 41) recalls the incident of Cain and Abel (4.3–8); less directly, Rebekah's intervention foreshadows tragic events in the life of David (2 Sam. 14.1–24, esp. vv. 4–7).

my son, listen to me. Flee at once to Haran, to my brother Laban. ⁴⁴Stay with him a while, until your brother's fury subsides—⁴⁵until your brother's anger against you subsides—and he forgets what you have done to him. Then I will fetch you from there. Let me not lose you both in one day!"

⁴⁶Rebekah said to Isaac, "I am disgusted with my life because of the Hittite women. If Jacob marries a Hittite woman like these, from among the native women, 28 what good will life be to me?" ¹So Isaac sent for Jacob and blessed him. He instructed him, saying, "You shall not take a wife from among the Canaanite women. ²Up, go to Paddan-aram, to the house of Bethuel, your mother's father, and take a wife there from among the daughters of Laban, your mother's brother, ³May El Shaddai^a bless you, make you fertile and numerous, so that you become an assembly of peoples. ⁴May He grant the blessing of Abraham to you and your offspring, that you may possess the land where you are sojourning, which God assigned to Abraham."

¹⁰Jacob left Beer-sheba, and set out for Haran. ¹¹He came upon a certain place and stopped there for the night, for the sun had set. Taking one of the stones of that place, he put it under his head and lay down in that place. ¹²He had a dream; a stairway^b was set on the ground and its top reached to the sky, and angels of God were going up and down on it. ¹³And the LORD was standing beside him and He said, "I am the LORD, the God of your father Abraham and the God of Isaac: the ground on which you are lying I will assign to you and to your offspring. ¹⁴Your descendants shall be as the dust of the earth; you shall spread out

27.46–28.9: Isaac blesses Jacob (again) and Jacob departs. Most source-critical analysts view this passage as the continuation of 26.34–35 and thus see in it the P version of Isaac's blessing of Jacob and the latter's flight to his uncle Laban (27.1–45 is attributed to J). In this version, Jacob does not flee for his life from a brother he has swindled; rather, he dutifully follows the family tradition of finding a wife from within the clan, rather than intermarrying, as Esau had done. Appended to 27.1–45, however, our passage takes on a new and more complex meaning. The distaste for Hittite women (26.34–35) that Isaac and Rebekah both truly share becomes the pretext for her saving her favorite son from his vindictive brother's rage. 28.3: On El Shaddai, see 17.1 n. 8–9: It seems fitting that the one nonfavored older brother (a hunter, 25.27) marries into the immediate family of the other (a bowman, 21.20). A midrash points out that Esau's attempt at rectification missed the point: "If he had put out the first wives, [he would have been all right]. But in addition to the wives he had—one source of pain upon another!" (Gen. Rab. 67.13). Mahalath is missing from the list of Esau's wives in 36.2–3, where Basemath is Ishmael's daughter (cf. 26.34).

28.10–22: Jacob's dream at Bethel. This passage, which according to most source critics is a combination of J and E, is the continuation of 27.45, and records Jacob's first direct encounter with God. In a dream, he sees a "stairway" or ramp of the sort with which Mesopotamian temple towers (ziggurats) were equipped and atop which the deity was thought to appear to communicate to his worshippers (28.12). The LORD assures Jacob that he will inherit the patriarchal promise, thus demonstrating that, however deceitfully it was gotten, Isaac's blessing on him conforms to God's will and that Jacob's exile will be temporary (vv. 13–15). Waking, Jacob re-to the west and to the east, to the north and to the south. All the families of the earth shall bless themselves by you and your descendants. ¹⁵Remember, I am with you: I will protect you wherever you go and will bring you back to this land. I will not leave you until I have done what I have promised you.”

¹⁶Jacob awoke from his sleep and said, “Surely the LORD is present in this place, and I did not know it!” ¹⁷Shaken, he said, “How awesome is this place! This is none other than the abode of God, and that is the gateway to heaven.” ¹⁸Early in the morning, Jacob took the stone that he had put under his head and set it up as a pillar and poured oil on the top of it. ¹⁹He named that site Bethel;^a but previously the name of the city had been Luz.

²⁰Jacob then made a vow, saying, “If God remains with me, if He protects me on this journey that I am making, and gives me bread to eat and clothing to wear, ²¹and if I return safe to my father’s house—the LORD shall be my God. ²²And this stone, which I have set up as a pillar, shall be God’s abode; and of all that You give me, I will set aside a tithe for You.”

29 Jacob ^bresumed his journey^b and came to the land of the Easterners. ²There before his eyes was a well in the open. Three flocks of sheep were lying there beside it, for the flocks were watered from that well. The stone on the mouth of the well was large. ³When all the flocks were gathered there, the stone would be rolled from the mouth of the well and the sheep watered; then the stone would be put back in its place on the mouth of the well.

⁴Jacob said to them, “My friends, where are you from?” And they said, “We are from Haran.” ⁵He said to them, “Do you know Laban the son of Nahor?” And they said, “Yes, we do.” ⁶He continued, “Is he well?” They answered, “Yes, he is; and there is his daughter Rachel, coming with the flock.” ⁷He said, “It is still broad daylight, too early to round up the animals; water the flock and take them to pasture.” ⁸But they said, “We cannot, until all the flocks are rounded up; then the stone is rolled off the mouth of the well and we water the sheep.”

alizes the awesomeness of the place and consecrates it as a sanctuary (vv. 16–19), vowing to give God a tithe if He protects him as He has promised (vv. 20–22).

18: The Tanakh frequently associates sacred pillars, an important element of ancient worship, especially in Canaan, with idolatry (e.g., Deut. 12.3; 16.22; Hos. 10.1–2; Mic. 5.12). Nonetheless, Moses sets up twelve of them at the foot of Mount Sinai (Exod. 24.4), and Joshua erects one in the temple at Shechem (Josh. 24.26). Ibn Ezra (here and on Deut. 16.22) thinks that sacred pillars were prohibited only if they were erected to the honor of other gods. More likely is a midrash that sees in the practice a vestige of an early form of worship that was later proscribed altogether (Sifre Deut. 146; see also Rashi on Deut. 16.22). 19: Given the importance of Bethel in Israelite worship and the positive evaluation of it in several biblical texts (e.g., Judg. 20.18, 26–28; 21.2–4; 1 Sam. 7.16), it is appropriate that its foundation should be attributed to the patriarch Jacob. Nonetheless, after King Jeroboam I established a temple there to rival the one in Jerusalem, some texts loyal to the latter saw in Bethel a hotbed of idolatry and condemned it roundly (e.g., 1 Kings 12.25–13.34). Our passage presumes that it was the site of a legitimate temple.

22: Jacob’s pledge of a tithe at Bethel may thus have functioned as a counterpoint to Abraham’s gift of a tithe at Salem (Jerusalem) in 14.20.

29.1–30: Jacob marries twice. In a scene remarkably similar to the one in ch 24, when Abraham’s servant finds a wife for Isaac, Jacob no sooner arrives in Haran than he encounters Laban’s daughter, Rachel, and begins the negotiations to marry her. But this time things do not go smoothly, and Jacob the trickster must drink a hefty dose of his own bitter medicine. 3: The implication is that it would take the collective strength of all the shepherds to roll the rock off the well. Jacob, energized by the sight of his cousin, will soon do so alone (v. 10). 6: The immediate appearance of Rachel recalls that of Rebekah in 24.15 and again suggests a hidden hand behind the events. 10: The future bridegroom’s heroism at the well foreshadows Moses’ scene of the victimized daughters of Reuel in Exod. 2.16–22.

when Jacob saw Rachel, the daughter of his uncle^a Laban, and the flock of his uncle Laban, Jacob went up and rolled the stone off the mouth of the well, and watered the flock of his uncle Laban. ¹¹Then Jacob kissed Rachel, and broke into tears. ¹²Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's kinsman, that he was Rebekah's son; and she ran and told her father. ¹³On hearing the news of his sister's son Jacob, Laban ran to greet him; he embraced him and kissed him, and took him into his house. He told Laban all that had happened, ¹⁴and Laban said to him, "You are truly my bone and flesh."

When he had stayed with him a month's time, ¹⁵Laban said to Jacob, "Just because you are a kinsman, should you serve me for nothing? Tell me, what shall your wages be?" ¹⁶Now Laban had two daughters; the name of the older one was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel. ¹⁷Leah had weak eyes; Rachel was shapely and beautiful. ¹⁸Jacob loved Rachel; so he answered, "I will serve you seven years for your younger daughter Rachel." ¹⁹Laban said, "Better that I give her to you than that I should give her to an outsider. Stay with me." ²⁰So Jacob served seven years for Rachel and they seemed to him but a few days because of his love for her.

²¹Then Jacob said to Laban, "Give me my wife, for my time is fulfilled, that I may cohabit with her." ²²And Laban gathered all the people of the place and made a feast. ²³When evening came, he took his daughter Leah and brought her to him; and he cohabited with her.—²⁴Laban had given his maidservant Zilpah to his daughter Leah as her maid.—²⁵When morning came, there was Leah! So he said to Laban, "What is this you have done to me? I was in your service for Rachel! Why did you deceive me?" ²⁶Laban said, "It is not the practice in our place to marry off the younger before the older. ²⁷Wait until the bridal week of this one is over and we will give you that one too, provided you serve me another seven years." ²⁸Jacob did so; he waited out the bridal week of the one, and then he gave him his daughter Rachel as wife.—²⁹Laban had given his maidservant Bilhah to his daughter Rachel as her maid.—³⁰And Jacob cohabited with Rachel also; indeed, he loved Rachel more than Leah. And he served him another seven years.

³¹The LORD saw that Leah was unloved and he opened her womb; but Rachel was barren. ³²Leah conceived and bore a son, and named him Reuben;^b for she declared, "It

12: Rachel's running to Laban recalls Rebekah's (24.28) and adds to our mounting suspicion that she is to be the next matriarch of the chosen family. But, as we shall soon see, things are not so simple.

18: This is one of the very few explicit references to romantic love in the Tanakh. Interestingly, the subject of one of the others is Jacob's father, Isaac, who loved Rebekah (24.67). 25–26: What is this you have done to me? echoes Pharaoh's and Abimelech's indignation after Abraham and Isaac tried to pass their wives off as their sisters (12.18; 20.9; 26.10). Jacob's accusation of deceit is richly ironic in light of his own deceit in passing himself off as his older brother (27.35). Similarly, Laban's answer in v. 26 is an exquisitely ironic reaffirmation of the principle that Jacob has violated in buying Esau's birthright (25.29–34) and defrauding him of his father's highest blessing (27.1–45). Having acquired his older brother's birthright for a bowl of lentils, he now proves unable to acquire the woman he loves even with seven years of harsh labor (31.38–41). A remarkable midrash in the Talmud speaks of Rachel's selflessness and her concern to spare her unloved older sister humiliation. Jacob, the midrash reports, had given Rachel certain tokens by which he could identify her, lest her deceitful father succeed in substituting Leah. Worried that her sister would then be put to shame in her wedding bed, she handed the tokens over to Leah. In reward for Rachel's self-effacement, the midrash concludes, King Saul was numbered among her descendants (b. Meg. 13b).

29.31–30.24: The origins of the tribes of Israel. This passage accounts for the birth of twelve of Jacob's thirteen children and eleven of his twelve sons. Only Benjamin, who will be born after the return to Canaan (35.16–20), is missing from the roster of the eponymous ancestors of the twelve tribes of Israel (in some lists, Levi is missing, and Joseph means: 'The LORD has seen^a my affliction'; it also means: 'Now my husband will love me.' "^b 33 She conceived again and bore a son, and declared, "This is because the LORD heard^c that I was unloved and has given me this one also"; so she named him Simeon. 34 Again she conceived and bore a son and declared, "This time my husband will become attached^d to me, for I have borne him three sons." Therefore he was named Levi. 35 She conceived again and bore a son, and declared, "This time I will praise^e the LORD." Therefore she named him Judah. Then she stopped bearing.

30 When Rachel saw that she had borne Jacob no children, she became envious of her sister; and Rachel said to Jacob, "Give me children, or I shall die." 2 Jacob was incensed at Rachel, and said, "Can I take the place of God, who has denied you fruit of the womb?" 3 She said, "Here is my maid Bilhah. Consort with her, that she may bear on my knees and that through her I too may have children." 4 So she gave him her maid Bilhah as concubine, and Jacob cohabited with her. 5 Bilhah conceived and bore Jacob a son. 6 And Rachel said, "God has vindicated me;^f indeed, He has heeded my plea and given me a son." Therefore she named him Dan. 7 Rachel's maid Bilhah conceived again and bore Jacob a second son. 8 And Rachel said, ^g"A fateful contest I waged^g with my sister; yes, and I have prevailed." So she named him Naphtali.

9 When Leah saw that she had stopped bearing, she took her maid Zilpah and gave her to Jacob as concubine. 10 And when Leah's maid Zilpah bore Jacob a son, 11 Leah said, "What luck!"^h So she named him Gad. 12 When Leah's maid Zilpah bore Jacob a second son, 13 Leah declared, "What fortune!"ⁱ meaning, "Women will deem me fortunate." So she named him Asher.

14 Once, at the time of the wheat harvest, Reuben came upon some mandrakes in the field and brought them to his mother Leah. Rachel said to Leah, "Please give me some of your son's mandrakes." 15 But she said to her, "Was it not enough for you to take away my husband, that you would also take my son's mandrakes?" Rachel re-

29.31: As in the case of Hagar (16.10–12; 21.17–18), God shows compassion to the unfavored mate, thus partly equalizing the disparity between her and her co-wife. Barrenness, in some instances a punishment (e.g., 2 Sam. 6.20–23), serves in Rachel's case to place her in succession to Sarah and Rebekah (11.30; 25.21). 32–35: The names Leah gives her first three sons communicate her deep distress at not being the preferred wife. In Heb. The LORD has seen my affliction (v. 32) is close to the message of the angel to Hagar, "For the LORD has paid heed to your suffering" (16.11). 30.1: The theme of bad relations between a fertile co-wife and a barren one, with the latter as their husband's favorite, appears in more developed form in the story of Hannah in 1 Sam. ch 1. 2: The question Can I take the place of God? reappears in 50.19 (where it is translated, "Am I a substitute for God?"). There, probably not coincidentally, it is Rachel's first-born who asks it, and in a context of reconciliation of siblings once riven by jealousy. 3: The words that through her I too may have children is another connection to the story of Hagar (16.2). Ancient Near Eastern evidence suggests that placing a child on one's knees represents acknowledgment of that child as one's own. 14–18: The mandrake, a plant with purplish flowers and branching roots, was thought to have aphrodisiac properties (cf. Song of Songs 7.14). The bitterness of Leah's tragic position as the wife Jacob never wanted and never loved is especially poignant in vv. 15–16. She has to bargain with her sister to hire her husband just to sleep with her.

plied, "I promise, he shall lie with you tonight, in return for your son's mandrakes." ¹⁶When Jacob came home from the field in the evening, Leah went out to meet him and said, "You are to sleep with me, for I have hired you with my son's mandrakes." And he lay with her that night. ¹⁷God heeded Leah, and she conceived and bore him a fifth son. ¹⁸And Leah said, "God has given me my reward^a for having given my maid to my husband." So she named him Issachar. ¹⁹When Leah conceived again and bore Jacob a sixth son, ²⁰Leah said, "God has given me a choice gift;^b this time my husband will exalt me,^c for I have borne him six sons." So she named him Zebulun. ²¹Last, she bore him a daughter, and named her Dinah.

²⁵After Rachel had borne Joseph, Jacob said to Laban, "Give me leave to go back to my own homeland. ²⁶Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served you, that I may go; for well you know what services I have rendered you." ²⁷But Laban said to him, "If you will indulge me,^f I have learned by divination that the LORD has blessed me on your account." ²⁸And he continued, "Name the wages due from me, and I will pay you." ²⁹But he said, "You know well how I have served you and how your livestock has fared with me. ³⁰For the little you had before I came has grown to much, since the LORD has blessed you wherever I turned. And now, when shall I make provision for my own household?" ³¹He said, "What shall I pay you?" And Jacob said, "Pay me nothing! If you will do this thing for me, I will again pasture and keep your flocks: ³²let me pass through your whole flock today, removing from there every speckled and spotted animal—every dark-colored sheep and every spotted and speckled goat. Such shall be my wages. ³³In the future when you go over my wages, let my honesty toward you testify for me: if there are among my goats any that are not speckled or spotted or any sheep that are not dark-colored, they got there by theft." ³⁴And Laban said, "Very well, let it be as you say."

22: What Rachel does with the mandrakes she buys is strangely unreported. One expects them to play a role in her overcoming her infertility, but it is God alone who is given credit for that. His remembering her underscores her favored status (cf. 8.1). On the basis of a word for "remembering" in Lev. 23.24 (translated "commemorated"), the Talmud dates Rachel's conceiving (as well as Sarah's [see 21.1–8 n.] and Hannah's) to Rosh Ha-Shanah (b. Rosh Hash. 11a). The matriarchs thus play a prominent role in the traditional Rosh Ha-Shanah liturgy.

After strained negotiations about payment for Jacob's services, Laban agrees to his son-in-law's terms, but then tries to cheat him anyway. Jacob outsmarts Laban, cleverly arranging for the rapid proliferation of his own share of the flocks. 25–26: The underlying assumption seems to be that Jacob had accepted the status of an indentured servant. Thus, he could not leave without his master's permission, and his wives and children would belong to the master (Exod. 21.2–4; cf. Gen. 31.43). The verb translated Give me leave serves as the standard term for manumission in the story of the exodus (e.g., Exod. 4.23). 27: Even Laban, ascertaining the divine will by a method that is later prohibited (Lev. 19.26; Deut. 18.10), can see that Jacob is a graced person who brings good luck to those around him (cf. 2 Sam. 6.12). 28: According to Deut. 15.12–15, the master is obligated to endow his newly manumitted indentured servant liberally. 35–42: Laban proves his offer to have been in bad faith, but Jacob overcomes the trickery with a clever technique of his own. The basis for Jacob's actions in vv. 37–42 is the folkloristic belief that what animals see while mating determines the appearance of their young. Thus, when the goats (which are ordinarily dark in the Near East) see the white of the shoots (v. 37; the word for white is the same as Laban's name), they con-ted he-goats and all the speckled and spotted she-goats—every one that had white on it—and all the dark-colored sheep, and left them in the charge of his sons.³⁶ And he put a distance of three days' journey between himself and Jacob, while Jacob was pasturing the rest of Laban's flock.

³⁷Jacob then got fresh shoots of poplar, and of almond and plane, and peeled white stripes in them, laying bare the white of the shoots.³⁸ The rods that he had peeled he set up in front of the goats^a in the troughs, the water receptacles, that the goats came to drink from. Their mating occurred when they came to drink,³⁹ and since the goats mated by the rods, the goats brought forth streaked, speckled, and spotted young.⁴⁰ But Jacob dealt separately with the sheep; he made these animals face the streaked or wholly dark-colored animals in Laban's flock. And so he produced special flocks for himself, which he did not put with Laban's flocks.⁴¹ Moreover, when the sturdier^b animals were mating, Jacob would place the rods in the troughs, in full view of the animals, so that they mated by the rods;⁴² but with the feebler^c animals he would not place them there. Thus the feeble ones^c went to Laban and the sturdy to Jacob.⁴³ So the man grew exceedingly prosperous, and came to own large flocks, maidservants and menservants, camels and asses.

31 Now he heard the things that Laban's sons were saying: "Jacob has taken all that was our father's, and from that which was our father's he has built up all this wealth."² Jacob also saw that Laban's manner toward him was not as it had been in the past.³ Then the LORD said to Jacob, "Return to the land of your fathers where you were born, and I will be with you."⁴ Jacob had Rachel and Leah called to the field, where his flock was,⁵ and said to them, "I see that your father's manner toward me is not as it has been in the past. But the God of my father has been with me.⁶ As you know, I have served your father with all my might;⁷ but your father has cheated me, changing my wages time and again.^d God, however, would not let him do me harm.⁸ If he said thus, 'The speckled shall be your wages,' then all the flocks would drop speckled young; and if he said thus, 'The streaked shall be your wages,' then all the flocks would drop streaked young.⁹ God has taken away your father's livestock and given it to me.

ceive kids with patches of white. Similarly, Jacob positioned the sheep (which are normally white) in view of the streaked or wholly dark-colored animals (v. 40), so that they would bear lambs with dark patches. Thus was the master trickster Laban finally and justly tricked, and thus did Jacob, by the blessing of God and by his own ingenuity, achieve the wealth that had been characteristic of his grandfather and father as well (13.2; 26.13–14). The refugee is becoming a patriarch.

31.1–54: Jacob breaks free of Laban. This chapter marks the final resolution of the even more difficult relationship between the emerging patriarch and his selfish and duplicitous father-in-law. Jacob first persuades his wives to leave their father (vv. 1–16) and then contends with Laban's accusations, making a few of his own along the way (vv. 22–42). Finally, at Laban's suggestion, the two make a nonaggression pact, solemnly delimiting the terms of their separation and the boundary between their territories (vv. 43–54). 1: The complaint of Laban's sons (who are mentioned only here) echoes Esau's charge in 27.36. In this case, however, Jacob will not only receive divine validation of his behavior, but also vigorously defend its legality (vv. 36–42). 3: The verse recalls the LORD's words to Jacob in 28.15, when he first set out for Haran, and thus suggests that He has indeed been protecting the chosen son of Isaac during his long and painful sojourn outside the promised land all along. Functioning as bookends around the story of Jacob in Haran, these two verses illustrate the principle that, in the psalmist's words, "The LORD will guard your going and your coming/now and forever" (Ps. 121.8). 4–13: Jacob here presents a different account of the increase in his flocks from the one that appears in 30.25–43. Source criticism can explain the divergence through the attribution of this text to E, whereas 30.25–43 is J. Note that

10“Once, at the mating time of the flocks, ^aI had a dream in which I saw^a that the he-goats mating with the flock were streaked, speckled, and mottled. 11 And in the dream an angel of God said to me, ‘Jacob!’ ‘Here,’ I answered. 12 And he said, ‘Note well that all the he-goats which are mating with the flock are streaked, speckled, and mottled; for I have noted all that Laban has been doing to you. 13 I am the God of Beth-el, where you anointed a pillar and where you made a vow to Me. Now, arise and leave this land and return to your native land.’ ”

14 Then Rachel and Leah answered him, saying, “Have we still a share in the inheritance of our father’s house? 15 Surely, he regards us as outsiders, now that he has sold us and has used up our purchase price. 16 Truly, all the wealth that God has taken away from our father belongs to us and to our children. Now then, do just as God has told you.”

17 Thereupon Jacob put his children and wives on camels; 18 and he drove off all his livestock and all the wealth that he had amassed, the livestock in his possession that he had acquired in Paddan-aram, to go to his father Isaac in the land of Canaan.

19 Meanwhile Laban had gone to shear his sheep, and Rachel stole her father’s household idols. 20 Jacob ^bkept Laban the Aramean in the dark,^b not telling him that he was fleeing, 21 and fled with all that he had. Soon he was across the Euphrates and heading toward the hill country of Gilead.

22 On the third day, Laban was told that Jacob had fled. 23 So he took his kinsmen with him and pursued him a distance of seven days, catching up with him in the hill country of Gilead. 24 But God appeared to Laban the Aramean in a dream by night and said to him, “Beware of attempting anything with Jacob, good or bad.”

25 Laban overtook Jacob. Jacob had pitched his tent on the Height, and Laban with his kinsmen encamped in the hill country of Gilead. 26 And Laban said to Jacob, “What did you mean by keeping me in the dark and carrying off my daughters like captives of the sword? 27 Why did you flee in secrecy and mislead me and not tell me? I would have sent you off with festive music, with timbrel and lyre. 28 You did not even let me kiss my sons and daughters good-by! It was a foolish thing for you to do. 29 I have it in my power to do you harm; but the God of your father said to me last night, ‘Beware of attempting anything with 31.4–13 always uses the E-name (God) and that v. 13 seems to be a variant of v. 3. Reading the two texts as part of one now unified document presents us with two options: Is Jacob here dissembling to his wives in order to make himself look innocent, or is he giving a profound theological interpretation of the events that happened in the previous chapter on a human plane? 14–16: Rachel and Leah refer to the institution of the bride-price, a gift that the groom paid his fiancée’s father; this text suggests that in some cases it ultimately went to the bride herself. Laban, they complain (in agreement for once), has consumed the bride-price (probably in the form of Jacob’s labor) without concern for them, in effect disowning them. 19–21: Concerning these household idols, see 1 Sam. 19.13. “Stealing” (the Heb has a wider range of meaning than the English), in any event, is a recurrent theme in this chapter and points to one of its major ironies. Whereas Jacob vigorously defends himself against the charge that he defrauded Laban (vv. 8–12, 39), he, in fact, had “to steal the mind of Laban the Aramean” (see translators’ note b-b) in order to effect his getaway. Unbeknownst to him, his wife had indeed stolen her father’s household idols. Given Laban’s own deceit (29.21–28), the phrase “stole the mind of Laban the Aramean” constitutes a delicious wordplay. In Heb, “mind” (“lev”) sounds like “Laban” (“lavan”), and “Aramean” (“arami”) sounds like “deceive” (“rima”).

a-a Lit. “I raised my eyes and saw in a dream, behold.”

b-b Lit. “stole the mind of Laban the Aramean”; similarly in v. 26.

Jacob, good or bad.’³⁰ Very well, you had to leave because you were longing for your father’s house; but why did you steal my gods?”

³¹ Jacob answered Laban, saying, “I was afraid because I thought you would take your daughters from me by force. ³² But anyone with whom you find your gods shall not remain alive! In the presence of our kinsmen, point out what I have of yours and take it.” Jacob, of course, did not know that Rachel had stolen them.

³³ So Laban went into Jacob’s tent and Leah’s tent and the tents of the two maidservants; but he did not find them. Leaving Leah’s tent, he entered Rachel’s tent. ³⁴ Rachel, meanwhile, had taken the idols and placed them in the camel cushion and sat on them; and Laban rummaged through the tent without finding them. ³⁵ For she said to her father, “Let not my lord take it amiss that I cannot rise before you, for the period of women is upon me.” Thus he searched, but could not find the household idols.

³⁶ Now Jacob became incensed and took up his grievance with Laban. Jacob spoke up and said to Laban, “What is my crime, what is my guilt that you should pursue me? ³⁷ You rummaged through all my things; what have you found of all your household objects? Set it here, before my kinsmen and yours, and let them decide between us two.

³⁸ “These twenty years I have spent in your service, your ewes and she-goats never miscarried, nor did I feast on rams from your flock. ³⁹ That which was torn by beasts I never brought to you; I myself made good the loss; you exacted it of me, whether snatched by day or snatched by night. ⁴⁰ Often,^a scorching heat ravaged me by day and frost by night; and sleep fled from my eyes. ⁴¹ Of the twenty years that I spent in your household, I served you fourteen years for your two daughters, and six years for your flocks; and you changed my wages time and again.^b ⁴² Had not the God of my father, the God of Abraham and the Fear^c of Isaac, been with me, you would have sent me away empty-handed. But God took notice of my plight and the toil of my hands, and He gave judgment last night.”

⁴³ Then Laban spoke up and said to Jacob, “The daughters are my daughters, the children are my children, and the flocks are my flocks; all that you see is mine. Yet what can I do now about my daughters or the children they have borne? ⁴⁴ Come, then, let us make a pact, you and I, that there may be a witness between you and me.”

32: According to a midrash, it was Jacob’s well-intentioned curse that brought about his beloved Rachel’s premature death (Gen. Rab. 74.4; see 35.16–20).

33–35: Note the two-fold satire, against the miserly Laban, vainly rummaging through his own family’s tents, and against the household idols themselves, escaping detection only because of Rachel’s menstrual period. In the purity system of the Torah, anything on which a menstruant has sat communicates impurity (Lev. 15.22). Whereas Laban refers to his gods, the narrator is careful to call them household idols (Heb “terafim”). And whereas Laban is fiercely devoted to his gods, it is God who has stripped him of his wealth and given it to his daughters (v. 16). Note also the connection of Laban’s “rummaging” (“mishesh”) and Isaac’s “feeling” (“mash”) Jacob in 27.21–22.

In each case, Jacob escapes detection, but in each case he also pays a steep price. 39: By the standards of the law in Exod. 22.12, Jacob went beyond his obligations when he made good that which was torn by beasts. 44: Witness (“ed”) may involve a pun on a similar Semitic word (“ad”) that means a “pact” or “covenant”; here, it may even be a variant of it. If the word does mean witness, the reference is unclear. Most likely, it is God Himself who is to play that role, as in v. 50.

⁴⁵Thereupon Jacob took a stone and set it up as a pillar. ⁴⁶And Jacob said to his kinsmen, "Gather stones." So they took stones and made a mound; and they partook of a meal there by the mound. ⁴⁷Laban named it Yegar-sahadutha,^a but Jacob named it Gal-ed.^b ⁴⁸And Laban declared, "This mound is a witness between you and me this day." That is why it was named Gal-ed; ⁴⁹and [it was called] Mizpah, because he said, "May the LORD watch^c between you and me, when we are out of sight of each other. ⁵⁰If you ill-treat my daughters or take other wives besides my daughters—though no one else be about, remember, God Himself will be witness between you and me."

⁵¹And Laban said to Jacob, "Here is this mound and here the pillar which I have set up between you and me: ⁵²this mound shall be witness and this pillar shall be witness that I am not to cross to you past this mound, and that you are not to cross to me past this mound and this pillar, with hostile intent. ⁵³May the God of Abraham and the god of Nahor—their ancestral deities—"judge between us." And Jacob swore by the Fear^d of his father Isaac. ⁵⁴Jacob then offered up a sacrifice on the Height, and invited his kinsmen to partake of the meal. After the meal, they spent the night on the Height.

32 Early in the morning, Laban kissed his sons and daughters and bade them good-by; then Laban left on his journey homeward. ²Jacob went on his way, and angels of God encountered him. ³When he saw them, Jacob said, "This is God's camp." So he named that place Mahanaim.^e

47: The narrative gives a folk etymology for Gilead (v. 23), a mountainous area in Transjordan, southeast of the Sea of Galilee (Kinneret). 1 Kings 22.1-38 and 2 Kings 9.14-15 report wars between Israelites and Arameans over one of its major cities in the 9th century BCE. Gen. 31.44-54 may reflect a pact between these two peoples. Laban's giving Gal-ed an Aramaic name is a wonderful little touch. According to the Talmud, one should not esteem the Aramaic language lightly, for, as these two words show, it appears in the Torah itself (y. Sof. 7.7).

32.1-3: A good-bye and a revelation. 1: Laban omits kissing Jacob, in pointed contrast to their initial encounter (29.13). 3: Retrospectively, this verse recalls Jacob's experience at Bethel on his way to Laban (28.10-22). Cf. especially 28.17, "This is none other than the abode of God." Prospectively, the name Mahanaim, understood as "two camps," anticipates Jacob's precautionary division of his entourage in 32.8-9.

32.4-22: Jacob prepares to meet Esau. 4: Messengers is the same Heb word as "angels" in v. 2. The term communicates a premonition that, however fearful the encounter with Esau may seem, God's protective grace will not depart from Jacob. 7: The mention of Esau's 400 men underscores Jacob's vulnerability. For all his wives, offspring, slaves, and animals, he lacks the military might of the brother he has wronged. Things are looking grim.

dred men with him.”⁸ Jacob was greatly frightened; in his anxiety, he divided the people with him, and the flocks and herds and camels, into two camps,⁹ thinking, “If Esau comes to the one camp and attacks it, the other camp may yet escape.”

¹⁰Then Jacob said, “O God of my father Abraham and God of my father Isaac, O LORD, who said to me, ‘Return to your native land and I will deal bountifully with you!’¹¹I am unworthy of all the kindness that You have so steadfastly shown Your servant: with my staff alone I crossed this Jordan, and now I have become two camps.¹²Deliver me, I pray, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau; else, I fear, he may come and strike me down, mothers and children alike.¹³Yet You have said, ‘I will deal bountifully with you and make your offspring as the sands of the sea, which are too numerous to count.’ ”

¹⁴After spending the night there, he selected from what was at hand these presents for his brother Esau:¹⁵200 she-goats and 20 he-goats; 200 ewes and 20 rams;¹⁶30 milch camels with their colts; 40 cows and 10 bulls; 20 she-asses and 10 he-asses.¹⁷These he put in the charge of his servants, drove by drove, and he told his servants, “Go on ahead, and keep a distance between droves.”¹⁸He instructed the one in front as follows, “When my brother Esau meets you and asks you, ‘Whose man are you? Where are you going? And whose [animals] are these ahead of you?’¹⁹you shall answer, ‘Your servant Jacob’s; they are a gift sent to my lord Esau; and [Jacob] himself is right behind us.’ ”²⁰He gave similar instructions to the second one, and the third, and all the others who followed the droves, namely, “Thus and so shall you say to Esau when you reach him.²¹And you shall add, ‘And your servant Jacob himself is right behind us.’ ” For he reasoned, “If I propitiate him with presents in advance, and then face him, perhaps he will show me favor.”²²And so the gift went on ahead, while he remained in camp that night.

10–13: Jacob’s prayer opens and closes with quotations of those promises of God that the looming confrontation with Esau threatens (vv. 10, 13). V. 11 expresses his humility and his gratitude for previous favors, and v. 12 asks for deliverance, appealing to God’s mercy. A talmudic rabbi, however, is critical of Jacob on the grounds that one should never put himself in a dangerous place and then ask that a miracle be performed (b. Shab. 32a). The danger should be avoided, if at all possible.

32.23–33: Jacob wrestles with a divine being. The fateful encounter at the Jabbok is one of the best-known episodes in the life of Jacob, but also surely the most enigmatic. 23–25: Peniel is on the north bank of the Jabbok (the wadi Zerka). Why Jacob returned there after fording his wives and children is unclear. In the Talmud, it is suggested that he had returned to retrieve some little jars he had forgotten there (b. Hul. 91a). In any case, his solitude and lack of property recall his status when he first fled his brother’s wrath, before God had showered His bounty upon him (28.11). 25: The identity of the man is as unclear as his reason for attacking Jacob (cf. Exod. 4.24–26). In the Tanakh, God and angels can appear in human form, as in 18.2 (cf. 19.1); Josh. 5.13–15; Judg. 13.6, 10. Jacob’s mysterious adversary is surely supernatural, and most traditional Jewish commentators have taken him to be angelic. A well-known midrash sees him as the “patron angel of Esau” and thus interprets this episode as a warning to all future enemies of the Jewish people: “Your patron angel could not withstand him [i.e., Jacob/Israel] and you seek to attack his descen-

“Jacob.” ²⁹Said he, “Your name shall no longer be Jacob, but Israel, for you have striven^a with ^bbeings divine and human,^b and have prevailed.” ³⁰Jacob asked, “Pray tell me your name.” But he said, “You must not ask my name!” And he took leave of him there. ³¹So Jacob named the place Peniel,^c meaning, “I have seen a divine being face to face, yet my life has been preserved.” ³²The sun rose upon him as he passed Penuel, limping on his hip. ³³That is why the children of Israel to this day do not eat the thigh muscle that is on the socket of the hip, since Jacob’s hip socket was wrenched at the thigh muscle.

33 Looking up, Jacob saw Esau coming, accompanied by four hundred men. He divided the children among Leah, Rachel, and the two maids, ²putting the maids and their children first, Leah and her children next, and Rachel and Joseph last. ³He himself went on ahead and bowed low to the ground seven times until he was near his brother. ⁴Esau ran to greet him. He embraced him and, falling on his neck, he kissed him; and they wept. ⁵Looking about, he saw the women and the children. “Who,” he asked, “are these with you?” He answered, “The children with whom God has favored your servant.” ⁶Then the maids, with their children, came forward and bowed low; ⁷next Leah, with her children, came forward and bowed low; and last, Joseph and Rachel came forward and bowed low; ⁸And he asked, “What do you mean by all this company which I have met?” He answered, “To gain my lord’s favor.” ⁹Esau said, “I have enough, my brother; let what you have remain yours.” ¹⁰But Jacob said, “No, I pray you; if you would do me this favor, accept from me this gift; for to see your face is like seeing the face of God, and you have received me favorably. ¹¹Please accept my present which has been brought to you, for God has favored me and I have plenty.” And when he urged him, he accepted.

dants?” (Gen. Rab. 77.3). 29: The scientific etymology of Israel is unclear, a good guess being “[The God] El rules.” The folk etymology in this verse appears again in Hos. 12.4. 30: Cf. Exod. 3.13-14; Judg. 13.18. He took leave of him could also be rendered “he blessed him.” If so, Jacob wins his blessing after all. 33: The Rabbis saw this norm, unparalleled in the Tanakh, as a commandment (“mitzvah”) and thus an indispensable element of the Jewish dietary system (“kashrut”). A majority position in the Mishnah maintains that this “mitzvah” was first announced when the Torah was given on Mount Sinai and only written down in its current location to draw attention to its underlying rationale (m. Hul. 7.6). In other words, the prohibition did not come into force until the revelation on Sinai.

33.1-20: The reconciliation of Jacob and Esau. The keynotes of this ch are Jacob’s obsequiousness and Esau’s gracious forbearance. The murderous revenge that the former had feared (32.12) and the latter had vowed (27.41) thus averted, Jacob succeeds in effecting a definitive separation from his brother and maintaining his own distinctive identity. 1-2: Jacob graphically reaffirms his preference for Rachel (now extended to her son Joseph), which once caused so much ill will between his wives (29.31-30.21). His preference for Joseph will be the cause of the next tear in the fabric of familial relations. It will nearly result in his beloved son’s death (ch 37). 3: Sevenfold prostration appears in the Amarna Letters (14th century BCE) as a gesture of homage to one’s suzerain. The scene reverses the dominance of Jacob over Esau prophesied in 25.23 and 27.29. 37.4: He kissed him is missing in the Septuagint, an ancient Greek translation of the Torah produced by Jewish scholars in Egypt. In the Masoretic Text (the traditional rabbinic version codified in the late first millennium CE), dots appear over the phrase, probably to indicate its doubtful status in the manuscript tradition. One midrash interprets the dots to mean that, uncharacteristically, Esau felt compassion for Jacob and kissed him wholeheartedly. Another midrash, however, thinks that Esau intended to “bite” (“nashakh”) rather than to “kiss” (“nashak”) his brother, but God hardened Jacob’s neck, foiling his brother’s deceitful attack (Gen. Rab. 78.9). 9: Enough (“rav”) may echo the prophecy that “the older (‘rav’) shall serve the younger” (25.23). Esau, confronted with his brother’s conspicuous obeisance, renounces any claim to his younger brother’s property. 11: Accept my present can also be

¹² And [Esau] said, “Let us start on our journey, and I will proceed at your pace.” ¹³ But he said to him, “My lord knows that the children are frail and that the flocks and herds, which are nursing, are a care to me; if they are driven hard a single day, all the flocks will die. ¹⁴ Let my lord go on ahead of his servant, while I travel slowly, at the pace of the cattle before me and at the pace of the children, until I come to my lord in Seir.”

¹⁵ Then Esau said, “Let me assign to you some of the men who are with me.” But he said, “Oh no, my lord is too kind to me!” ¹⁶ So Esau started back that day on his way to Seir. ¹⁷ But Jacob journeyed on to Succoth, and built a house for himself and made stalls for his cattle; that is why the place was called Succoth.^a

34 Now Dinah, the daughter whom Leah had borne to Jacob, went out to visit the daughters of the land. ² Shechem son of Hamor the Hivite, chief of the country, saw her, and took her and lay with her by force. ³ Being strongly drawn to Dinah daughter of Jacob, and in love with the maiden, he spoke to the maiden tenderly. ⁴ So Shechem said to his father Hamor, “Get me this girl as a wife.”

⁵ Jacob heard that he had defiled his daughter Dinah; but since his sons were in the field with his cattle, Jacob kept silent until they came home. ⁶ Then Shechem’s father Hamor came out to Jacob to speak to him. ⁷ Meanwhile Jacob’s sons, having heard the news, came in from the field. The men were distressed and very angry, because he had committed an outrage in Israel by lying with Jacob’s daughter—a thing not to be done.

neys to Succoth. He once again succeeds in securing his independence from the larger family, thus maintaining the distinctive identity of his lineage against the threat of assimilation into the surrounding nations. 20: Through this confession El, the supreme Canaanite deity, is identified as the God of Israel.

34.1–31: The rape of Dinah. No sooner does Jacob succeed in separating from Esau (33.12–17) than a new threat to the distinctive identity of his family emerges when a Canaanite prince seeks to marry the daughter of Jacob whom he has raped. And no sooner is an old rent in the family healed through the reconciliation of Jacob and Esau (33.1–11) than a new one opens when Simeon and Levi defy their father and avenge the crime against their sister. 1–2: Given the extraordinary lengths to which the chosen family has gone to preserve its identity, Dinah’s departure from her family’s quarters is ominous. In the event, though she goes out “to see” (here rendered to visit), she is the one seen, with tragic consequences. Shechem is the name not only of her rapist (and then lover), but also of an important Canaanite city. The book of Joshua concludes with Joshua’s making a covenant with Israel at Shechem (Josh. ch 24). Interestingly, there is no account of Israel’s having taken the city by force of arms during the conquest of the land recounted in Joshua and Judges. It is possible that complex ethnic and political history lies behind the powerful tale in Gen. ch 34. 2: Some scholars suggest that the final verb refers to improper sexual relations, in this case nonmarital sex, and not specifically rape. 3: Without justifying his crime, the narrative builds up considerable sympathy for Shechem. 8–12: According to biblical law (and strong Assyrian precedents), a man who rapes an unattached woman must pay a fine to her father, marry her, and forfeit the right to divorce her (Deut. 22.28–29). On the other hand, bibligenerosity toward the chosen son that enables him to be generous, in turn, to his unchosen brother.

in marriage. ⁹Intermarry with us: give your daughters to us, and take our daughters for yourselves. ¹⁰You will dwell among us, and the land will be open before you; settle, move about, and acquire holdings in it.” ¹¹Then Shechem said to her father and brothers, “Do me this favor, and I will pay whatever you tell me. ¹²Ask of me a bride-price ever so high, as well as gifts, and I will pay what you tell me; only give me the maiden for a wife.”

¹³Jacob’s sons answered Shechem and his father Hamor—speaking with guile because he had defiled their sister Dinah—¹⁴and said to them, “We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to a man who is uncircumcised, for that is a disgrace among us. ¹⁵Only on this condition will we agree with you; that you will become like us in that every male among you is circumcised. ¹⁶Then we will give our daughters to you and take your daughters to ourselves; and we will dwell among you and become as one kindred. ¹⁷But if you will not listen to us and become circumcised, we will take our daughter and go.”

¹⁸Their words pleased Hamor and Hamor’s son Shechem. ¹⁹And the youth lost no time in doing the thing, for he wanted Jacob’s daughter. Now he was the most respected in his father’s house. ²⁰So Hamor and his son Shechem went to the “public place” of their town and spoke to their fellow townsmen, saying, ²¹“These people are our friends; let them settle in the land and move about in it, for the land is large enough for them; we will take their daughters to ourselves as wives and give our daughters to them. ²²But only on this condition will the men agree with us to dwell among us and be as one kindred: that all our males become circumcised as they are circumcised. ²³Their cattle and substance and all their beasts will be ours, if we only agree to their terms, so that they will settle among us.” ²⁴All ^bwho went out of the gate of his town^b heeded Hamor and his son Shechem, and all males, ^ball those who went out of the gate of his town,^b were circumcised.

²⁵On the third day, when they were in pain, Simeon and Levi, two of Jacob’s sons, brothers of Dinah, took each his sword, came upon the city unmolested, and slew all the males. ²⁶They put Hamor and his son Shechem to the sword, took Dinah out of Shechem’s house, and went away. ²⁷The other sons of Jacob came upon the slain and plundered the town, because their sister had been defiled. ²⁸They seized their flocks and herds and asses, all that was inside the town and outside; ²⁹all their wealth, all cal law strictly forbids the marriage of an Israelite to a Hivite (Deut. 7.1–5), and the patriarchs have gone to great lengths to avoid intermarriage (Gen. ch 24; 27.46–28.9). From the perspective of these (later) laws, a happy resolution to the love-struck Shechem’s dilemma is impossible. 13–17: In this ch, the sons of Jacob have already become adults, and the perspective is that of a later period in the national history (e.g., “he had committed an outrage in Israel,” v. 7). Their devious proposal seems to be that the Israelites and the Hivites enter into a covenant, an act that is prohibited in the Torah as inevitably an inducement to break faith with the LORD (Exod. 23.27–33). 23: Hamor and Shechem change the terms of the offer so as to appeal to their kinsmen. Now the projected deal is said to enrich the townsmen at the expense of Jacob and his family. 26: Were the Hivites holding Dinah as a hostage throughout the elaborate negotiations? Or had she stayed in Shechem’s house voluntarily, recognizing that he had done what the law required (see vv. 8–12 n.) and that the marriage prospects for a raped woman were not good (cf. 2 Sam. 13.12–16)? 27–29: Other does not appear in the Heb of v. 27, and it is unclear whether Simeon and Levi were involved in the plundering. The Bible commends those who abstain from plunder in situations of righteous war (e.g., Deut. 13.13–19; 1 Sam. 15.13–26; Esth. 9.10, 15, 16). Given the emphasis Hamor and Shechem had placed on material benefits (vv. 34.10–12, 23), however, and the fact that the whole episode began with an act of violence (v. 2), the plundering of their town exemplifies the widespread biblical principle that the punishment fit the crime (e.g., Deut. 19.16–21). That Simeon and Levi slew all the males when the latter were in pain from an operation on their male organs manifests the same principle. 31: Appropriately, this tragic and ambiguous tale ends with a question, not an assertion. There their children, and their wives, all that was in the houses, they took as captives and booty.

³⁰Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, “You have brought trouble on me, making me odious among the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites and the Perizzites; my men are few in number, so that if they unite against me and attack me, I and my house will be destroyed.” ³¹But they answered, “Should our sister be treated like a whore?”

35 God said to Jacob, “Arise, go up to Bethel and remain there; and build an altar there to the God who appeared to you when you were fleeing from your brother Esau.” ²So Jacob said to his household and to all who were with him, “Rid yourselves of the alien gods in your midst, purify yourselves, and change your clothes. ³Come, let us go up to Bethel, and I will build an altar there to the God who answered me when I was in distress and who has been with me wherever I have gone.” ⁴They gave to Jacob all the alien gods that they had, and the rings that were in their ears, and Jacob buried them under the terebinth that was near Shechem. ⁵As they set out, a terror from God fell on the cities round about, so that they did not pursue the sons of Jacob.

⁶Thus Jacob came to Luz—that is, Bethel—in the land of Canaan, he and all the people who were with him. ⁷There he built an altar and named the site El-bethel,^a for it was there that God had revealed Himself to him when he was fleeing from his brother.

⁸Deborah, Rebekah’s nurse, died, and was buried under the oak below Bethel; so it was named Allon-bacuth.^b

⁹God appeared again to Jacob on his arrival from Padan-aram, and He blessed him. ¹⁰God said to him,

“You whose name is Jacob,
You shall be called Jacob no more,
But Israel shall be your name.”

Thus He named him Israel.

for their excessive zeal, and explains the curious fates of the tribes of Simeon (which was absorbed into Judah) and Levi (which became the clerical tribe, without land).

35.1–28: Jacob and his household return to Bethel and travel in the promised land. Marked by three deaths (Deborah, Rachel, and Isaac) and one birth (Jacob’s last child, Benjamin), this disjointed chapter provides closure to one phase of Jacob’s life and prepares the way for his next set of trials, the apparent loss of Joseph and all that it involves (chs 37–50).

1–7: This passage functions as a kind of fulfillment to Jacob’s vow in 28.20–22. God’s protection has indeed been with him, and he is about to return safely to his father’s house. 2: The actions Jacob commands to his entourage are associated with preparations for ritual service (e.g., Num. 19.7–8) and with a deepened and renewed consecration to the one God (cf. Josh. 24.14). 5: This verse may be the conclusion to the tale told in ch 34. 8: Nothing else is known about this Deborah. The story of her death serves as an etymology for the name of what must have been a well-known landmark. A different story suggests that a tree in the same region is named after the more famous Deborah, a heroine of the book of Judges (Judg. 4.4–5). A midrash, ingeniously connecting oak (Heb “alon”) with a form of the Greek word for “other” (“alon”), reports that while still mourning Rebekah’s nurse, Jacob received the news of another death, that of Rebekah herself (Gen. Rab. 81.5)—an event strangely unreported in the Torah. Another midrash gives a reason: Her funeral was held at night so that “everybody would not say, Cursed be the breasts that suckled a person like this [i.e., her wicked son Esau]” (Tanḥ., ki-tetze 4). 9–13: These verses are characterized by the vocabulary of P. Vv. 9–10 are the Priestly version of the change of Jacob’s name that J reports in 32.28–29.

is room to question the two brothers’ zeal here. The same men who kill for the sake of the family’s honor (against their father’s wishes) in ch 34 consent to have their own little brother slain or sold into slavery in ch 37. Gen. 49.5–7, in which Jacob curses the anger of Simeon and Levi, explicitly condemns these brothers

Kings shall issue from your loins.

13 God parted from him at the spot where He had spoken to him; 14 and Jacob set up a pillar at the site where He had spoken to him, a pillar of stone, and he offered a libation on it and poured oil upon it. 15 Jacob gave the site, where God had spoken to him, the name of Bethel.

16 They set out from Bethel; but when they were still some distance short of Ephrath, Rachel was in childbirth, and she had hard labor. 17 When her labor was at its hardest, the midwife said to her, “Have no fear, for it is another boy for you.” 18 But as she breathed her last—for she was dying—she named him Ben-oni;^a but his father called him Benjamin.^b 19 Thus Rachel died. She was buried on the road to Ephrath—now Bethlehem. 20 Over her grave Jacob set up a pillar; it is the pillar at Rachel’s grave to this day. 21 Israel journeyed on, and pitched his tent beyond Migdal-eder.

22 While Israel stayed in that land, Reuben went and lay with Bilhah, his father’s concubine; and Israel found out.

Now the sons of Jacob were twelve in number. 23 The sons of Leah: Reuben—Jacob’s first-born—Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun. 24 The sons of Rachel: Joseph and Benjamin. 25 The sons of Bilhah, Rachel’s maid: Dan and Naphtali. 26 And the sons of Zilpah, Leah’s maid: Gad and Asher. These are the sons of Jacob who were born to him in Paddan-aram.

27 And Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, at Kiriath-arba—now Hebron—where Abraham and Isaac had sojourned. 28 Isaac was a hundred and eighty years old 29 when he breathed his last and died. He^c was gathered to his kin in ripe old age; and he was buried by his sons Esau and Jacob.

36 This is the line of Esau—that is, Edom. 2 Esau took his wives from among the Canaanite women—Adah daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Oholibamah daughter of Anah daughter of Zibeon the Hivite^d— 3 and also Basemath daughter of Ishmael and sister of Ne-

14–15: This is the third time Jacob names Bethel. The passage seems to be a variant of 28.18–19, which it more closely resembles than 35.7. The source analysis of v. 7 and vv. 14–15 is more uncertain than usual. 18: According to 1 Sam. 10.2, the tomb of Rachel was in the territory of Benjamin, as befits this account of her death, and not near Bethlehem, which is in Judah. Similarly, in Jer. 31.15, Rachel is depicted as weeping for her children in Ramah, a Benjaminitic city (Josh. 18.21–28). Ephrathah/Bethlehem and Judah, however, attained high status because of their later association with David (e.g., Ruth 4.11–12, 18–22), and this may have contributed to the identification of Rachel’s tomb with the site mentioned in this verse. 22a: The details are missing, and the text breaks off abruptly mid-verse (49.4 seems to allude to the same episode), suggesting that some material has been lost, or that there is more to say about this episode. A son’s having intercourse with his father’s concubine was a declaration of rebellion (2 Sam. 16.20–22; 1 Kings 2.13–25). Eager to protect the good names of all involved, a midrash denies that the report of Reuben’s sin is to be taken literally (e.g., b. Shab. 55b). 28: Abraham’s life span of 175 years (25.7) and Isaac’s of 180 suggest a pattern: 175 = 7 × 5², and 180 = 5 × 6². Following that progression, Jacob should live 147 years (= 3 × 7²), and so he does (47.28)!

36.1–43: The descendants of Esau. This chapter consists of several overlapping but not altogether consistent genealogies, most likely compiled from a variety of sources. Its placement here is perhaps owing to the list of Jacob’s twelve sons in 35.22b–26; it also serves to divide the Jacob cycle from the Joseph story. The generation of Rebekah and Isaac’s twins is now passing, and the focus for the rest of Genesis will lie on Jacob’s troubled descendants alone. The attention given to Esau’s family here suggests conbaioth.⁴ Adah bore to Esau Eliphaz; Basemath bore Reuel;⁵ and Oholibamah bore Jeush, Jalam, and Korah. Those were the sons of Esau, who were born to him in the land of Canaan.

⁶Esau took his wives, his sons and daughters, and all the members of his household, his cattle and all his livestock, and all the property that he had acquired in the land of Canaan, and went to another land because of his brother Jacob. ⁷For their possessions were too many for them to dwell together, and the land where they sojourned could not support them because of their livestock. ⁸So Esau settled in the hill country of Seir—Esau being Edom.

¹⁰These are the names of Esau's sons: Eliphaz, the son of Esau's wife Adah; Reuel, the son of Esau's wife Basemath. ¹¹The sons of Eliphaz were Teman, Omar, Zepho, Gatam, and Kenaz. ¹²Timna was a concubine of Esau's son Eliphaz; she bore Amalek to Eliphaz. Those were the descendants of Esau's wife Adah. ¹³And these were the sons of Reuel: Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah. Those were the descendants of Esau's wife Basemath. ¹⁴And these were the sons of Esau's wife Oholibamah, daughter of Anah daughter of Zibeon: she bore to Esau Jeush, Jalam, and Korah.

¹⁵These are the clans of the children of Esau. The descendants of Esau's first-born Eliphaz: the clans Teman, Omar, Zepho, Kenaz, ¹⁶Korah, Gatam, and Amalek; these are the clans of Eliphaz in the land of Edom. Those are the descendants of Adah. ¹⁷And these are the descendants of Esau's son Reuel: the clans Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah; these are the clans of Reuel in the land of Edom. Those are the descendants of Esau's wife Basemath. ¹⁸And these are the descendants of Esau's wife Oholibamah: the clans Jeush, Jalam, and Korah; these are the clans of Esau's wife Oholibamah, the daughter of Anah. ¹⁹Those were the sons of Esau—that is, Edom—and those are their clans.

²⁰These were the sons of Seir the Horite, who were settled in the land: Lotan, Shobal, Zibeon, Anah, ²¹Dishon, Ezer, and Dishan. Those are the clans of the Horites, the descendants of Seir, in the land of Edom.

²²The sons of Lotan were Hori and Hemam; and Lotan's sister was Timna. ²³The sons of Shobal were these: Alvan, Manahath, Ebal, Shepho, and Onam. ²⁴The sons of Zibeon were these: Aiah^a and Anah—that was the Anah siderable fraternal feeling for him (cf. Deut. 23.8), which clashes with later biblical and postbiblical attitudes toward him. See 27.34–35 n. 2–3: See 26.34–35 n.; 28.8–9 n.

6–8: The passage is reminiscent of the separation of Abraham and Lot in 13.5–13 and serves a similar purpose. 9–14: This list provides the names of Esau's sons and their sons in turn. Amalek's conception by a concubine may be a disparagement related to his identity as the ruthless enemy of the people Israel and their God (Exod. 17.8–16; Deut. 25.17–19). 12: If the notice about Timna is not an interpolation, then Amalek's being reckoned a descendant of Adah is probably related to the institution of surrogate motherhood attested in 16.1–2; 29.3–13. 15–19: The individuals in vv. 9–14 are here listed as the eponymous heads of the Edomite clans. 20–30: This is a list of the individuals and the clans of Seir the Horite. According to Deut. 2.12, a group called Horites inhabited the land of Seir before the descendants of Esau wiped them out. The exact identity of these Horites—whether, for example, they are the same as the “Hurrians” known from cuneiform sources—is still a matter of debate. Note that Zibeon (vv. 20, 24) appears in v. 2 as the name of a Hivite. 24: Nothing more is known about Anah's enigmatic discovery. The report reads like an allusion to a story well known to the original listeners.

who discovered the hot springs^a in the wilderness while pasturing the asses of his father Zibeon. ²⁵ The children of Anah were these: Dishon and Anah's daughter Oholibamah. ²⁶ The sons of Dishon^b were these: Hemdan, Eshban, Ithran, and Cheran. ²⁷ The sons of Ezer were these: Bilhan, Zaavan, and Akan. ²⁸ And the sons of Dishan were these: Uz and Aran.

37 Now Jacob was settled in the land where his father had sojourned, the land of Canaan. ² This, then, is the line of Jacob:

At seventeen years of age, Joseph tended the flocks with his brothers, as a helper to the sons of his father's wives Bilhah and Zilpah. And Joseph brought bad reports of them to their father. ³ Now Israel loved Joseph best of all his sons, for he was the child of his old age; and he had made him an ornamented tunic.^d ⁴ And when his brothers

31–39: None of the kings listed here succeeded his father, and different capitals are given for different rulers. It is likely that the kings listed here were more like the non-dynastic leaders known as "judges" in the biblical book of that name. 31: The reference to kings reigning in Israel is difficult to reconcile with the traditional attribution of Genesis to Moses, who died long before the monarchy. Ibn Ezra, who is elsewhere open to the idea of post-Mosaic passages, defends the traditional doctrine by identifying Moses himself as the first Israelite king (also in Deut. 33.5)—a title he never holds in the Tanakh, however. 40–43: The ch closes with another list of Edomite clans, overlapping with vv. 15–19, but not identical with it.

37.1–36: Joseph's brothers sell him into slavery. Ch 37 begins the story of Joseph, a figure who dominates most of the remaining narrative in Genesis. In structure, the Joseph story is quite different from the preceding material centering on Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Whereas the latter takes the form, predominantly, of small, self-contained passages, the story of Joseph resembles a coherent novella, with a subtle and well-crafted plot. Its theology, too, is different. Whereas the patriarchal narrative is replete with appearances of God or His messengers, and oracles from them, Joseph never sees or hears God or His messengers (the only direct revelation in these chs comes to Jacob, in 46.1–4). Rather, God works here in a hidden way, secretly guiding the course of human events, even bringing good out of human evil (50.20). Lastly, whereas the stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob take place in Canaan and Mesopotamia, the novella of Joseph and his brothers takes place mostly in Egypt. The events that result in the return to the promised land will begin only after Joseph's death. Many of these special characteristics of the Joseph story are found in wisdom literature (see pp. 1276–77). 1–3: The order of presentation is saw that their father loved him more than any of his brothers, they hated him so that they could not speak a friendly word to him.

⁵Once Joseph had a dream which he told to his brothers; and they hated him even more. ⁶He said to them, "Hear this dream which I have dreamed: ⁷There we were binding sheaves in the field, when suddenly my sheaf stood up and remained upright; then your sheaves gathered around and bowed low to my sheaf." ⁸His brothers answered, "Do you mean to reign over us? Do you mean to rule over us?" And they hated him even more for his talk about his dreams.

⁹He dreamed another dream and told it to his brothers, saying, "Look, I have had another dream: And this time, the sun, the moon, and eleven stars were bowing down to me." ¹⁰And when he told it to his father and brothers, his father berated him. "What," he said to him, "is this dream you have dreamed? Are we to come, I and your mother and your brothers, and bow low to you to the ground?" ¹¹So his brothers were wrought up at him, and his father kept the matter in mind.

¹²One time, when his brothers had gone to pasture their father's flock at Shechem, ¹³Israel said to Joseph, "Your brothers are pasturing at Shechem. Come, I will send you to them." He answered, "I am ready." ¹⁴And he said to him, "Go and see how your brothers are and how the flocks are faring, and bring me back word." So he sent him from the valley of Hebron.

When he reached Shechem, ¹⁵a man came upon him wandering in the fields. The man asked him, "What are you looking for?" ¹⁶He answered, "I am looking for my brothers. Could you tell me where they are pasturing?" ¹⁷The man said, "They have gone from here, for I heard them say: Let us go to Dothan." So Joseph followed his brothers and found them at Dothan.

¹⁸They saw him from afar, and before he came close to them they conspired to kill him. ¹⁹They said to one another, "Here comes that dreamer! ²⁰Come now, let us kill him and throw him into one of the pits; and we can say, 'A savage beast devoured him.' We shall see what comes of his dreams!" ²¹But when Reuben heard it, he tried to save revealing—Jacob, Joseph, his brothers. Joseph is caught between his doting father and his envious siblings. Although he is the first-born son of Jacob's preferred wife, Rachel (30.22–24), his older brothers have stationed him with the sons of the slave women (30.3–13), the lowest ranking siblings. Like his dreams (vv. 5–11), this contradiction may foreshadow the radical reversal of Joseph's status.

4: The end of the verse can be translated more literally as, "they could not say 'Shalom' to him."

5: Like the "bad reports [that] he brought to his father" (v. 2), his telling his brothers the dream evidences Joseph's immaturity and lack of foresight—both of which will be dramatically remedied as his tale unfolds. 8: In each of the three pairs of dreams in the Joseph story, one dream focuses on grain or grain products (40.16–19; 41.5–7). The brothers see only dominance in Joseph's own first dream, missing altogether the symbolism of the grain imagery. When they do bow down to him, it will be in supplication that he—who has grain when they do not—will feed them (42.6–7).

9–11: Joseph tells his first dream to the brothers alone, the second to his brothers and his father. Similarly, his brothers come to Egypt alone and bow down to him (42.6); only afterwards does Jacob come (46.6) and bow to his son (47.31). Jacob is doubly incredulous of the dream, perhaps because it appears to mention Rachel, who has already died giving birth to Benjamin (35.16–20). In the Talmud, a rabbi observes that this illustrates the rule that only part of any given dream comes true, not the whole (b. Ber. 55a). Rashi, on the other hand, cites a midrash that identifies Joseph's mother with Bilhah, Rachel's slave and surrogate (Gen. Rab. 44.11). Some modern scholars have speculated that the second dream presupposes an earlier form of the story, in which Rachel had not yet passed away.

12–13: Joseph's response, I am ready ("hineni"), recalls instances in which the same Heb word appears in contexts in which earlier fathers were about to lose, or seemed about to lose, their favored sons (22.1, 7, 11; 27.1). 14: How your brothers are, lit. "the shalom of your brothers," is telling, given the absence of "shalom" in the family (see v. 4 n.). Shechem being quite a distance from Hebron, there is room to wonder why Jacob did not foresee danger, even before his beloved son reached his angry brothers. Eventually, Joseph does reach Shechem in peace—after his death him from them. He said, "Let us not take his life." ²² And Reuben went on, "Shed no blood! Cast him into that pit out in the wilderness, but do not touch him yourselves"—intending to save him from them and restore him to his father. ²³ When Joseph came up to his brothers, they stripped Joseph of his tunic, the ornamented tunic that he was wearing, ²⁴ and took him and cast him into the pit. The pit was empty; there was no water in it.

²⁹ When Reuben returned to the pit and saw that Joseph was not in the pit, he rent his clothes. ³⁰ Returning to his brothers, he said, "The boy is gone! Now, what am I to do?" ³¹ Then they took Joseph's tunic, slaughtered a kid, and dipped the tunic in the blood. ³² They had the ornamented tunic taken to their father, and they said, "We found this. Please examine it; is it your son's tunic or not?" ³³ He recognized it, and said, "My son's tunic! A savage beast devoured him! Joseph was torn by a beast!" ³⁴ Jacob rent his clothes, put sackcloth on his loins, and observed mourning for his son many days. ³⁵ All his sons and daughters sought to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted, saying, "No, I will go down mourning to my son in Sheol." Thus his father bewailed him.

³⁶ The Midianites,^a meanwhile, sold him in Egypt to Potiphar, a courtier of Pharaoh and his chief steward.

38 About that time Judah left his brothers and camped near a certain Adullamite whose name was Hirah. ² There Judah saw the daughter of a certain Canaanite whose name was Shua, and he married her and cohabited with her. ³ She conceived and bore a son, and he

(Josh. 24.32)! 23: The clothing and unclotting of Joseph mark pivotal moments in the course of the narrative (cf. 37.3; 39.15-18; 41.14, 42). 25: The brothers' meal displays their extraordinary callousness and insensitivity to human life (cf. Esth. 3.15). Later, the tables turn, and Joseph arranges a meal in which he is the master, and they, his nervous dependents (43.29-34). 26-27: It is Judah's advice that is ultimately heeded, reflecting the importance of this brother elsewhere in the Joseph story. 28: In its current form, the text mentions both Ishmaelite caravaneers (v. 25) and Midianite traders, just as it mentions two different attempts to save Joseph's life, one by Reuben (vv. 21-22, 29-30) and one by Judah (vv. 26-28). Although arguments have been made that Midianites and Ishmaelites are the same group (cf. Judg. 8.24), many modern scholars think the explanation lies in source analysis: Reuben and the Midianites derive from the E version of the story, and Judah and the Ishmaelites from the J version, though it is difficult to find complete J and E versions throughout the narrative. In the story in its current form, it is unclear who is the subject of pulled in v. 28—the brothers or the Midianite traders. One could argue that if it is the latter, Joseph's brothers truly do not know what became of him. But the idea that it was the Midianites rather than the brothers who sold him to the Ishmaelites cannot explain the reports that it is the Midianites who bring him to Egypt (v. 36; cf. 39.1). 30: Reuben's cry is strikingly similar to Rachel's lament in Jer. 31.15. 31: There is a certain poetic justice to the brothers' cruel deception of their father, since Jacob had used kids to deceive his own father (27.5-23). 35: That Jacob refused to be comforted recalls what is said of Rachel in Jer. 31.15, in a lament for the lost members of the nation. See 37.30 n.

38.1-30: Judah and Tamar. This chapter, which treats the origins of the Judahite clans (cf. Num. 26.19-22), is, on the one hand, independent of the novella of Joseph in which it now appears. Note that Judah lives apart from his brothers and already has grown children when the tale begins. On the other hand, a number of verbal and thematic connections to the Joseph story bespeak the exquisite fitness of its placement therein.

named him Er. ⁴She conceived again and bore a son, and named him Onan. ⁵Once again she bore a son, and named him Shelah; he was at Chezib when she bore him.

⁶Judah got a wife for Er his first-born; her name was Tamar. ⁷But Er, Judah's first-born, was displeasing to the LORD, and the LORD took his life. ⁸Then Judah said to Onan, "Join with your brother's wife and do your duty by her as a brother-in-law,^a and provide offspring for your brother." ⁹But Onan, knowing that the seed would not count as his, let it go to waste^b whenever he joined with his brother's wife, so as not to provide offspring for his brother. ¹⁰What he did was displeasing to the LORD, and He took his life also. ¹¹Then Judah said to his daughter-in-law Tamar, "Stay as a widow in your father's house until my son Shelah grows up"—for he thought, "He too might die like his brothers." So Tamar went to live in her father's house.

¹²A long time afterward, Shua's daughter, the wife of Judah, died. When "his period of mourning was over,"^c Judah went up to Timnah to his sheepshearers, together with his friend Hirah the Adullamite. ¹³And Tamar was told, "Your father-in-law is coming up to Timnah for the sheepshearing." ¹⁴So she took off her widow's garb, covered her face with a veil, and, wrapping herself up, sat down at the entrance to Enaim,^d which is on the road to Timnah; for she saw that Shelah was grown up, yet she had not been given to him as wife. ¹⁵When Judah saw her, he took her for a harlot; for she had covered her face. ¹⁶So he turned aside to her by the road and said, "Here, let me sleep with you"—for he did not know that she was his daughter-in-law. "What," she asked, "will you pay for sleeping with me?" ¹⁷He replied, "I will send a kid from my flock." But she said, "You must leave a pledge until you have sent it." ¹⁸And he said, "What pledge shall I give you?" She replied, "Your seal and cord, and the staff which you carry." So he gave them to her and slept with her, and she conceived by him. ¹⁹Then she went on her way. She took off her veil and again put on her widow's garb.

²⁰Judah sent the kid by his friend the Adullamite, to redeem the pledge from the woman; but he could not find her. ²¹He inquired of the people of that town, "Where is the cult prostitute, the one at Enaim, by the road?" But they said, "There has been no prostitute here." ²²So he returned to Judah and said, "I could not find her; moreover,

8: The duty in question, known in English as "levirate marriage," is spelled out in Deut. 25.5–10. If a man dies childless, his brother is obligated to marry his widow, and her first son is reckoned as the offspring of the deceased. In Deuteronomy, the surviving brother can decline and undergo a procedure that the Rabbis named "ḥalitzah," but Gen. ch 38 presupposes a stage in the history of the law in which "ḥalitzah" is still unknown (cf. Ruth 4.5–6). Today, levirate marriage is discouraged and "ḥalitzah" is substituted among traditionally observant Ashkenazic Jews. Some Sephardic groups still practice levirate marriage. 9: Onan would have to expend his own resources to support a child that is legally someone else's, and the child, as the heir to a first-born son, would displace Onan in the line of inheritance to boot.

11: Judah's loss of two sons and reluctance to surrender the third foreshadows the tragic situation of Jacob, who will soon lose Joseph and Simeon (or so it will appear to him) and refuse to surrender Benjamin, as he must if the family is to survive (42.36–38). 14–15: The use of a disguise in pursuit of a purpose that conforms to the will of God (and, in this case, religious law) recalls Jacob's deceit in ch 27. 17: Note the echo of the preceding ch, where a kid also played a key role in deceiving a parent (37.31–35). 21: Cult prostitute and prostitute are the same word in Heb; many scholars doubt that cultic prostitution as it is usually understood existed in ancient Israel. A different term underlies "harlot" in vv. 15, 24.

the townspeople said: There has been no prostitute here.”
 23 Judah said, “Let her keep them, lest we become a laughingstock. I did send her this kid, but you did not find her.”

24 About three months later, Judah was told, “Your daughter-in-law Tamar has played the harlot; in fact, she is with child by harlotry.” “Bring her out,” said Judah, “and let her be burned.” 25 As she was being brought out, she sent this message to her father-in-law, “I am with child by the man to whom these belong.” And she added, “Examine these: whose seal and cord and staff are these?” 26 Judah recognized them, and said, “She is more in the right than I, inasmuch as I did not give her to my son Shelah.” And he was not intimate with her again.

27 When the time came for her to give birth, there were twins in her womb! 28 While she was in labor, one of them put out his hand, and the midwife tied a crimson thread on that hand, to signify: This one came out first. 29 But just then he drew back his hand, and out came his brother; and she said, “What a breach^a you have made for yourself!” So he was named Perez. 30 Afterward his brother came out, on whose hand was the crimson thread; he was named Zerah.^b

39 When Joseph was taken down to Egypt, a certain Egyptian, Potiphar, a courtier of Pharaoh and his chief steward, bought him from the Ishmaelites who had brought him there. 2 The LORD was with Joseph, and he was a successful man; and he stayed in the house of his Egyptian master. 3 And when his master saw that the LORD was with him and that the LORD lent success to everything he undertook, 4 he took a liking to Joseph. He made him his personal attendant and put him in charge of his household, placing in his hands all that he owned. 5 And from the time that the Egyptian put him in charge of his household and of all that he owned, the LORD blessed his house for Joseph’s sake, so that the blessing of the LORD was upon everything that he owned, in the house and outside. 6 He left all that he had in Joseph’s hands and, with him there, he paid attention to nothing save the food that he ate. Now Joseph was well built and handsome.

7 After a time, his master’s wife cast her eyes upon Jo-

24: Tamar’s ostensible capital offense is not prostitution, but adultery (see Deut. 22.23-24), since she is still in a state akin to betrothal to Judah’s family. Adultery is the false charge in the next ch as well (39.7-18). 25: Examine these is identical in the Heb to “Please examine it” in the previous chapter (37.32). These are, in fact, the only two instances of this expression in the Tanakh. Recognition (the same word in Heb) is a major theme in the Joseph story (see also 42.7-8). 26: Tamar’s actions are justified in Judah’s eyes, and in the eyes of the author. She ensured that the family line of Judah was preserved. A midrash in the Talmud sees Judah’s Heb name (which includes every letter of the four-letter name of the LORD) as a reward for his public confession of wrongdoing in this episode (b. Sot. 10b). According to 1 Chron. 4.21, Shelah named his first son Er, suggesting that Judah did finally release him to the first Er’s widow, Tamar. 27-30: The birth story of Perez and Zerah is highly reminiscent of that of Jacob and Esau in 25.21-26. It is from Perez that King David was descended, as reported, for example, in Ruth (Ruth 4.18-22), a book with striking similarities to Gen. ch 38 (see also Ruth 4.11-12).

39.1-23: Joseph in Potiphar’s house. Genesis rejoins the story of Joseph after the digression of ch 38. The bulk of ch 39 centers on the hero’s resistance to seduction and the ensuing false accusation of the spurned matron. It shows remarkable similarities to an Egyptian tale, “The Story of Two Brothers.” Although some dependence is likely, the biblical narrative adapts its prototype to characteristic Israelite theological and ethical convictions. 39.1-6a: As in ch 37, which speaks of Jacob’s preference for Joseph (vv. 3-4), so here the latter is the beneficiary of a mysterious favor, this time from the LORD. One senses that, unbeknownst to all at the time, Jacob’s favoritism for the son of his old age had been the medium for a higher purpose. Like Laban (30.27-30), Potiphar benefits mightily from association with this descendant of Abraham.

6-7: Good looks are often a sign of divine favor in the Tanakh (e.g., 1 Sam. 9.2; 16.12), but here they set the one who bears them up for a potentially catastrophic temptation. A midrash, finding it difficult to believe that Joseph was altogether innocent, likens him to one seph and said, "Lie with me."⁸ But he refused. He said to his master's wife, "Look, with me here, my master gives no thought to anything in this house, and all that he owns he has placed in my hands.⁹ He wields no more authority in this house than I, and he has withheld nothing from me except yourself, since you are his wife. How then could I do this most wicked thing, and sin before God?"¹⁰ And much as she coaxed Joseph day after day, he did not yield to her request to lie beside her, to be with her.

¹¹One such day, he came into the house to do his work. None of the household being there inside, ¹²she caught hold of him by his garment and said, "Lie with me!" But he left his garment in her hand and got away and fled outside. ¹³When she saw that he had left it in her hand and had fled outside, ¹⁴she called out to her servants and said to them, "Look, he had to bring us a Hebrew to dally with us! This one came to lie with me; but I screamed loud. ¹⁵And when he heard me screaming at the top of my voice, he left his garment with me and got away and fled outside."¹⁶ She kept his garment beside her, until his master came home. ¹⁷Then she told him the same story, saying, "The Hebrew slave whom you brought into our house came to me to dally with me; ¹⁸but when I screamed at the top of my voice, he left his garment with me and fled outside."

¹⁹When his master heard the story that his wife told him, namely, "Thus and so your slave did to me," he was furious. ²⁰So Joseph's master had him put in prison, where the king's prisoners were confined. But even while he was there in prison, ²¹the LORD was with Joseph: He extended kindness to him and disposed the chief jailer favorably toward him. ²²The chief jailer put in Joseph's charge all the prisoners who were in that prison, and he was the one to carry out everything that was done there. ²³The chief jailer did not supervise anything that was in Joseph's^a charge, because the LORD was with him, and whatever he did the LORD made successful.

40 Some time later, the cupbearer and the baker of the king of Egypt gave offense to their lord the king of Egypt. ²Pharaoh was angry with his two courtiers, the a Lit. "his."

"who would stand in the market place, put make-up around his eyes, straighten up his hair, and swing his heels." Mrs. Potiphar's proposition was thus a punish-

nance in 37.5–11. One senses that the brash and unreflective teenager of ch 37 has matured into a more responsible man, with the appropriate humility. Joseph's mention of God is his first. No one mentioned the deity in the previous two chs. 12: The garment left in her hand (also in v. 13) contrasts with Potiphar's placing "in his hands all that he owned" (v. 4). The use of a garment as fraudulent evidence recalls Joseph's brothers' displaying the bloodstained tunic to their father (37.31–33) and contrasts with Tamar's truthful presentation to Judah of his "seal and cord and staff" (38.25–26). Note the telling contrast between the woman who attempts to dishonor her marriage without success (Mrs. Potiphar) and the woman who, also acting boldly and seductively, succeeds in implementing the law and thus ensures the survival of her family (Tamar).

14: Her clever phrasing suggests a hope to profit from her staff's resentment of a foreigner and perhaps of their boss as well (he had to bring us a Hebrew). Here she sides with her servants (bring us), whereas in v. 17 she sides with her husband ("whom you brought into our house"), although in both cases she blames him for introducing Joseph into the household. 17–18: Now she blames Joseph primarily, and her husband only indirectly. Note that here (as in v. 15) she describes the garment that was left "in her hand" (v. 12) as with me, instead, subtly disguising her true involvement. 19–23: The tale ends where it began (v. 2), with an affirmation of God's presence in Joseph's affairs and the success it brings. Even in prison, the young man who had been second in rank in his family (37.3) and second in rank in the chief steward's household (vv. 4–6) achieves the same status, when the warden puts him in charge of the other prisoners.

40.1–23: Joseph the dream interpreter. In this chapter, we hear of the second of the three pairs of dreams that mark pivotal mo-

chief cupbearer and the chief baker,³ and put them in custody, in the house of the chief steward, in the same prison house where Joseph was confined.⁴ The chief steward assigned Joseph to them, and he attended them.

When they had been in custody for some time,⁵ both of them—the cupbearer and the baker of the king of Egypt, who were confined in the prison—dreamed in the same night, each his own dream and each dream with its own meaning.⁶ When Joseph came to them in the morning, he saw that they were distraught.⁷ He asked Pharaoh's courtiers, who were with him in custody in his master's house, saying, "Why do you appear downcast today?"⁸ And they said to him, "We had dreams, and there is no one to interpret them." So Joseph said to them, "Surely God can interpret! Tell me [your dreams]."

⁹Then the chief cupbearer told his dream to Joseph. He said to him, "In my dream, there was a vine in front of me.¹⁰ On the vine were three branches. It had barely budded, when out came its blossoms and its clusters ripened into grapes.¹¹ Pharaoh's cup was in my hand, and I took the grapes, pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and placed the cup in Pharaoh's hand."¹² Joseph said to him, "This is its interpretation: The three branches are three days.¹³ In three days Pharaoh will pardon you^a and restore you to your post; you will place Pharaoh's cup in his hand, as was your custom formerly when you were his cupbearer.¹⁴ But think of me when all is well with you again, and do me the kindness of mentioning me to Pharaoh, so as to free me from this place.¹⁵ For in truth, I was kidnapped from the land of the Hebrews; nor have I done anything here that they should have put me in the dungeon."

¹⁶When the chief baker saw how favorably he had interpreted, he said to Joseph, "In my dream, similarly, there were three openwork baskets^b on my head.¹⁷ In the uppermost basket were all kinds of food for Pharaoh that a baker prepares; and the birds were eating it out of the basket above my head."¹⁸ Joseph answered, "This is its interpretation: The three baskets are three days.¹⁹ In three days Pharaoh will lift off your head and depale you upon a pole; and the birds will pick off your flesh."

²⁰On the third day—his birthday—Pharaoh made a banquet for all his officials, and he singled out^c his chief cupbearer and his chief baker from among his officials.²¹ He restored the chief cupbearer to his cupbearing, and

ments in Joseph's life. The first pair (37.5–11) were Joseph's own, and their interpretation came not from him, but from his outraged brothers and incredulous father. Taken for dreams of kingship, they nearly result in the dreamer's death and leave him in slavery (37.18–28). Joseph decodes the second set of dreams himself, through a hitherto unmentioned God-given talent. They treat of the same polarity, favor from the king (v. 13), reminiscent of the nearly lethal favor Joseph received from his father (37.3), on the one hand, and death, on the other (v. 19). 8: Surely God can interpret! may imply a critique of divination practices prominent in the ancient world. The contrast between Joseph, with his God-given talent for dream interpretation, and the bankruptcy of the Egyptian magicians is more pronounced in the next chapter, which deals with Pharaoh's dreams (41.8). The theme foreshadows Moses and Aaron's decisive confrontation with Pharaoh's magicians in Exod. chs 7–11 (see esp. Exod. 8.15). 16–19: The chief baker altogether misses the key point that Joseph's gift for interpretation depends on the grace of God. Instead, he imagines that it is all a matter of technique: Similar dreams must lead to similar interpretations (not an unreasonable expectation in light of the other pairs in 37.5 and 41.1–32). But Joseph notices a crucial detail that the chief baker has missed: Not Pharaoh but birds eat from the basket on his head. Having missed God's grace, the chief baker will be denied Pharaoh's as well.

41 After two years' time, Pharaoh dreamed that he was standing by the Nile,² when out of the Nile there came up seven cows, handsome and sturdy, and they grazed in the reed grass.³ But presently, seven other cows came up from the Nile close behind them, ugly and gaunt, and stood beside the cows on the bank of the Nile;⁴ and the ugly gaunt cows ate up the seven handsome sturdy cows. And Pharaoh awoke.

⁹ The chief cupbearer then spoke up and said to Pharaoh, "I must make mention today of my offenses.¹⁰ Once Pharaoh was angry with his servants, and placed me in custody in the house of the chief steward, together with the chief baker.¹¹ We had dreams the same night, he and I, each of us a dream with a meaning of its own.¹² A Hebrew youth was there with us, a servant of the chief steward; and when we told him our dreams, he interpreted them for us, telling each of the meaning of his dream.¹³ And as he interpreted for us, so it came to pass: I was restored to my post, and the other was impaled."

¹⁴ Thereupon Pharaoh sent for Joseph, and he was rushed from the dungeon. He had his hair cut and changed his clothes, and he appeared before Pharaoh.¹⁵ And Pharaoh said to Joseph, "I have had a dream, but no one can interpret it. Now I have heard it said of you that for you to hear a dream is to tell its meaning."¹⁶ Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, "Not I! God will see to Pharaoh's welfare."

¹⁷ Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, "In my dream, I was standing on the bank of the Nile,¹⁸ when out of the Nile came up seven sturdy and well-formed cows and grazed in the reed grass.¹⁹ Presently there followed them seven other cows, scrawny, ill-formed, and emaciated—never

41.1–57: Joseph interprets Pharaoh's dreams and becomes vizier. Vv. 1–32 deal with the last of the three pairs of dreams in the Joseph story, the dreams of Pharaoh. Vv. 33–57 detail Joseph's unsolicited recommendation of a course to enable Egypt to survive the crisis, and then report the king's enthusiastic appointment of the young Hebrew man to implement his own policy.

1–7: Pharaoh's dreams revert to the pattern of the first pair, Joseph's own (37.5–11), in that they both mean the same thing (v. 32) and deal with the triumph of the weak over the strong. And like the intervening pair, those of the chief cupbearer and chief baker (40.9–22), each of the two dreams deals with themes of good fortune and ill, in that order. 8: See 40.8 n. The inability of the pagan magicians to interpret dreams and accurately predict the future is developed at greater length in Dan. ch 2, a narrative influenced by the Joseph story. Cf. Isa. 41.21–24.

had I seen their likes for ugliness in all the land of Egypt!²⁰ And the seven lean and ugly cows ate up the first seven cows, the sturdy ones;²¹ but when they had consumed them, one could not tell that they had consumed them, for they looked just as bad as before. And I awoke.²² In my other dream, I saw seven ears of grain, full and healthy, growing on a single stalk;²³ but right behind them sprouted seven ears, shriveled, thin, and scorched by the east wind.²⁴ And the thin ears swallowed the seven healthy ears. I have told my magicians, but none has an explanation for me.”

²⁵ And Joseph said to Pharaoh, “Pharaoh’s dreams are one and the same: God has told Pharaoh what He is about to do.²⁶ The seven healthy cows are seven years, and the seven healthy ears are seven years; it is the same dream.²⁷ The seven lean and ugly cows that followed are seven years, as are also the seven empty ears scorched by the east wind; they are seven years of famine.²⁸ It is just as I have told Pharaoh: God has revealed to Pharaoh what He is about to do.²⁹ Immediately ahead are seven years of great abundance in all the land of Egypt.³⁰ After them will come seven years of famine, and all the abundance in the land of Egypt will be forgotten. As the land is ravaged by famine,³¹ no trace of the abundance will be left in the land because of the famine thereafter, for it will be very severe.³² As for Pharaoh having had the same dream twice, it means that the matter has been determined by God, and that God will soon carry it out.

³⁷ The plan pleased Pharaoh and all his courtiers.³⁸ And Pharaoh said to his courtiers, “Could we find another like him, a man in whom is the spirit of God?”³⁹ So Pharaoh said to Joseph, “Since God has made all this known to you, there is none so discerning and wise as you.⁴⁰ You shall be in charge of my court, and by your command shall all my people be directed;^b only with respect to the throne shall I be superior to you.”⁴¹ Pharaoh further said to Joseph, “See, I put you in charge of all the land of Egypt.”⁴² And removing his signet ring from his hand, Pharaoh put it on Joseph’s hand; and he had him dressed in robes of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck.⁴³ He had him ride in the chariot of his second-in-command, and they cried before him, “Abrek!”^a Thus he placed him over all the land of Egypt.

33-36: Unlike the implication of Joseph’s own two dreams (37.5-11), the domination of the weak over the strong is not the last word. Foresight and prudence, Joseph tells Pharaoh, can enable the land to survive catastrophe. As things turn out, the survival of Egypt will have a more particular meaning as well: It foreshadows and enables the healing of the rift between Joseph and his brothers. 40: Joseph is once again second in rank. See 39.19-23 n. Joseph will indeed rule, just as his brothers feared (37.8, 10-11), but with this crucial qualification: His rule will be rooted not in sheer power, but in the benefit he provides to the less fortunate. This corresponds to an ideal of kingship widespread in the ancient Near East, in which the king is the rescuer and servant of the people (cf. Judg. 11.4-11).

⁴⁴ Pharaoh said to Joseph, “I am Pharaoh; yet without you, no one shall lift up hand or foot in all the land of Egypt.”⁴⁵ Pharaoh then gave Joseph the name Zaphenath-paneah;^b and he gave him for a wife Asenath daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On. Thus Joseph emerged in charge of the land of Egypt.—⁴⁶ Joseph was thirty years old when he entered the service of Pharaoh king of Egypt.—Leaving Pharaoh’s presence, Joseph traveled through all the land of Egypt.

⁴⁷ During the seven years of plenty, the land produced in abundance.⁴⁸ And he gathered all the grain of “the seven years that the land of Egypt was enjoying,”^c and stored the grain in the cities; he put in each city the grain of the fields around it.⁴⁹ So Joseph collected produce in very large quantity, like the sands of the sea, until he ceased to measure it, for it could not be measured.

⁵⁰ Before the years of famine came, Joseph became the father of two sons, whom Asenath daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On, bore to him.⁵¹ Joseph named the first-born Manasseh, meaning, “God has made me forget^d completely my hardship and my parental home.”⁵² And the second he named Ephraim, meaning, “God has made me fertile^e in the land of my affliction.”

⁵³ The seven years of abundance that the land of Egypt enjoyed came to an end,⁵⁴ and the seven years of famine set in, just as Joseph had foretold. There was famine in all lands, but throughout the land of Egypt there was bread.⁵⁵ And when all the land of Egypt felt the hunger, the people cried out to Pharaoh for bread; and Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, “Go to Joseph; whatever he tells you, you shall do.”—⁵⁶ Accordingly, when the famine became severe in the land of Egypt, Joseph laid open all that was within, and rationed out grain to the Egyptians. The famine, however, spread over the whole world.⁵⁷ So all

42: This is Joseph’s fifth and final change of clothes. See v. 41.14 n.

45: In Egyptian, Asenath means “the one who belongs to (the goddess) Neith.” Since Jewish law does not recognize any marriage between a Jew and a Gentile (see 26.34–35 n.), Jewish tradition came to interpret Asenath as the prototypical convert to Judaism. Her powerful story is told at length in an important Hellenistic novella, “Joseph and Asenath.” Rabbinic tradition identifies her father, Poti-phaera, with the Potiphar of ch 39 (b. Sot. 13b), but this is unlikely.

51: Saved by the cupbearer’s act of remembrance (vv. 9–13), Joseph nonetheless gives his first-born son a name that celebrates forgetfulness. The family history that he has repressed will, however, return to confront him with great force in the next chapter (42.8–9).

52: Fertility in the land of affliction will eventually prove a mixed blessing. “When the Israelites were fertile and prolific, . . . a new king arose over Egypt who did not know Joseph” (Exod. 1.7–8) and sought to inflict upon them the fate decided for Joseph in Gen. ch 37: enslavement and death (Exod. 1.9–12, 15–22).

the world came to Joseph in Egypt to procure rations, for the famine had become severe throughout the world.

42 When Jacob saw that there were food rations to be had in Egypt, he^a said to his sons, “Why do you keep looking at one another? ²Now I hear,” he went on, “that there are rations to be had in Egypt. Go down and procure rations for us there, that we may live and not die.” ³So ten of Joseph’s brothers went down to get grain rations in Egypt; ⁴for Jacob did not send Joseph’s brother Benjamin with his brothers, since he feared that he might meet with disaster. ⁵Thus the sons of Israel were among those who came to procure rations, for the famine extended to the land of Canaan.

⁶Now Joseph was the vizier of the land; it was he who dispensed rations to all the people of the land. And Joseph’s brothers came and bowed low to him, with their faces to the ground. ⁷When Joseph saw his brothers, he recognized them; but he acted like a stranger toward them and spoke harshly to them. He asked them, “Where do you come from?” And they said, “From the land of Canaan, to procure food.” ⁸For though Joseph recognized his brothers, they did not recognize him. ⁹Recalling the dreams that he had dreamed about them, Joseph said to them, “You are spies, you have come to see the land in its nakedness.” ¹⁰But they said to him, “No, my lord! Truly, your servants have come to procure food. ¹¹We are all of us sons of the same man; we are honest men; your servants have never been spies!” ¹²And he said to them, “No, you have come to see the land in its nakedness!” ¹³And they replied, “We your servants were twelve brothers, sons of a certain man in the land of Canaan; the youngest, however, is now with our father, and one is no more.” ¹⁴But Joseph said to them, “It is just as I have told you: You are spies! ¹⁵By this you shall be put to the test: unless your youngest brother comes here, by Pharaoh, you shall not depart from this place! ¹⁶Let one of you go and bring your brother, while the rest of you remain confined, that your words may be put to the test whether there is truth in you. Else, by Pharaoh, you are nothing but spies!” ¹⁷And he confined them in the guardhouse for three days.

¹⁸On the third day Joseph said to them, “Do this and you shall live, for I am a God-fearing man. ¹⁹If you are honest men, let one of you brothers be held in your place of detention, while the rest of you go and take home rations for your starving households; ²⁰but you must bring me your youngest brother, that your words may be verified and that you may not die." And they did accordingly. ²¹They said to one another, "Alas, we are being punished on account of our brother, because we looked on at his anguish, yet paid no heed as he pleaded with us. That is why this distress has come upon us." ²²Then Reuben spoke up and said to them, "Did I not tell you, 'Do no wrong to the boy'? But you paid no heed. Now comes the reckoning for his blood." ²³They did not know that Joseph understood, for there was an interpreter between him and them. ²⁴He turned away from them and wept. But he came back to them and spoke to them; and he took Simeon from among them and had him bound before their eyes. ²⁵Then Joseph gave orders to fill their bags with grain, return each one's money to his sack, and give them provisions for the journey; and this was done for them. ²⁶So they loaded their asses with the rations and departed from there.

42.1–38: The first reunion of Joseph and his brothers. In this chapter, Joseph and his brothers meet again, though in radically different and, in fact, reversed roles from the ones in which we last saw them (ch 37). Now, just as he has dreamt, it is they who are the subordinates, and, moreover, he is the only one who recognizes the situation. Joseph reenacts his brothers’ mistreatment of him, only with them now as the victims—and with a dose of mercy altogether missing in ch 37 (with the exception of Reuben’s botched attempt to rescue him). 3–4: Once again, Jacob shows preference for a son of Rachel (cf. 37.3). As the events unfold, Benjamin, Joseph’s only full brother and the youngest of the brood, serves as Joseph’s alter ego. 6: Their prostration fulfills the dreams of 37.5–11. Little did anyone suspect at the time, however, that their prostration would be in supplication for their very lives or that Joseph would keep them from death. 9: To see the land in its nakedness recalls the episode in ch 39, in which Joseph is unfairly accused (and convicted) of a sexual crime (see 9.22–24 n.). 11: The first clause is truer than the brothers recognize; the second remains to be established; only the third is straightforward fact. 13–14: Having lied to their father about Joseph’s fate (37.31–33), the brothers now find themselves unable to convince Pharaoh’s vizier of the truth. The Heb of the clause and one is no more echoes Reuben’s cry of desperation in 37.30 (cf. 42.36). 15–17: By reaffirming the specialness of the favored son, Joseph’s test requires the brothers to confront anew the factor that led them to commit their infamous crime. Having taken one “child of [Jacob’s] old age” (37.3) away from his father on the basest motivation, they must now persuade the old man to give up his stand-in (cf. 44.20) in the interest of life itself. Similarly, their imprisonment reenacts Joseph’s own fate after they sold or abandoned him (39.1, 20).

²⁹When they came to their father Jacob in the land of Canaan, they told him all that had befallen them, saying, ³⁰"The man who is lord of the land spoke harshly to us and accused us of spying on the land. ³¹We said to him, 'We are honest men; we have never been spies! ³²There were twelve of us brothers, sons by the same father; but one is no more, and the youngest is now with our father in the land of Canaan.' ³³But the man who is lord of the land said to us, 'By this I shall know that you are honest men: leave one of your brothers with me, and take something for your starving households and be off. ³⁴And bring your youngest brother to me, that I may know that you are not spies but honest men. I will then restore your brother to you, and you shall be free to move about in the land.' "

³⁵As they were emptying their sacks, there, in each one's sack, was his money-bag! When they and their father saw their money-bags, they were dismayed. ³⁶Their father Jacob said to them, "It is always me that you be-leave: Joseph is no more and Simeon is no more, and now you would take away Benjamin. These things always happen to me!" ³⁷Then Reuben said to his father, "You may kill my two sons if I do not bring him back to you. Put him in my care, and I will return him to you." ³⁸But he said, "My son must not go down with you, for his brother is dead and he alone is left. If he meets with disaster on the journey you are taking, you will send my white head down to Sheol in grief.”

43 But the famine in the land was severe. ²And when they had eaten up the rations which they had brought from Egypt, their father said to them, “Go again and procure some food for us.” ³But Judah said to him, “The man warned us, ‘Do not let me see your faces’ unless your brother is with you.’ ⁴If you will let our brother go with us, we will go down and procure food for you; ⁵but if you will not let him go, we will not go down, for the man said to us, ‘Do not let me see your faces’ unless your brother is with you.’” ⁶And Israel said, “Why did you serve me so ill as to tell the man that you had another brother?” ⁷They replied, “But the man kept asking about us and our family, saying, ‘Is your father still living? Have you another brother?’ And we answered him accordingly. How were we to know that he would say, ‘Bring your brother here?’”

⁸Then Judah said to his father Israel, “Send the boy in my care, and let us be on our way, that we may live and not die—you and we and our children. ⁹I myself will be surety for him; you may hold me responsible: if I do not bring him back to you and set him before you, I shall stand guilty before you forever. ¹⁰For we could have been there and back twice if we had not dawdled.”

¹⁵So the men took that gift, and they took with them double the money, as well as Benjamin. They made their way down to Egypt, where they presented themselves to Joseph. ¹⁶When Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to his house steward, “Take the men into the house; slaughter and prepare an animal, for the men will dine with me at noon.” ¹⁷The man did as Joseph said, and he brought the men into Joseph’s house. ¹⁸But the men were 43.1–34: The brothers’ second trip to Egypt. Chs 43–45 repeat the pattern of ch 42, only with variations, greater detail, and much greater emotional tension. Once again, the brothers depart for Egypt, approach Joseph fearfully, find themselves subjected to a frightening test of their honesty as well as accusations of deceit, and once again they return to their father. Ch 43 records, first, Judah’s persuasion of a reluctant Jacob to release his beloved Benjamin and, second, the ensuing encounter of Joseph and his brothers—this time all eleven of them. 6–8: Jacob, to whom the brothers once lied about Joseph (37.31–35), now accuses them of telling too much of the truth. The brothers are, in fact, still lying, though with a more benign intention. For, according to 42.9–13, they volunteered the information about their youngest brother.

9: Surety (Heb “arav”) recalls the “pledge” (“eravon”) that Judah offered Tamar in 38.17. In this speech, Judah persuades his father, who believes he has lost two sons, to surrender the third—exactly the act that he had dangerously sought to avoid in ch 38. The commercial terminology is especially apt on the lips of the son that suggested his brother be sold (37.26–27). 11: As in 37.21–30, Judah’s plan succeeds where Reuben’s had failed (42.37–38). This is another indication that one function of the Joseph story is to explain why Joseph (the dominant tribe of the North) and Judah (the royal tribe of the South) became more important than Reuben (the first-born). See 1 Chron. 5.1–2. The balm and ladanum (a fragrant resin) recall the commodities conveyed by the Ishmaelite caravan in 37.25. Once again, Jacob’s beloved son is being brought to Egypt—only this time with his father’s knowledge and consent and as a sign (unknown to all but Joseph) of healing rather than estrangement.

frightened at being brought into Joseph's house. "It must be," they thought, "because of the money replaced in our bags the first time that we have been brought inside, as a pretext to attack us and seize us as slaves, with our pack animals." ¹⁹So they went up to Joseph's house steward and spoke to him at the entrance of the house. ²⁰"If you please, my lord," they said, "we came down once before to procure food. ²¹But when we arrived at the night encampment and opened our bags, there was each one's money in the mouth of his bag, our money in full.^a So we have brought it back with us. ²²And we have brought down with us other money to procure food. We do not know who put the money in our bags." ²³He replied, "All is well with you; do not be afraid. Your God, the God of your father, must have put treasure in your bags for you. I got your payment." And he brought out Simeon to them.

²⁶When Joseph came home, they presented to him the gifts that they had brought with them into the house, bowing low before him to the ground. ²⁷He greeted them, and he said, "How is your aged father of whom you spoke? Is he still in good health?" ²⁸They replied, "It is well with your servant our father; he is still in good health." And they bowed and made obeisance.

²⁹Looking about, he saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and asked, "Is this your youngest brother of whom you spoke to me?" And he went on, "May God be gracious to you, my boy." ³⁰With that, Joseph hurried out, for he was overcome with feeling toward his brother and was on the verge of tears; he went into a room and wept there. ³¹Then he washed his face, reappeared, and—now in control of himself—gave the order, "Serve the meal." ³²They served him by himself, and them by themselves, and the Egyptians who ate with him by themselves; for the Egyptians could not dine with the Hebrews, since that would be abhorrent to the Egyptians. ³³As they were seated by his direction, from the oldest in the order of his seniority to the youngest in the order of his youth, the men looked at one another in astonishment. ³⁴Portions were served them from his table; but Benjamin's portion was several^b times that of anyone else. And they drank their fill with him.

23: Joseph's steward senses the hand of a beneficent providence in these strange events. Much to their surprise, the brothers' honesty works to their advantage. It even restores one lost brother, the hostage Simeon. 30–31: Joseph's emotion is described as more intense here than in 42.24. The harsh self-presentation of Pharaoh's vizier is rapidly yielding to the Hebrew man's love of father and brothers. 32: It is unclear why Egyptians would find it abhorrent to dine with Hebrews. The phenomenon is probably connected to the reports that Egyptians found shepherds to be "abhorrent" (46.34; cf. Exod. 8.22), a tradition lacking historical corroboration. 33–34: Joseph no sooner reaffirms the principle of seniority—the brothers are amazed that the Egyptian vizier knows their order of birth—than he reenacts the favoritism for the youngest that once proved so problematic to the family. This time, however, the brothers show no resentment. This meal contrasts poignantly with the meal to which the brothers sat down after throwing Joseph into the pit (37.25; see also 42.21).

44 Then he instructed his house steward as follows, “Fill the men’s bags with food, as much as they can carry, and put each one’s money in the mouth of his bag. ²Put my silver goblet in the mouth of the bag of the youngest one, together with his money for the rations.” And he did as Joseph told him.

³With the first light of morning, the men were sent off with their pack animals. ⁴They had just left the city and had not gone far, when Joseph said to his steward, “Up, go after the men! And when you overtake them, say to them, ‘Why did you repay good with evil? ⁵It is the very one from which my master drinks and which he uses for divination. It was a wicked thing for you to do!’”

⁶He overtook them and spoke those words to them. ⁷And they said to him, “Why does my lord say such things? Far be it from your servants to do anything of the kind! ⁸Here we brought back to you from the land of Canaan the money that we found in the mouths of our bags. How then could we have stolen any silver or gold from your master’s house! ⁹Whichever of your servants it is found with shall die; the rest of us, moreover, shall become slaves to my lord.” ¹⁰He replied, “Although what you are proposing is right, only the one with whom it is found shall be my slave; but the rest of you shall go free.”

¹¹So each one hastened to lower his bag to the ground, and each one opened his bag. ¹²He searched, beginning with the oldest and ending with the youngest; and the goblet turned up in Benjamin’s bag. ¹³At this they rent their clothes. Each reloaded his pack animal, and they returned to the city.

¹⁴When Judah and his brothers reentered the house of Joseph, who was still there, they threw themselves on the ground before him. ¹⁵Joseph said to them, “What is this deed that you have done? Do you not know that a man like me practices divination?” ¹⁶Judah replied, “What can we say to my lord? How can we plead, how can we prove our innocence? God has uncovered the crime of your servants. Here we are, then, slaves of my lord, the rest of us as much as he in whose possession the goblet was found.” ¹⁷But he replied, “Far be it from me to act thus! Only he in whose possession the goblet was found shall be my slave; the rest of you go back in peace to your father.”

44.1–17: The incident of the silver goblet. This passage recalls Joseph’s clandestine return of his brothers’ money to their sacks (42.25–38), except this time Joseph specifically targets Jacob’s favored son (and Joseph’s stand-in), Benjamin (absent in the prior episode). This seems to be a test: Will the older ten brothers jettison Benjamin when his presence becomes inconvenient, as they once did Joseph, or have they finally learned the painful lesson about family solidarity and filial obedience?

5: It is the very one from which my master drinks seems abrupt. An ancient Jewish translation (the Septuagint) gives evidence that a second question, “Why have you stolen my silver goblet?” once followed the one at the end of v. 4. In contrast to other passages in the Torah (Lev. 19.26; Num. 23.23; Deut. 18.10–11), divination (fortune-telling) is not here condemned (cf. 30.27). The practice suggests Joseph’s ominous dreams, the immediate cause of his brothers’ selling him into slavery, and the silver of the goblet recalls the “twenty pieces of silver” they received for selling him (37.18–28). 7–9: The accusation strikingly recalls Laban’s charge that Jacob had stolen his household icons (31.25–37). The latter’s defense, “anyone with whom you find your gods shall not remain alive!” (31.32) is probably connected to Rachel’s premature death giving birth to Benjamin (35.16–20). Here, too, the curse involves death for the malefactor, but it also entails slavery for the rest of the brothers (44.9). Not coincidentally, death and slavery were the two punishments that the brothers plotted to inflict on Joseph in 37.18–28. 14–17: Judah again assumes the leading position (see 43.11 n.). Having devised the plan to sell Joseph into slavery (37.26–27), he now offers to accept slavery upon himself and his brothers rather than abandon Benjamin, as he (and they, with the exception of the ineffectual Reuben) had once callously and criminally abandoned Joseph. 17: Joseph forces his older brothers to face other brother?' ²⁰We told my lord, 'We have an old father, and there is a child of his old age, the youngest; his full brother is dead, so that he alone is left of his mother, and his father dotes on him.' ²¹Then you said to your servants, 'Bring him down to me, that I may set eyes on him.' ²²We said to my lord, 'The boy cannot leave his father; if he were to leave him, his father would die.' ²³But you said to your servants, 'Unless your youngest brother comes down with you, do not let me see your faces.' ²⁴When we came back to your servant my father, we reported my lord's words to him.

²⁵'Later our father said, 'Go back and procure some food for us.' ²⁶We answered, 'We cannot go down; only if our youngest brother is with us can we go down, for we may not ^ashow our faces to the man^a unless our youngest brother is with us.' ²⁷Your servant my father said to us, 'As you know, my wife bore me two sons. ²⁸But one is gone from me, and I said: Alas, he was torn by a beast! And I have not seen him since. ²⁹If you take this one from me, too, and he meets with disaster, you will send my white head down to Sheol in sorrow.'

³⁰'Now, if I come to your servant my father and the boy is not with us—since his own life is so bound up with his—³¹when he sees that the boy is not with us, he will die, and your servants will send the white head of your servant our father down to Sheol in grief. ³²Now your servant has pledged himself for the boy to my father, saying, 'If I do not bring him back to you, I shall stand guilty before my father forever.' ³³Therefore, please let your servant remain as a slave to my lord instead of the boy, and let the boy go back with his brothers. ³⁴For how can I go back to my father unless the boy is with me? Let me not be witness to the woe that would overtake my father!'

45 Joseph could no longer control himself before all his attendants, and he cried out, "Have everyone withdraw from me!" So there was no one else about when Joseph made himself known to his brothers. ²His sobs were so loud that the Egyptians could hear, and so the news reached Pharaoh's palace.

³Joseph said to his brothers, "I am Joseph. Is my father still well?" But his brothers could not answer him, so dumfounded were they on account of him.

⁴Then Joseph said to his brothers, "Come forward to me." And when they came forward, he said, "I am your brother Joseph, he whom you sold into Egypt. ⁵Now, do and, moreover, to accept the special place that Benjamin (Joseph's alter ego) has in his father's heart.

44.18–45.28: The turning point. With all apparently lost and Benjamin about to enter into slavery (and Jacob about to die as a result), Judah again assumes the lead role, with results that amaze all concerned. 18: "Va-Yiggash," translated here as went up, appears also in the introduction to Abraham's bold intercession for Sodom in 18.23 (where it is rendered "came forward"). Both Judah's speech and Abraham's exhibit a delicate balance of deference and assertion, and both succeed in moving the addressee from judgment to mercy. Abraham's argument, however, rests on the possibility that there is an innocent minority in the evil city (18.23–32), whereas Judah makes no argument for Benjamin's innocence (even if he believed in it, he could hardly make the case without incriminating Joseph or his staff). Instead, he appeals to the vizier's compassion for the foreigners' father and courageously offers himself in Benjamin's stead. 30–31: Judah is unwittingly accusing Pharaoh's vizier of killing his own father, catching Joseph in his own stratagem. 32–33: See 43.9 n., where the same verb ("arav," "pledged himself") appears. 33: Judah offers to take the place of Benjamin, who takes the place of Joseph (vv. 27–28). The brother responsible for selling Joseph into slavery (37.26–27) now freely offers himself as a slave to Joseph in order to save Jacob's life. Things have come full circle, and the long-standing and nearly fatal rift in the family is about to be healed. 45.4–8: Joseph no sooner reminds his brothers of their great sin (v. 4) than he renounces retribution, interpreting the events that have overtaken the House of Israel as he had interpreted Pharaoh's dreams (41.25–36): God has arranged things so that the disaster (though very real and very painful) is not the last word. The last word is a word of life, not death (vv. 5–8;

not be distressed or reproach yourselves because you sold me hither; it was to save life that God sent me ahead of you. ⁶It is now two years that there has been famine in the land, and there are still five years to come in which there shall be no yield from tilling. ⁷God has sent me ahead of you to ensure your survival on earth, and to save your lives in an extraordinary deliverance. ⁸So, it was not you who sent me here, but God; and He has made me a father to Pharaoh, lord of all his household, and ruler over the whole land of Egypt.

⁹“Now, hurry back to my father and say to him: Thus says your son Joseph, ‘God has made me lord of all Egypt; come down to me without delay. ¹⁰You will dwell in the region of Goshen, where you will be near me—you and your children and your grandchildren, your flocks and herds, and all that is yours. ¹¹There I will provide for you—for there are yet five years of famine to come—that you and your household and all that is yours may not suffer want.’ ¹²You can see for yourselves, and my brother Benjamin for himself, that it is indeed I who am speaking to you. ¹³And you must tell my father everything about my high station in Egypt and all that you have seen; and bring my father here with all speed.”

¹⁴With that he embraced^a his brother Benjamin around the neck and wept, and Benjamin wept on his neck. ¹⁵He kissed all his brothers and wept upon them; only then were his brothers able to talk to him.

¹⁶The news reached Pharaoh’s palace: “Joseph’s brothers have come.” Pharaoh and his courtiers were pleased. ¹⁷And Pharaoh said to Joseph, “Say to your brothers, ‘Do as follows: load up your beasts and go at once to the land of Canaan. ¹⁸Take your father and your households and come to me; I will give you the best of the land of Egypt and you shall live off the fat of the land.’ ¹⁹And you are bidden [to add], ‘Do as follows: take from the land of Egypt wagons for your children and your wives, and bring your father here. ²⁰And never mind your belongings, for the best of all the land of Egypt shall be yours.’”

²¹The sons of Israel did so; Joseph gave them wagons as Pharaoh had commanded, and he supplied them with provisions for the journey. ²²To each of them, moreover, he gave a change of clothing; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver and several^b changes of clothing. ²³And to his father he sent the following: ten he-asses laden with the best things of Egypt, and ten she-asses laden with grain, bread, and provisions for his fa-

cf. 50.19–21). Father to Pharaoh (v. 8) has some parallels in Egyptian, and seems to denote Joseph’s office of vizier and head counselor. Ruler over the whole land of Egypt echoes the brothers’ angry and incredulous question in 37.8

(“Do you mean to rule over us?”).

⁹: Come down to me recalls Jacob’s plaintive words in 37.35, “I will go down mourning to my son in Sheol.” Now he goes down to Joseph not in Sheol, but in Egypt, over which the once rejected son now rules by the grace of God.

¹⁴: The scene is highly reminiscent of the reconciliation of Esau and Jacob in 33.4. ²²: Joseph’s giving extra clothing to Benjamin recalls Jacob’s giving him an “ornamental tunic” in 37.3. The fraternal reconciliation does not mean that the old favoritism has come to an end and all the brothers are equal. It means, rather, that all concerned are now at last able to live with and accept the favoritism with grace and good will. ²⁴: Rashi thinks the plain sense is that the brothers should refrain from blaming each other for the sale of Joseph and for defaming him so as to make him hateful to them—not bad advice in light of past experience (42.22).

ther on the journey. ²⁴ As he sent his brothers off on their way, he told them, “Do not be quarrelsome on the way.”

²⁵ They went up from Egypt and came to their father Jacob in the land of Canaan. ²⁶ And they told him, “Joseph is still alive; yes, he is ruler over the whole land of Egypt.” His heart went numb, for he did not believe them. ²⁷ But when they recounted all that Joseph had said to them, and when he saw the wagons that Joseph had sent to transport him, the spirit of their father Jacob revived. ²⁸ “Enough!” said Israel. “My son Joseph is still alive! I must go and see him before I die.”

46 So Israel set out with all that was his, and he came to Beer-sheba, where he offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac. ² God called to Israel in a vision by night: “Jacob! Jacob!” He answered, “Here.” ³ And He said, “I am God, the God of your father. Fear not to go down to Egypt, for I will make you there into a great nation. ⁴ I Myself will go down with you to Egypt, and I Myself will also bring you back; and Joseph’s hand shall close your eyes.”

⁵ So Jacob set out from Beer-sheba. The sons of Israel put their father Jacob and their children and their wives in the wagons that Pharaoh had sent to transport him; ⁶ and they took along their livestock and the wealth that they had amassed in the land of Canaan. Thus Jacob and all his offspring with him came to Egypt: ⁷ he brought with him to Egypt his sons and grandsons, his daughters and granddaughters—all his offspring.

46.1–7: Jacob sets out for Egypt. With Jacob’s departure for Egypt, the tale of Joseph rejoins the patriarchal story from which it separated when Joseph was sold into slavery in ch 37. At the same time, these verses look forward to the next seemingly inseparable challenge to the House of Israel, the affliction in Egypt. 2–4: God’s only speech in chs 37–50 reiterates the promise to Abraham and Isaac (cf. 12.2–3; 26.2–5), assuring Jacob that his departure from the promised land will not void God’s commitment to his forebears. I Myself will also bring you back (v. 4) looks forward to the exodus and underscores the fact that, as the Passover Haggadah puts it, “Our father Jacob did not come down to strike roots in Egypt but only to sojourn there.” Joseph’s hand shall close your eyes (v. 4) means that Joseph will lovingly attend to his father’s needs at the moment of the latter’s death.

46.8–27: Joseph’s household. A list of Jacob’s children and grandchildren interrupts the account of his journey to Egypt. 12: The mention of Er and Onan who died in the land of Canaan indicates that the list was once independent of its current role as a census of the Israelites who came to Egypt (v. 8). 15: The figure 33 requires that Er and Onan be counted but Dinah be excluded, despite the unambiguous expression male and female. If we replace Judah’s two deceased sons with Dinah, we arrive at a figure of 32 descendants of Leah—exactly twice the number of her handmaiden Zilpah (v. 18). The symmetry with Rachel, who has twice as many descendants as her handmaiden Bilhah (vv. 22, 25), commends this interpretation. In order to reach 33, we must then count Jacob himself in the census. A midrash solves the problem by postulating that Moses’ mother, Jochebed (Exod. 6.20), was born between the city walls as her parents entered Egypt (i.e., she was counted before she was named)—hence the plural “daughters” in v. 7 (b. B. Bat. 123b).

Laban had given to his daughter Leah. These she bore to Jacob—16 persons.

¹⁹The sons of Jacob's wife Rachel were Joseph and Benjamin. ²⁰To Joseph were born in the land of Egypt Manasseh and Ephraim, whom Asenath daughter of Poti-phaera priest of On bore to him. ²¹Benjamin's sons: Bela, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, Huppim, and Ard. ²²These were the descendants of Rachel who were born to Jacob—14 persons in all.

²³Dan's son:^a Hushim. ²⁴Naphtali's sons: Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shillem. ²⁵These were the descendants of Bilhah, whom Laban had given to his daughter Rachel. These she bore to Jacob—7 persons in all.

²⁶All the persons belonging to Jacob who came to Egypt^b—his own issue, aside from the wives of Jacob's sons—all these persons numbered 66. ²⁷And Joseph's sons who were born to him in Egypt were two in number. Thus the total of Jacob's household who came to Egypt was seventy persons.^c

²⁸He had sent Judah ahead of him to Joseph, to point the way before him to Goshen. So when they came to the region of Goshen, ²⁹Joseph ordered^d his chariot and went to Goshen to meet his father Israel; he presented himself to him and, embracing him around the neck, he wept on his neck a good while. ³⁰Then Israel said to Joseph, "Now I can die, having seen for myself that you are still alive."

³¹Then Joseph said to his brothers and to his father's household, "I will go up and tell the news to Pharaoh, and say to him, 'My brothers and my father's household, who were in the land of Canaan, have come to me. ³²The men are shepherds; they have always been breeders of livestock, and they have brought with them their flocks and herds and all that is theirs.' ³³So when Pharaoh summons you and asks, 'What is your occupation?' ³⁴you shall answer, 'Your servants have been breeders of livestock from the start until now, both we and our fathers'—so that you may stay in the region of Goshen. For all shepherds are abhorrent to Egyptians."

47 Then Joseph came and reported to Pharaoh, saying, "My father and my brothers, with their flocks and herds and all that is theirs, have come from the land of Canaan and are now in the region of Goshen." ²And selecting

27: Seventy persons, seventy was considered a perfect number. The quest for progeny—the fulfillment of the promise to Abraham—is now complete. The opening verses of Exodus will recapitulate the numbering of Jacob's family and continue the narrative with the quest for the land promised to Abraham.

46.28–30: The reunion of father and son. The narrative of Jacob's journey to Egypt resumes after the census of vv. 8–27. Having seen for himself that his beloved son lives and that his own life has been fulfilled beyond his wildest dreams, the elderly Jacob is at last prepared to accept his death (contrast 37.35; 42.38).

46.31–47.12: Audience with Pharaoh. Joseph carefully prepares his family for an audience in the royal court. He presents his brothers and then his father to the king of Egypt (the family members make their appearances in the same order as in his dreams in 37.5–11). 46.34: Goshen is a fertile region in the eastern delta of the Nile. It is unclear why all shepherds are abhorrent to Egyptians. Pharaoh has herds of his own (47.6). Some scholars connect this with a late folk etymology of "Hyksos" associated with the Egyptian word for "shepherd." The Hyksos were a Syro-Palestinian group who ruled Lower Egypt about 1680–1540 BCE.

a few^a of his brothers, he presented them to Pharaoh. ³Pharaoh said to his brothers, "What is your occupation?" They answered Pharaoh, "We your servants are shepherds, as were also our fathers. ⁴We have come," they told Pharaoh, "to sojourn in this land, for there is no pasture for your servants' flocks, the famine being severe in the land of Canaan. Pray, then, let your servants stay in the region of Goshen." ⁵Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, "As regards your father and your brothers who have come to you, ⁶the land of Egypt is open before you: settle your father and your brothers in the best part of the land; let them stay in the region of Goshen. And if you know any capable men among them, put them in charge of my livestock."

⁷Joseph then brought his father Jacob and presented him to Pharaoh; and Jacob greeted Pharaoh. ⁸Pharaoh asked Jacob, "How many are the years of your life?" ⁹And Jacob answered Pharaoh, "The years of my sojourn [on earth] are one hundred and thirty. Few and hard have been the years of my life, nor do they come up to the life spans of my fathers during their sojourns." ¹⁰Then Jacob bade Pharaoh farewell, and left Pharaoh's presence.

¹³Now there was no bread in all the world, for the famine was very severe; both the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan languished because of the famine. ¹⁴Joseph gathered in all the money that was to be found in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan, as payment for the rations that were being procured, and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's palace. ¹⁵And when the money gave out in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came to Joseph and said, "Give us bread, lest we die before your very eyes; for the money is gone!" ¹⁶And Joseph said, "Bring your livestock, and I will sell to you against your livestock, if the money is gone." ¹⁷So they brought their livestock to Joseph, and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for the horses, for the stocks of sheep and cattle, and the asses; thus he provided them with bread that year in exchange for all their livestock. ¹⁸And when that year was ended, they came to him the next year and said to him, "We cannot hide from my lord that, with all the money and animal stocks consigned to

47.9: Since Jacob dies at 147 (47.28), he has two periods of seventeen years with Joseph, the first seventeen of the latter's life (37.2) and the last seventeen of his own. See 25.7 n.; 35.28 n. 10: Bade . . . farewell can also be translated "blessed." The theme that contact with the family of Abraham results in blessing for Gentiles (or at least for those Gentiles who treat them well) is widespread in Genesis (12.3; 22.18; 26.4; 28.14; 30.27–30; 39.5, 23).

47.13–27: Joseph saves and enslaves the Egyptians. This passage describes the progressive impoverishment of the Egyptian population, Joseph's rescue of them through skillful administration, and, finally and most troublingly, his enslavement of them to Pharaoh. The tables have indeed turned: The man who was brought to Egypt as a slave now reduces the Egyptians to slavery, all the while, however, saving their lives, just as he saved the lives of his own family. The cruelty of Joseph's enslavement of Egypt does not seem to bother the narrator. When Joseph died, however, and "a new king arose over Egypt who did not know Joseph" (Exod. 1.8), the House of Israel found themselves once again on the wrong end of the enslavement process.

my lord, nothing is left at my lord's disposal save our persons and our farmland. ¹⁹Let us not perish before your eyes, both we and our land. Take us and our land in exchange for bread, and we with our land will be serfs to Pharaoh; provide the seed, that we may live and not die, and that the land may not become a waste."

²⁰So Joseph gained possession of all the farm land of Egypt for Pharaoh, every Egyptian having sold his field because the famine was too much for them; thus the land passed over to Pharaoh. ²¹And he removed the population town by town,^a from one end of Egypt's border to the other. ²²Only the land of the priests he did not take over, for the priests had an allotment from Pharaoh, and they lived off the allotment which Pharaoh had made to them; therefore they did not sell their land.

²³Then Joseph said to the people, "Whereas I have this day acquired you and your land for Pharaoh, here is seed for you to sow the land. ²⁴And when harvest comes, you shall give one-fifth to Pharaoh, and four-fifths shall be yours as seed for the fields and as food for you and those in your households, and as nourishment for your children." ²⁵And they said, "You have saved our lives! We are grateful to my lord, and we shall be serfs to Pharaoh." ²⁶And Joseph made it into a land law in Egypt, which is still valid, that a fifth should be Pharaoh's; only the land of the priests did not become Pharaoh's.

²⁷Thus Israel settled in the country of Egypt, in the region of Goshen; they acquired holdings in it, and were fertile and increased greatly.

²⁸Jacob lived seventeen years in the land of Egypt, so that the span of Jacob's life came to one hundred and forty-seven years. ²⁹And when the time approached for Israel to die, he summoned his son Joseph and said to him, "Do me this favor, place your hand under my thigh as a pledge of your steadfast loyalty: please do not bury me in Egypt. ³⁰When I lie down with my fathers, take me up from Egypt and bury me in their burial-place." He replied, "I will do as you have spoken." ³¹And he said, "Swear to me." And he swore to him. Then Israel bowed at the head of the bed.

48 Some time afterward, Joseph was told, "Your father is ill." So he took with him his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. ²When Jacob was told, "Your son Jo-

21: The Masoretic Text seems to refer to a forced transfer of the rural population as part of the program of nationalization of the farmland. Other versions evidence a slightly variant wording with a very different meaning: "He made the population into slaves."

27: Whereas the Egyptians lose their land to Pharaoh because of Joseph's administrative policy, the Israelites acquire holdings through the generosity of Pharaoh, grateful for Joseph's managerial skills. Similarly, the fertility and increase of Israel contrasts with the devastation and impoverishment of the Egyptians, once again underscoring the special role of the former in God's designs.

47.28-48.22: Jacob's deathbed adoption of Joseph's sons. As befits a deathbed scene, this passage looks both to the past and to the future. Jacob gives a retrospective of his experience of the patriarchal promise and his loss of his favored wife, Rachel (48.3-7), but he also makes Joseph promise to bury him in the promised land (47.29-30), thus reiterating and deepening familial devotion to the patrimony of which they have yet to take possession. Similarly, Jacob's blessing of Joseph's two sons, in the reverse of the birth order (48.8-20), looks back to his own supplanting of his older brother early in life (25.22-33; 27.1-45), but it also authorizes the establishment of Ephraim and Manasseh in the twelve-tribe league that was to be biblical Israel 47.28: See 35.28 n. 29-30: The scene recalls that of 24.2-9. Once again the patriarchal promise is at risk, and once again an ailing and aged patriarch solemnly undertakes to reconnect with the family tradition. 31: The meaning of Jacob/Israel's bowing is unclear (cf. 1 Kings 1.47). If he bows to Joseph, he fulfills the second of the latter's two predictive dreams (37.9-10). 48.3: On El Shaddai, see 17.1 n. 5-7: Jacob adopts his two grandsons born in Egypt, explaining this by reference to his affection for their departed grandmother, Rachel. ³And Jacob said to Joseph, “El Shaddai appeared to me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and He blessed me, ⁴and said to me, ‘I will make you fertile and numerous, making of you a community of peoples; and I will assign this land to your offspring to come for an everlasting possession.’ ⁵Now, your two sons, who were born to you in the land of Egypt before I came to you in Egypt, shall be mine; Ephraim and Manasseh shall be mine no less than Reuben and Simeon. ⁶But progeny born to you after them shall be yours; they shall be recorded instead^a of their brothers in their inheritance. ⁷I [do this because], when I was returning from Paddan, Rachel died, to my sorrow, while I was journeying in the land of Canaan, when still some distance short of Ephrath; and I buried her there on the road to Ephrath”—now Bethlehem.

⁸Noticing Joseph’s sons, Israel asked, “Who are these?” ⁹And Joseph said to his father, “They are my sons, whom God has given me here.” “Bring them up to me,” he said, “that I may bless them.” ¹⁰Now Israel’s eyes were dim with age; he could not see. So [Joseph] brought them close to him, and he kissed them and embraced them. ¹¹And Israel said to Joseph, “I never expected to see you again, and here God has let me see your children as well.”

“The God in whose ways my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked,

The God who has been my shepherd from my birth to this day—

¹⁶ The Angel who has redeemed me from all harm—Bless the lads.

In them may my name be recalled,

And the names of my fathers Abraham and Isaac,
And may they be teeming multitudes upon the earth.”

¹⁷When Joseph saw that his father was placing his right hand on Ephraim’s head, he thought it wrong; so he took

motes them to the status of tribal founders and makes his favored wife their mother in place of the Egyptian priest’s daughter Ase-nath (41.50–52). Moreover, the end of v. 5 seems to mean that Ephraim and Manasseh will become the senior tribes, replacing Reuben and Simeon, both of whom earn their father’s censure (34.30; 35.22; 49.3–7; cf. 1 Chron. 5.1). V. 6 stipulates that any other children that Joseph has or will have (the Tanakh lists no others) shall be classified under Ephraim and Manasseh and not hold the status of the sons of Jacob. Note that whereas some lists of the twelve include Joseph and the clerical tribe Levi (e.g., Deut. 27.12–13), others omit Levi and divide Joseph into Ephraim and Manasseh (e.g., Num. 1.5–15). 8: Israel’s question is odd, since he has just spoken about Ephraim and Manasseh in considerable detail and with no deficit of clarity. The problem disappears if v. 8 is seen as the continuation of v. 2, and vv. 3–7 (which employ classic P language) are understood as an interpretation. In the text as it comes to us, however, the effect of v. 8 is to suggest that the aged Israel is confused and forgetful, somewhat like his own father in ch 27. If so, this time the suggestion proves wrong (vv. 17–20)! 10: Cf. 27.1. 17–20: Both tribes became important, though it is from Ephraim that Moses’ successor Joshua, the prophet Samuel, and Jeroboam I, the founder of the Northern Kingdom (Israel) all hailed (Num. 13.8; 1 Sam. 1.1; 1 Kings 11.26). In fact, “Ephraim” eventually became another name for the Northern Kingdom itself (e.g., Hos. 5.3; Isa. 7.1–17).

hold of his father’s hand to move it from Ephraim’s head to Manasseh’s. ¹⁸“Not so, Father,” Joseph said to his father, “for the other is the first-born; place your right hand on his head.” ¹⁹But his father objected, saying, “I know, my son, I know. He too shall become a people, and he too shall be great. Yet his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his offspring shall be plentiful enough for nations.” ²⁰So he blessed them that day, saying, “By you shall Israel invoke blessings, saying: God make you like Ephraim and Manasseh.” Thus he put Ephraim before Manasseh.

²¹Then Israel said to Joseph, “I am about to die; but God will be with you and bring you back to the land of your fathers. ²²And now, I assign to you one portion^a more than to your brothers, which I wrested from the Amorites with my sword and bow.”

a Meaning of Heb. shekhem uncertain; others “mountain slope.”

20: Jacob’s words are used in the blessing that a Jewish father traditionally bestows upon his sons just before the first Sabbath meal (Friday night). In the case of daughters, the tradition devised a functional equivalent that does not actually appear in the Tanakh: “God make you like Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Leah.” In both cases, the Aaronic blessing follows (Num. 6.24–26). 22: One portion more than to your brothers probably refers to the “double portion” that the first-born son inherits (Deut. 21.17). The word for portion (“shekhem”) in this difficult verse puns on the name of (the city) Shechem. Note that Shechem appears as a Manassite clan in Josh. 17.2 but as an Ephraimite city in Josh. 20.7.

49.1–28: Jacob’s tribal sayings. Although the prose superscription has Jacob speaking to his sons themselves (v. 1), the content of the poetry that follows applies to the tribes descended from these twelve men. The closest parallel to this collection of tribal sayings is thus Deut. ch 33, in which Moses blesses most of the tribes just before he dies. A more distant parallel is Judg. 5.14–18, in which the judge, Deborah, and her general, Barak, sing of the courage of some of the tribes and the failure of others in a time of military crisis. Like Judg. 5.14–18, and unlike the Blessing of Moses, however, 49.1–28 interlaces commendation and condemnation. Rich in wordplays impossible to capture in English as well as cryptic phrasings and rare expressions (including unusual, and probably very ancient, divine names), Jacob’s tribal sayings have long provoked disagreements among interpreters. There are also considerable variations in wording among the ancient versions. The collection of sayings is organized according to the tribal mothers, in the order of Leah, Zilpah (her handmaiden), Bilhah (Rachel’s handmaiden), and Rachel (29.31–30.24; 35.16–19). The first four Leah tribes—Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah—appear in the order of their births, as do those descended from Rachel—Joseph and Benjamin. But whereas in the narrative the sons of the handmaidens appear in the order of Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, and are followed by Leah’s last two sons, Issachar and Zebulun, in the tribal sayings of ch 49 the order is Zebulun, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Asher, Naphtali. 4: The allusion is probably to the event cryptically reported in 35.22. Although Reuben, as the first-born tribe, may once have been important, it has left little mark in biblical history. The Blessing of Moses regards it as small and in danger of extinction (Deut. 33.6), and the Song of Deborah chastises it for its indecision (Judg. 5.15b–16; see Gen. 42.36–38 n.). 5–7: Simeon and Levi are a pair only in Gen. ch 34, where they also suffer their father’s rebuke (v. 30). The dividing and scattering predicted here probably

For when angry they slay men,
And when pleased they maim oxen.

And their wrath so relentless.
I will divide them in Jacob, Scatter them in Israel.

refers to Simeon's absorption into Judah and Levi's redefinition as a priestly tribe, without land of its own (Deut. 18.1–2). 8–10: The pre-eminence of Judah (v. 8; cf. 27.29) is doubtless associated with King David's derivation from that tribe (see 38.27–30 n.). Scepter and ruler's staff may thus be royal symbols, although they can also designate the stick or club of any military commander or tribal leader (cf. Num. 21.18, where the word rendered here as ruler's staff is translated as the "maces" of "the nobles of the people"). V. 10 has traditionally been viewed as a messianic prophecy in both the Jewish and Christian traditions. Some commentators, beginning as early as the Aramaic translation known as Targum Onkelos, read the word rendered here as tribute . . . to him as "his due" (Heb "shelo"): God shall uphold His promise to Judah even till the royal figure comes to claim the dominion that is his due. Ibn Ezra, on the other hand, considers it possible to retain the traditional wording, "Shiloh," in place of "shai loh" (tribute . . . to him). Reading shall come in the sense of "shall come down," like the setting sun (in Lev. 22.7, the verb is translated "sets"), he connects this verse to Ps. 78, which reports that God "forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh," "did choose the tribe of Judah" and "David, His servant" (vv. 60, 68, 70; see 1 Sam. 3.19–4.22; Jer. 7.12–15). 11–12: The images suggest preternatural fertility, prosperity, and vigor. According to Rabbi Ovadiah Sforno, an Italian commentator of the 16th century, the messianic king rides an ass rather than a horse because it is God who wages the wars by which he comes to rule, "and he will become king in peace" (cf. Zech. 4.6b; 9.9). 13: The boundaries of Zebulun in Josh. 19.10–15 suggest that it was an inland tribe, but perhaps this was not always the case. 15: The pronouncement on Issachar seems to be a criticism. It is a strong, but lazy, tribe that became a toiling serf, presumably for Canaanites in the northern regions that were its home (cf. Judg. 1.33). There is probably a play here on the tribe's name (as if it were "'ish sakhar," "hired man"). Influenced by 1 Chron. 12.33, the midrash reconceives Issachar's service as the teaching of Torah and the rendering of halakhic (i.e., legal) rulings (Gen. Rab. 99.10). 16: Govern ("yadin") puns on the tribe's name ("dan").

18: This verse seems to be a devout interpolation unrelated to the context (cf. Ps. 119.166). It contains the only mention of the four-letter name of God (LORD) in ch 49.

19: The Heb plays repeatedly on Gad's name. 20: The royal dainties may have been served to Canaanite kings (cf. Judg. 1.32, on Naphtali; and vv. 14-15 n., above).

22: Like Judah (v. 9), Issachar (v. 14), Naphtali (v. 21), and Benjamin (v. 27), Joseph is described as an animal. (Even if the alternative suggested in the translation note is accepted, the image is still one of fertility and vigor.) 23-24: Like the rest of the tribal sayings, the image of Joseph under assault relates to the subsequent history of the tribe. It also recalls, however, Joseph's brothers' early hostility in the preceding narrative (ch 37). 24: The unusual titles of the deity, The Mighty One of Jacob (or "Bull of Jacob"), the Shepherd, and the Rock of Israel, may attest to an early date and Canaanite affinities. 25: Shaddai is presumably a variant of El Shaddai (see 17.1 n.). 26: The term my ancestors ("horay") is otherwise unattested. The Septuagint and the parallels in Deut. 33.15 and Hab. 3.6 suggest that the word is actually "mountains" ("harerei") and that the word after it ("ad") means not "to," but "ancient." Utmost bounds ("ta'avat"), another unique term, is then more plausibly derived from a root associated with "desire" ("vh"). If this reconstruction were to be accepted, the first sentence would read: "The blessings of your father / Surpass the blessings of the ancient mountains / That which is most desired in the eternal hills." 28: And so, just before he leaves this world, Jacob has bidden farewell to the twelve tribes of Israel—the people promised to his grandfather long ago (12.2), the people that against all odds and in the face of multiple and formidable challenges, external and internal, has now, by the grace of God, come into existence, the people that at long last stands united as it faces the new challenges that lie ahead.

²⁹ Then he instructed them, saying to them, "I am about to be gathered to my kin. Bury me with my fathers in the cave which is in the field of Ephron the Hittite, ³⁰ the cave which is in the field of Machpelah, facing Mamre, in the land of Canaan, the field that Abraham bought from Ephron the Hittite for a burial site—³¹ there Abraham and his wife Sarah were buried; there Isaac and his wife Rebekah were buried; and there I buried Leah—³² the field and the cave in it, bought from the Hittites." ³³ When Jacob finished his instructions to his sons, he drew his feet into the bed and, breathing his last, he was gathered to his people.

50 Joseph flung himself upon his father's face and wept over him and kissed him. ² Then Joseph ordered the physicians in his service to embalm his father, and the physicians embalmed Israel. ³ It required forty days, for such is the full period of embalming. The Egyptians bewailed him seventy days; ⁴ and when the wailing period was over, Joseph spoke to Pharaoh's court, saying, "Do me this favor, and lay this appeal before Pharaoh: ⁵ 'My father made me swear, saying, "I am about to die. Be sure to bury me in the grave which I made ready for myself in the land of Canaan." Now, therefore, let me go up and bury my father; then I shall return.' " ⁶ And Pharaoh said, "Go up and bury your father, as he made you promise on oath."

¹⁰ When they came to Goren^a ha-Atad, which is beyond the Jordan, they held there a very great and solemn lamentation; and he observed a mourning period of seven days for his father. ¹¹ And when the Canaanite inhabitants of the land saw the mourning at Goren ha-Atad, they said, "This is a solemn mourning on the part of the Egyptians." That is why it was named Abel-mizraim,^b which is beyond the Jordan. ¹² Thus his sons did for him as he had in-

49.29–50.26: The deaths of Jacob and Joseph. The book of Genesis draws to a rapid close with accounts of the deaths of Jacob and Joseph. The overall mood is marked by reverence for these larger-than-life figures and awareness that the promise that started their ancestor Abraham on his fateful journey (12.1–3) has now, amazingly, been largely fulfilled. Only two discordant notes are sounded: the anxiety of Joseph's brothers that their erstwhile victim will seek revenge now that he is no longer accountable to his father (50.15–21), and Joseph's last words, which draw attention to the fact that the Israelites in Egypt, for all their material comfort, do not yet possess the land of Israel, and the solemn promise of God to grant Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob the land thus remains unfulfilled (50.24–25). Joseph allays his brothers' anxiety by affirming God's mysterious providential design, which can bring good out of human evil (50.20–21). Similarly, by affirming the reliability of God's sworn promise to the patriarchs, he expresses his firm faith that their exile will end (50.24–25). 49.33: He drew his feet into the bed closes the action begun at 48.2, when he "sat up in bed." The intervening material is thus presented as Jacob's last will and testament. 50.2–3: The embalming and the periods of mourning follow Egyptian rather than Israelite custom. Jewish law forbids embalming (and cremating). The body must, instead, be interred in such a way that it will "return to the ground from which [it was] taken" (Gen. 3.19). 10: It is unclear why the state procession approached Hebron by way of Transjordan. Perhaps vv. 10–11 derive from a lost tradition that did not locate Jacob's grave in the cave of Machpelah, as vv. 12–13 do, but spoke of an interment at the otherwise unattested site of Goren ha-Atad. Whether this is the case or not, the itinerary foreshadows the route Israel takes after their miraculous escape from Egypt, when they entered Canaan from structed them. ¹³His sons carried him to the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, the field near Mamre, which Abraham had bought for a burial site from Ephron the Hittite. ¹⁴After burying his father, Joseph returned to Egypt, he and his brothers and all who had gone up with him to bury his father.

¹⁵When Joseph's brothers saw that their father was dead, they said, "What if Joseph still bears a grudge against us and pays us back for all the wrong that we did him!" ¹⁶So they sent this message to Joseph, "Before his death your father left this instruction: ¹⁷So shall you say to Joseph, 'Forgive, I urge you, the offense and guilt of your brothers who treated you so harshly.' Therefore, please forgive the offense of the servants of the God of your father." And Joseph was in tears as they spoke to him.

¹⁸His brothers went to him themselves, flung themselves before him, and said, "We are prepared to be your slaves." ¹⁹But Joseph said to them, "Have no fear! Am I a substitute for God? ²⁰Besides, although you intended me harm, God intended it for good, so as to bring about the present result—the survival of many people. ²¹And so, fear not. I will sustain you and your children." Thus he reassured them, speaking kindly to them.

²²So Joseph and his father's household remained in Egypt. Joseph lived one hundred and ten years. ²³Joseph

Transjordan (Num. 33.1–49; Josh. ch 3). As God had promised (46.4), Jacob, in short, is given his own personal exodus. The Talmud derives from this verse the institution of "shiv'ah," the seven days of most intense mourning incumbent upon Jews who have lost close kin (y. Mo'ed Kat. 3.5). Unlike the situation here, however, "shiv'ah" begins after burial. 15: Cf. 27.41. 16–17: No such words appear on the lips of Jacob himself. On the basis of this, a rabbi in the Talmud ruled that "it is permissible for a person to modify a statement in the interest of peace." Another rabbi maintained that one was required to do so (b. Yebam. 65b). The brothers' lie is defensible because of the good relations it ensured—a result that Jacob, on a plain-sense reading, surely desired. 18–21: From Joseph's dreams in 37.5–11, one might have suspected that the enslavement of Joseph's brothers to him would indeed occur and be, in fact, the last word in this complex and suspenseful novella. As they sold him into slavery (37.25–28), so would he (who had already enslaved the Egyptians, 47.13–26) enslave them. In fact, Joseph adheres to the ethic that forbids an Israelite to "take vengeance or bear a grudge" (Lev. 19.18). His rationale rests on the idea that the malignant intentions of human beings can realize the benign intentions of God. The people Israel, ironically, survives the worldwide famine because Joseph's brothers sold him into slavery (50.19–20; cf. 30.2 n.). 22: One hundred and ten years appears in Egyptian sources as the ideal life span (cf. 6.3; Ps. 90.10). 23: Born upon Joseph's knees implies adoption (cf. 30.3; 48.12). Not surprisingly, therefore, in Judg. 5.14 Machir appears as a tribe of Israel. 24–25: Will surely take notice/has taken notice (both are "pakod yifkod" in Heb) came to fulfillment in Exod. 3.16, when the LORD instructs Moses to declare to the "elders of Israel" that "I have taken note" ("pakod pakadti") of "you and what is being done to you in Egypt." In fact, it is none other than Moses himself who carries out Joseph's charge. The Mishnah finds in this an illustration of the important rabbinic principle, "By the measure by which a person metes out, it shall be meted out to him." Because "Joseph went up to bury his father" (50.7), Moses, generations later (as reported in Exod. 13.19) "took with him the bones of Joseph" (m. Sot. 1.7. 9). Ultimately, those bones were buried in Shechem (Josh. 24.32), the very city to which Jacob had sent Joseph, then a brash teenager, at the beginning of this astonishing tale of discord and reconciliation in the family that bears God's promise (37.13).

lived to see children of the third generation of Ephraim; the children of Machir son of Manasseh were likewise born upon Joseph's knees. ²⁴At length, Joseph said to his brothers, "I am about to die. God will surely take notice of you and bring you up from this land to the land that He promised on oath to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob."

²⁵So Joseph made the sons of Israel swear, saying, "When God has taken notice of you, you shall carry up my bones from here."

²⁶Joseph died at the age of one hundred and ten years; and he was embalmed and placed in a coffin in Egypt.

Exodus

THE ENGLISH NAME OF EXODUS derives from the Greek title Exodos, short for Exodos Aigyptou, “Departure from Egypt,” used in the Septuagint. The Hebrew title, Sefer ve’eleh shemot, “the book of ‘And these are the names’ ” (usually abbreviated to Shemot, “Names”), is based on the opening words of the book.

Exodus, in its present form, is not an independent book, but part of the Torah which narrates the story of Israel from the creation of the world through the death of Moses. The Torah in its final form is divided into five separate books simply because ancient scrolls could not contain a work of that length. Nevertheless, the books were not divided arbitrarily but at natural transition points. Exodus begins where the Hebrews grow from a family into a nation (1.1–7; cf. v. 9), and it ends on the first day of the new year following the exodus from Egypt as the sanctuary is erected and the divine Presence takes up Its abode in the Israelites’ midst. The opening section (1.1–6, which recapitulates Gen. 46.8–27) and the closing section (40.36–38, which anticipates Num. 9.15–23) look as if they were composed after the subdivision to serve as prologue and epilogue, marking the book as a distinct subunit within the Torah. Thematically, the book marks the transition from God’s promises of progeny, land, and a permanent relationship with Israel (e.g., Gen. chs 12–15; 17.1–8) to the fulfillment of these promises, beginning with the Israelites’ phenomenal growth, the exodus, and the covenant at Sinai (Exod. 1.1–7; 12.1–36; chs 19–24).

Exodus is arguably the most important book in the Bible since it presents the seminal events in Israel’s history and the definitive institutions of its religion, themes that have reverberated through all subsequent Jewish and Western history. These include Pharaoh’s enslavement of the Israelites, the leadership of Moses, the beginnings of prophecy, the revelation of God’s name YHWH to Moses, the ten plagues, the Pesah (“Passover”) festival, the splitting and crossing of the sea, the manna, the revelation of the Decalogue at Mount Sinai, the covenant formally constituting Israel as God’s people, the first of the Torah’s law collections and rules about the Sabbath and sacrificial worship, the sin of the golden calf, and the construction of the sanctuary.

Structure and Focus

THE BOOK FALLS ROUGHLY INTO FOUR MAIN SECTIONS: (1) enslavement and liberation (1.1–15.21), during which Israel and Egypt come to “know” the LORD and His name; (2) the journey to Sinai (15.22–17.16), marked by a series of dangers, Israelite complaints, and deliverance by God; (3) covenant and lawgiving at Sinai (18.1–24.18), featuring the public revelation of God; and (4) the sanctuary and the golden calf (chs 25–40), dealing with the authorized and unauthorized ways of securing God’s presence and worshipping Him. The beginning point of (2) is not certain, and all or part of (2) could be seen as belonging to (1).

The narrative in Exodus focuses on the paradigmatic significance of the events and on celebrating them rather than on historical details. The names of the pharaohs—so important for historians—are nowhere mentioned, although those of the midwives who demonstrated “fear of God” are (1.15). Emphasized instead is the contest of wills between Pharaoh, who does not know YHVH (5.2), and YHVH Himself, who is determined to show Egypt, Israel, and the world that He is YHVH and what that means (7.5; 9.16; 14.4; etc.): that He is incomparable (8.6); that He is present in the world (8.18); that the earth is His (9.29). The book points out the lessons of the events, to be repeated to subsequent generations, and ordains commemorative rites to celebrate them (10.2; chs 12–13). The narrative is full of the miraculous, such as the plagues against Egypt and the atmospheric events at Sinai. Later, Deuteronomy would declare that the exodus and the revelation at Sinai “clearly demonstrate . . . that the LORD alone is God in heaven above and on earth below; there is no other” (Deut. 4.32–39).

Historicity

THE BOOK’S INATTENTION to historical details has left historians grasping at bits of incidental information, and at indirect evidence from ancient Egypt, that might permit dating of the exodus or assessment of its historicity. None of the biblical narratives in their current form is contemporary with the events they describe, though they have roots in earlier oral tradition. Nor is there reference to an exodus in contemporary Egyptian sources. Such a reference is not really to be expected, however: Egyptian royal inscriptions avoided mentioning setbacks unless they were followed by victories, and administrative records from the time and place of the exodus have mostly perished. Still, some data suggest that there is a plausible historical kernel to the story. Northwestern Semites of the same ethno-linguistic stock as the Hebrews, from Canaan, Transjordan, and Syria, had for centuries migrated to Egypt, especially the eastern Nile delta, for food and water during times of famine, as the Bible reports of Abraham and later of Jacob and his family, who settled in the eastern delta (1.8 n.; 8.18 n.). Others were brought there as slaves captured by the Egyptian army during raids. Egyptian documents refer to all of them as “Asiatics,” rather than the specific ethnic groups to which they belong (e.g., Hebrew/Israelite, Moabite, Phoenician; some mention people called Ḥapiru, but they are probably not Hebrews; see 1.15 n.). Some Asiatics served as domestic or state slaves, the latter in royal building projects, like the Hebrews. According to the biblical account, the Hebrew slaves worked on the construction of the city of Rameses (1.11). If there is a historical kernel to the story, the Pharaoh who enslaved them was Rameses II (1279–1213 BCE), the greatest builder in ancient Egypt, who built the city named after himself as his new capital, in the eastern delta. Rameses also built a series of forts in the delta to secure Egypt's borders; this is perhaps reflected in the biblical Pharaoh's concern about foreign invasion (1.10). While we have no extrabiblical record of the ten plagues or of a mass escape of slaves from Egypt, natural disasters did take place periodically (though so many in rapid succession is implausible), and mass escapes of slaves are known from elsewhere in the ancient world, such as the revolt of 100,000 slaves in Italy led by Spartacus. The fact that "Moses" is an Egyptian name (a common element in such Egyptian names as Thutmosis and Rameses) is consistent with the Israelites having spent time in Egypt. If the Pharaoh of the enslavement was Rameses II, the Pharaoh under whom the Israelites left Egypt may have been his son, Merneptah (1213–1203 BCE), one of whose inscriptions claims a victory over "Israel," described as a nonsedentary people somewhere in the vicinity of Canaan, an encounter that would have taken place after the exodus. This makes sense chronologically since archeological evidence probably suggests that the Israelites appeared in Canaan around the beginning of the Iron Age (ca. 1200 BCE). None of this proves that the exodus happened, but it does indicate that the outline of the story, of Hebrews migrating to Egypt during a famine and being enslaved there under Rameses II, and later leaving under Moses, during or by the time of Merneptah, is not inherently implausible. Moreover, if the Israelites had invented their history, it seems more likely that they would have portrayed themselves as the original inhabitants of their land rather than as interlopers with a humiliating background as slaves.

Composition and Date

MODERN CRITICAL SCHOLARSHIP has shown that Exodus, like the Torah as a whole and some other ancient literature as well, was composed by one or more redactors weaving together several earlier written versions of the same events (see "Torah," pp. 1–7). These versions often disagreed with each other about ideology or the course of events. Their preservation side by side has led modern scholars to conclude that the redactor(s) was/were fundamentally conservative. Perhaps they believed all the traditions valid, perhaps even inspired, and therefore preserved them with minimal revision even if that left inconsistencies, non sequiturs, and redundancies. For example, in Exodus 6.3 God tells Moses that He did not make Himself known to the patriarchs by the name $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$, but according to Genesis 15.7 He did. Within Exodus itself, Moses' father-in-law has different names in 2.18; 3.1; 4.18, and the description of the Tent of Meeting in 33.7–11 is inconsistent with, and oblivious to, both the immediately surrounding narrative and the description of the differently described Tent in chs 25–31 and 35–40. Inconsistencies such as these have alerted scholars to the presence of different sources, and characteristic variations in vocabulary and ideas have guided them in identifying the sources from which various components stem. Most easily identified is the Priestly document (P), the source of sections of chs 1–24 and most of chs 25–31 and 35–40, although recently scholars have found signs of the Holiness Document (H) there as well. P is also found in some of the narratives of the book, but there it shares space with material from the Yahwist (J) and Elohist (E) sources. J and E can sometimes, but not always, be distinguished. They were likely combined into a single narrative before being joined with P, so scholars often speak simply of the JE (or early narrative) source. Some also believe that there are some sections that are Deuteronomic, that is, related to ideas found in Deuteronomy. In numerous cases it is clear that we are dealing with an amalgam of two or three sources, though we cannot fully disentangle them (see introductory comments to chs 19–24 and 31.18–34.35).

Once the components of the text have been assigned as best they can be to their original sources, the differing views of those sources emerge. For example, J represents the oppression of the Israelites as corvée (forced) labor (1.11), P as full enslavement (1.13–14); arranging them in sequence, the redactor indicates that these were two successive stages of oppression. According to J the Israelites lived in Goshen, apart from the Egyptians (9.26); according to E they lived side by side with them (3.22). P (6.2) and E (3.13–15) hold that the name $\Upsilon\eta\nu\eta$ was first revealed to Moses, while J believes that it was known earlier (Gen. 15.7). The patterned sequence of ten plagues noted at 7.14–10.29 was shaped by the redactor, who wove together material from J, P, and possibly E, which each had fewer, partly overlapping, partly different, plagues. The sources all represent the events at Mount Sinai very differently. For example, P reports neither a public revelation, the conclusion of a covenant, nor a golden calf episode. All that happened on the mountain was that God's Presence rested there in a cloud and Moses entered the cloud and privately received the instructions for the sanctuary (19.1–2a; 24.15–31.18a); all other lawgiving took place later in the Tabernacle, starting in Leviticus ch 1. It was J and E that reported the covenant, the visual (J) and auditory (E) manifestations of God, the proclamation of the Decalogue and the other covenant laws, and the breach of the covenant in the golden calf episode (chs 19–24; 32–34). It was the redactor(s) who wove all of these varying and conflicting details together in their present order, making them represent different stages of the events. The care and literary skill of the redactor(s) is nicely illustrated by the patterning of the plagues (7.14–10.29) and the location of the golden calf episode between the instructions for the sanctuary and their execution (31.18–32.35 n.). Whether or not the redactors believed that the inconsistencies could be harmonized is unclear. The contradictions and redundancies, however, had an important effect on later Judaism because they encouraged—in fact, forced—readers to create fine distinctions and nonliteral interpretations to enable them to coexist (Thirteen Hermeneutic Rules of Rabbi Ishmael, no. 13; Thirty-two Hermeneutic Rules of Rabbi Eliezer ben Rabbi Jose the Galilean, no. 15; Saadia, Book of Beliefs and Opinions, ch 7), thus paving the way in Judaism for innovations in theology and law.

Exodus and the Jewish Tradition

MANY OF THE FUNDAMENTAL BELIEFS and practices of Judaism are rooted in Exodus. The first of the book's two central events, the exodus itself, is recounted daily in Jewish prayers. It and the other central event, the proclamation of the Decalogue at Mount Sinai, are celebrated and retold on Jewish festivals every year, the exodus on the festival of Pesah, whose rituals, including the Seder, are based on the rules prescribed in chs 12–13, and the proclamation of the Decalogue (ch 20) on the festival of Shavuot. The two festivals are known, respectively, as zeman herutenu, "the time of our freedom," and zeman matan toratenu, "the time when our Torah was given." The inextricable link between them, expressed in the fact that Pesah begins a fifty-day countdown to Shavuot (see Lev. 23.15–21), proclaims that the freedom attained on the former only reaches fulfillment with the laws received on the latter. These two festivals plus Sukkot, the Feast of Booths, constitute the three "Pilgrimage Festivals" (shalosh regalim) of the Jewish religious calendar. Two other rituals that began as commemorations of the exodus are daily wearing of tefillin (13.9–10 n.) and the redemption of first-born sons (pidyon haben, 13.13 n.).

The exodus also served to orient Jewish festivals increasingly toward God's actions in history, in contrast to polytheistic festivals which focused on the gods' actions in nature. The role of Pesah and the Feast of Unleavened Bread as commemorations of the exodus completely eclipsed their presumed earlier significance as spring festivals (12.6–14 n., 14–20 n.). Sukkot, although essentially an agricultural festival, also comes to commemorate the Israelites' dwelling in booths following the exodus (Lev. 23.43). At least since Second Temple times Shavuot—in the Torah an entirely agricultural festival—has been recognized as commemorating the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. Theologically, God's manifestation as Israel's redeemer at the exodus has fortified Jewish belief in redemption even in the throes of oppression.

Fundamental principles of Judaism based on Exodus are the belief that the relationship between God and the Jewish people is defined by the covenant (berit) established between them at Mount Sinai (chs 19; 24) and the belief that God gave the Torah there, ordaining the Jewish way of life (chs 19–24). The momentous encounter with God at Sinai is, for Judaism, the defining moment in Jewish history, the moment when God came down on earth and spoke to all Jews, present and future, giving them His rules for life, which they accepted enthusiastically (20.16; 24.3, 7 n.). These laws (according to rabbinic belief both the Written Torah and its oral interpretation were communicated simultaneously) became the basis of all of Judaism: "Moses received Torah—written and oral—at Sinai and passed it on" down through the generations (Pirkei Avot 1.1). Because these laws were presented to the entire people (21.1 n.), it became the duty of every Jew, not just an intellectual elite, to study them. Finally, the Thirteen Attributes of God, recited on various occasions in Jewish liturgy, are based on the attributes that God reveals to Moses in 34.6–7.

The first laws that God proclaimed to the Israelites were the Decalogue (20.2–14), ordaining laws both "between humankind and God" and "between one human being and another.” Three of the laws in the first group became defining characteristics of Judaism which Jews have defended, often with their lives: the requirement to worship only the LORD (YHWH) and have no other gods, the requirement to have no idols, and the requirement to observe the Sabbath. Of the latter it has been said that “Even more than the Jews kept the Sabbath, the Sabbath preserved the Jews,” as the Zionist philosopher Aḥad Ha-‘Am (Asher Ginzberg, 1856–1927) observed.

The exodus has reverberated down through world history. Many early American settlers understood their flight from Europe and settlement in America as a new exodus, and later, Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson recommended that the great seal of the United States depict Moses leading the Israelites across the parted sea as a symbol of the American experience. African-Americans in the United States, hoping for freedom in the 19th century and fighting for civil rights in the 20th century, likewise saw themselves as reliving the Israelite experience. In the 1970s and 1980s, the mass departure of hundreds of thousands of Jews from the Soviet Union was known as “Operation Exodus.” The exodus has clearly resonated strongly in Western history.

1 These are the names of the sons of Israel who came to Egypt with Jacob, each coming with his household: ²Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah; ³Issachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin; ⁴Dan and Naphtali, Gad and Asher. ⁵The total number of persons that were of Jacob’s issue came to seventy, Joseph being already in Egypt. ⁶Joseph died, and all his brothers, and all that generation. ⁷But the Israelites were fertile and prolific; they multiplied and increased very greatly, so that the land was filled with them.

⁸A new king arose over Egypt who did not know Joseph. ⁹And he said to his people, “Look, the Israelite people are much too numerous for us. ¹⁰Let us deal shrewdly with them, so that they may not increase; otherwise in the event of war they may join our enemies in fighting against us and ^arise from the ground.” ^a ¹¹So they set taskmasters

1.1–2.22: Prologue. These chs set the stage for the exodus by telling how the family of Jacob grew into a people in Egypt and fell into bondage (as God foretold in Gen. 15.13), and how Moses, the human agent of their deliverance, arose. It is composed of a combination of early narrative sources (JE) and P material.

1.1–7: Transition from Genesis. A recapitulation of Gen. 46.8–27 (cf. Gen. 35.23–26) leads to the account of how Jacob’s family grew in Egypt from seventy individuals (a number signifying perfect completion) to a huge population—indeed, from a family to a nation. 7: Many terms in this v. (and in vv. 12 and 20) are also used in God’s blessings and promises in Genesis, especially to the patriarchs (Gen. 1.20, 28; 9.1, 7; 17.2; 18.18; 28.14; 48.4), implying that these ancestral promises were now being fulfilled by God, who was causing the Israelites’ proliferation and thwarting Pharaoh’s attempts to check it.

1.8–22: The oppression. 8: This may refer to the rise of the 19th Dynasty, particularly Rameses II (ca. 1279–1213 BCE). This dynasty, founded by military officers, sought to protect Egypt’s vulnerable coast and northeastern and northwestern borders from the Sea Peoples, the Libyans, and infiltrators from the Sinai, and to protect access to Egypt’s empire in western Asia. Given the Israelites’ background in Canaan and current residence in Goshen (8.18 n.), adjacent to the Sinai, Pharaoh may have feared that they would ally with invaders from that direction. 11–22: Pharaoh’s attempts to check the Israelite proliferation unfold in four stages, increasingly more oppressive: subjection to corvée (forced or draft) labor (vv. 11–12), slavery (vv. 13–14), a secret attempt to murder newborn boys (vv. 15–21), and a public at-over them to oppress them with forced labor; and they built garrison cities^a for Pharaoh: Pithom and Rameses. ¹²But the more they were oppressed, the more they increased and spread out, so that the [Egyptians] came to dread the Israelites.

¹³The Egyptians ruthlessly imposed upon the Israelites ¹⁴^bthe various labors that they made them perform. Ruthlessly^b they made life bitter for them with harsh labor at mortar and bricks and with all sorts of tasks in the field.

¹⁵The king of Egypt spoke to the Hebrew midwives, one of whom was named Shiphrah and the other Puah, ¹⁶saying, “When you deliver the Hebrew women, look at the birthstool:^c if it is a boy, kill him; if it is a girl, let her live.” ¹⁷The midwives, fearing God, did not do as the king of Egypt had told them; they let the boys live. ¹⁸So the king of Egypt summoned the midwives and said to them, “Why have you done this thing, letting the boys live?” ¹⁹The midwives said to Pharaoh, “Because the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women: they are vigorous. Before the midwife can come to them, they have given birth.” ²⁰And God dealt well with the midwives; and the people multiplied and increased greatly. ²¹And because the midwives feared God, He established households^d for them. ²²Then Pharaoh charged all his people, saying, “Every boy that is born you shall throw into the Nile, but let every girl live.”

tempt to do the same (v. 22). The presentation of these as four successive, intensifying stages is the work of the redactor who drew them from the earlier sources J (corvée), P (slavery), and perhaps E (one or both attempts at infanticide). 11: Pharaoh hopes to check the Israelites’ proliferation by exhausting them. Taskmasters, foremen of corvée contingents (1 Kings 5.27–28). Garrison cities, rather “store cities” of a type that usually served military purposes (1 Kings 9.19; 2 Chron. 8.4–6; 17.12–13; 32.27–28). Pithom and

Rameses stood at strategic points guarding the entry to Egypt from the north and northeast. Pithom, Egyptian Pir-Atum, “House of (the god) Atum,” was probably Tel e-Retabeh or Tel el-Maskhutah in the Wadi Tumilat, the entrance to Egypt from the Sinai Peninsula; both sites have archeological remains from the time of Rameses II. The city of Rameses was Pir-Rameses-Meri-Amon, “House of Rameses, beloved of [the god] Amon,” capital of the delta region under the 19th and part of the 20th dynasties (1292–1137 BCE). It occuried a very large area that extended over Kantir and Khataana and other nearby sites. Seti I (1294–1279) built a summer palace there, and it was considerably expanded by Rameses II.

13–14: Ruthlessly imposed . . . labors, reduced them to full slavery (Lev. 25.39–46). 15: Hebrew, an old term for Israelites, usually used when contrasting Israelites with other peoples (Gen. 14.13; 39.14, 17; 40.15; Exod. 21.2; Deut. 15.12); it is not normally used after the time of David. A relationship with the groups known as ‘Apiru (sometimes spelled Ḥapiru) in ancient Near Eastern sources has been suggested, but the connection is problematic since the latter refers to a social class of outcasts, whereas “Hebrew” refers to an ethnic group. Hebrew midwives, the phrase could mean “midwives to the Hebrews” or midwives who were Hebrew. The former interpretation, found in LXX, Josephus, Abravanel, and Judah he-Flasid, understands them as righteous Gentiles; hence their motive is said to be fear of God (v. 17) rather than loyalty to their people. 16: Killing the males and leaving only females would eliminate potential Israelite military power. Pharaoh’s efforts are of no avail, as women thwart him (v. 17) and rescue Israel’s future deliverer (2.1–10). Birthstool, parturient women sat or crouched on a seat of stone or bricks. 17: Fearing God, restrained by an awareness that murder would bring divine retribution. 22: Throw into the Nile, rather “expose in the Nile,” that is, to be floated in baskets down the Nile where the babies would sink and drown. This attempt also fails. Ironically, the Nile will become the means by which Moses is saved and raised by Pharaoh’s own daughter (2.1–10), and drowning will become the means of Pharaoh’s ultimate defeat (Exod. 14.28).

2.1–22: The origins of Moses.

2.1–10: Moses’ infancy. The story of Moses’ birth and Pharaoh’s attempted infanticide may be a rela-

three months.³ When she could hide him no longer, she got a wicker basket for him and caulked it with bitumen and pitch. She put the child into it and placed it among the reeds by the bank of the Nile.⁴ And his sister stationed herself at a distance, to learn what would befall him.

⁵The daughter of Pharaoh came down to bathe in the Nile, while her maidens walked along the Nile. She spied the basket among the reeds and sent her slave girl to fetch it.⁶ When she opened it, she saw that it was a child, a boy crying. She took pity on it and said, "This must be a Hebrew child."⁷ Then his sister said to Pharaoh's daughter, "Shall I go and get you a Hebrew nurse to suckle the child for you?"⁸ And Pharaoh's daughter answered, "Yes." So the girl went and called the child's mother.⁹ And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, "Take this child and nurse it for me, and I will pay your wages." So the woman took the child and nursed it.¹⁰ When the child grew up, she brought him to Pharaoh's daughter, who made him her son. She named him Moses,^a explaining, "I drew him out of the water."

¹¹Some time after that, when Moses had grown up, he went out to his kinsfolk and witnessed their labors. He saw an Egyptian beating a Hebrew, one of his kinsmen.¹² He turned this way and that and, seeing no one about, he struck down the Egyptian and hid him in the sand.¹³ When he went out the next day, he found two Hebrews fighting; so he said to the offender, "Why do you strike your fellow?"¹⁴ He retorted, "Who made you chief and ruler over us? Do you mean to kill me as you killed the Egyptian?" Moses was frightened, and thought: Then the matter is known!¹⁵ When Pharaoh learned of the matter, he sought to kill Moses; but Moses fled from Pharaoh. He arrived^b in the land of Midian, and sat down beside a well.

¹⁶Now the priest of Midian had seven daughters. They came to draw water, and filled the troughs to water their father's flock;¹⁷ but shepherds came and drove them off. Moses rose to their defense, and he watered their flock.¹⁸ When they returned to their father Reuel, he said, "How tively late addition to the tradition; the following narratives about the exodus show no awareness of them (e.g., 2.23 and 6.6 are aware only of bondage), and they are never mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. This story has parallels in birth legends of other heroes, some of which pre-date the Bible, such as Sargon of Akkad who in infancy was born in secret and exposed in a river in a reed basket sealed with pitch, but was found and later became king. In an Egyptian story, the god Horus was endangered as an infant by the god Seth and was hidden (but not abandoned) in a papyrus thicket of the Nile delta by his mother Isis to save him. In the biblical story, Moses is exposed as a ruse. 1: Moses' parents, nameless here, are identified in a different source (6.16–20; P) as Amram and his aunt Jochebed. 2–4: The woman conceived and bore a son: As the subsequent narrative indicates, this was not the couple's first child. This episode knows of an older sister, (v. 4ff.), and other passages recognize an older brother, Aaron (e.g., 4.14; 6.20; 7.7). All the actions to thwart Pharaoh's decree are taken by women—Moses' mother and sister, the midwives (1.17), and Pharaoh's daughter (2.5–10); the Hebrew men have been reduced to inactivity. 4: His sister, elsewhere named Miriam (15.20; Num. 26.59). 7–9: This sister contrives to return Moses temporarily to his mother's care by means of a wetnursing agreement (such agreements are known from ancient Near Eastern documents). 10: Moses is an Egyptian name meaning "gave birth"; it is a shortened form of names compounded with names of deities, such as Thut-mose and Rameses, meaning "Thut/Ra gave birth (to this child)." Here, in a popular etymology typical of biblical and other ancient Near Eastern literature, it is interpreted as if it were derived from Heb "m-sh-h," "draw out" (cf. Isa. 63.11).

2.11–22: Moses' young adulthood. In the first two episodes (vv. 11–12, 13–14) Moses plays the royal role of defending his people and adjudicating among them (cf. 1 Sam. 8.5, 20), and in the third he defends foreigners and strangers (vv. 16–17), showing that his passion for justice makes no distinctions between nations. 11: An Egyptian, presumably one of the taskmasters (1.11). 15: Midian, a region in northwest Arabia. 18: Their father Reuel, Moses' father-in-law is called Jethro in 3.1

is it that you have come back so soon today?"¹⁹ They answered, "An Egyptian rescued us from the shepherds; he even drew water for us and watered the flock."²⁰ He said to his daughters, "Where is he then? Why did you leave the man? Ask him in to break bread."²¹ Moses consented to stay with the man, and he gave Moses his daughter Zipporah as wife.²² She bore a son whom he named Gershom,^a for he said, "I have been a stranger in a foreign land."

²³ A long time after that, the king of Egypt died. The Israelites were groaning under the bondage and cried out; and their cry for help from the bondage rose up to God.²⁴ God heard their moaning, and God remembered His covenant with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob.²⁵ God looked upon the Israelites, and God took notice of them.

3 Now Moses, tending the flock of his father-in-law Jethro, the priest of Midian, drove the flock into the wilderness, and came to Horeb, the mountain of God.² An angel of the LORD appeared to him in a blazing fire out of a bush. He gazed, and there was a bush all aflame, yet the bush was not consumed.³ Moses said, "I must turn aside to look at this marvelous sight; why doesn't the bush burn up?"⁴ When the LORD saw that he had turned aside to look, God called to him out of the bush: "Moses! Moses!" He answered, "Here I am."⁵ And He said, "Do not come closer. Remove your sandals from your feet, for the place on which you stand is holy ground."⁶ I am," He said, "the (Jether in 4.18) and elsewhere, and Hobab son of Reuel in Num. 10.29 and Judg. 4.11. These different names reflect different ancient traditions. 19: An Egyptian, so Moses must have seemed because of his clothing and speech. 22: Since Moses was raised as an Egyptian, it is only in Midian that he begins to feel the sense of alienness that his kinsfolk have experienced in Egypt.

2.23–25: Prelude to redemption. Pharaoh's death clears the way for Moses' return to Egypt (4.19). The Israelites' outcry rises up to God, who takes note of it and remembers His commitments to their ancestors. His covenant refers both to God's promise of nationhood and territory in Canaan and the promise to free Israel after a long period of servitude (12.1–3; 15.13–20; 17.1–14; Gen. 26.2–5; 46.3–4). God's resolve to carry out these commitments is put into effect immediately, starting with His appearance to Moses in the burning bush (3.7–10).

3.1–22: Moses' call and departure for Egypt. The current narrative is the result of an artful combination of the two early sources, J and E. This is intimated by the different names used for God in 3.4a and b, but the clearest indication is the fact that 3.9–15 seem intrusive: vv. 9, 10, and 15a are redundant with, respectively, vv. 7, 18b, and 16a; the people never ask for God's name as Moses expects in v. 13; and vv. 10 and 18 describe the goal of Moses' mission to Pharaoh differently and use different terms for the Egyptian king. Vv. 16–18 in fact read like a direct continuation of v. 8. The consistent use of the name "God" ('elohim) in 3.9–15 identifies its source as E; the remainder of this section is mostly from J with a few other passages from E (such as vv. 1, 4b, 6b, and 20b). By incorporating material from both sources the redactor preserved important themes, such as the explanation of God's name in v. 14 (E) and the fact that God both "appeared" to Moses (3.2, 16; 4.1, 5, from J) and "sent" him (vv. 10, 12–15, from E).

3.1–10: God appears to Moses and gives him his charge. The burning bush is both a means of attracting Moses' attention and a manifestation of God's presence. 1: Horeb, alternate name for Mount Sinai (in E and in Deuteronomy). It is generally thought to be located in the Sinai Peninsula, though some believe it is in northwest Arabia, near Midian. Its designation mountain of God may indicate that it was already considered a sacred place, or it may be anticipatory. The first possibility may gain support from Egyptian inscriptions of the 14th century BCE that refer to an area, apparently in this region, as "land of the nomads, Yahwe"; this might also be understood as "land of the nomads who worship Yahwe." 2: An angel of the LORD, a manifestation of God. Angels (lit. "messengers") usually take human form, but this one takes the form of fire, a substance evocative of the divine because it is insubstantial yet powerful, dangerous, illuminating, and purifying. (For God's manifestation in, and comparison to, fire, see also Gen. 15.17; Exod. 19.18; Deut. 4.24; Ps. 104.4; Ezek. 1.27.) 6: The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. This phrase later became the way that God is addressed in the 'Amidah prayer.

God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." And Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look at God.

⁷And the LORD continued, "I have marked well the plight of My people in Egypt and have heeded their outcry because of their taskmasters; yes, I am mindful of their sufferings. ⁸I have come down to rescue them from the Egyptians and to bring them out of that land to a good and spacious land, a land flowing with milk and honey, the region of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. ⁹Now the cry of the Israelites has reached Me; moreover, I have seen how the Egyptians oppress them. ¹⁰Come, therefore, I will send you to Pharaoh, and you shall free My people, the Israelites, from Egypt."

¹¹But Moses said to God, "Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh and free the Israelites from Egypt?" ¹²And He said, "I will be with you; that shall be your sign that it was I who sent you. And when you have freed the people from Egypt, you shall worship God at this mountain."

¹³Moses said to God, "When I come to the Israelites and say to them, 'The God of your fathers has sent me to you,' and they ask me, 'What is His name?' what shall I say to them?" ¹⁴And God said to Moses, "Ehyeh-Asher-Ehyeh."^a He continued, "Thus shall you say to the Israelites, 'Ehyeh^b sent me to you.'" ¹⁵And God said further to Moses, "Thus shall you speak to the Israelites: The LORD,^c the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, has sent me to you:

a Meaning of Heb. uncertain; variously translated: "I Am That I Am"; "I Am Who I Am"; "I Will Be What I Will Be"; etc.

b Others "I Am" or "I Will Be."

c The name YHWH (traditionally read Adonai "the LORD") is here associated with the root hayah "to be."

The repetition of "God" before each patriarch is explained in 'Etz Yosef, a commentary on the Jewish prayerbook, as meaning that, like the patriarchs, each person should believe in God on the basis of personal investigation, not merely tradition. He was afraid to look at God: Although the Bible assumes that God has a physical (usually humanlike) form, many passages suggest that seeing Him would be too awesome for humans to survive (Gen. 32.31; Exod. 19.21; 33.20-23; Judg. 13.22; Isa. 6.5; exceptions include Exod. 24.10-11;

Num. 12.8; Deut. 34.10; Ezek. 1.26-28). Later Jewish philosophers, most notably Maimonides, held that God does not in fact have a physical form and that the biblical passages in question are meant as metaphors. 8: A land flowing with milk and honey, a proverbial expression of the fertility of the land of Israel, representing the products of animals and the earth, of herders and farmers ("honey" refers primarily to the nectar of fruit, especially of dates, figs, and grapes). The Canaanites . . .: The Bible offers several slightly different lists of peoples who lived in the promised land prior to the Israelites. (Cf., e.g., Gen. 10.15-20; Num. 13.29; Deut. 7.1.) 10: I will send you: As a prophet, Moses' primary role is to serve as God's emissary. Phrases with "send" ("sh-l-h") typify the selection of prophets (e.g., Isa. 6.8; Jer. 1.7).

3.11-4.17: Moses raises five objections to his assignment (3.11, 13; 4.1, 10, 13), but God overcomes each. Prophets are often reluctant to accept their commission; cf. Jer. 1. 12: I will be with you: The verb be ("ehyeh") anticipates the etymology of the divine name in v. 14. That shall be your sign, or, "this shall be your sign." It is unclear whether the sign is God's presence with Moses, the fact that He sent him, or the future return to Horeb and worship there.

13: Not having been raised among his own people, Moses (like Pharaoh in 5.2) is ignorant of their God's name and fears he will lack credibility with them. He is told God's name, which the people evidently knew already, though 6.3 implies otherwise. (Source critics assign 6.3 to the Priestly source, while 3.9-15 are said to be from E.) 14: God's proper name, disclosed in the next verse, is YHWH (spelled "yod-heh-vav-heh" in Heb; in ancient times the "vav" was pronounced "w"). But here God first tells Moses its meaning: Ehyeh-Asher-Ehyeh, probably best translated as "I Will Be What I Will Be," meaning "My nature will become evident from My actions." (Compare God's frequent declarations below, that from His future acts Israel and Egypt "shall know that I am the LORD [YHWH]," as in 7.5; 10.2; etc.) Then He answers Moses' question about what to say to the people: "Tell them: 'Ehyeh' ('I Will Be,' a shorter form of the explanation) sent me." This explanation derives God's name from the verb "h-v-h," a variant form of "h-y-h," "to be." Because God is the speaker, He uses the first-person form of the verb. 15: The LORD: The Heb states God's name, YHWH, meaning (according to v.

This shall be My name forever,
This My appellation for all eternity.

¹⁶“Go and assemble the elders of Israel and say to them: the LORD, the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, has appeared to me and said, ‘I have taken note of you and of what is being done to you in Egypt, ¹⁷and I have declared: I will take you out of the misery of Egypt to the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, to a land flowing with milk and honey.’ ¹⁸They will listen to you; then you shall go with the elders of Israel to the king of Egypt and you shall say to him, ‘The LORD, the God of the Hebrews, manifested Himself to us. Now therefore, let us go a distance of three days into the wilderness to sacrifice to the LORD our God.’ ¹⁹Yet I know that the king of Egypt will let you go only because of a greater might. ²⁰So I will stretch out My hand and smite Egypt with various wonders which I will work upon them; after that he shall let you go. ²¹And I will dispose the Egyptians favorably toward this people, so that when you go, you will not go away empty-handed. ²²Each woman shall borrow from her neighbor and the lodger in her house objects of silver and gold, and clothing, and you shall put these on your sons and daughters, thus stripping the Egyptians.”

4 But Moses spoke up and said, “What if they do not believe me and do not listen to me, but say: The LORD did not appear to you?” ²The LORD said to him, “What is that in your hand?” And he replied, “A rod.” ³He said, “Cast it on the ground.” He cast it on the ground and it became a snake; and Moses recoiled from it. ⁴Then the LORD said to Moses, “Put out your hand and grasp it by the tail”—he put out his hand and seized it, and it became a rod in his hand—⁵“that they may believe that the LORD, the God of their fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, did appear to you.”

⁶The LORD said to him further, “Put your hand into your bosom.” He put his hand into his bosom; and when he took it out, his hand was encrusted with snowy scales!^a ⁷And He said, “Put your hand back into your bosom.”—He put his hand back into his bosom; and when he took it out of his bosom, there it was again like the rest of his body.—⁸“And if they do not believe you or pay heed to the first sign, they will believe the second. ⁹And if they are not convinced by both these signs and still do not heed you, take some water from the Nile and pour it on the dry ¹⁴): “He Will Be.” The LORD is actually a translation of “‘adonai” (lit. “my Lord”) because that is what Jews now pronounce whenever the consonants YHVH appear. YHVH was probably originally pronounced “Yahweh,” but in Second Temple times, as an expression of reverence, Jews began to avoid uttering it, substituting “‘adonai” and other surrogates. (As a reminder to do so, in printed Hebrew Bibles the consonants are accompanied by the vowels of the surrogate words, leading to such hybrid English forms as Jehovah [i.e., “Yehovah” or the consonants Y-H-V-H with the vowels from “‘adonai”].) 18: The Egyptians are known to have granted to their workers time off for worship. The request may be simply to test Pharaoh’s disposition, or to deceive the tyrant (cf. the deception commanded by God in 1 Sam. 16.1-3). 22: Borrow, better, “request.” The text need not imply deception, but a favor God will cause the Egyptians to bestow upon the departing Israelites (see v. 21). Cf. God’s promise in Gen. 15.14. Some commentators see this as Egyptian compensation for the Israelites’ slave labor, or treatment in accord with Deut. 15.13-14 (Jub. 48.18; Philo, Mos. 141; b. Sanh. 91a; Bahya). 4.1-9: Three supernatural signs will confirm that Moses was indeed sent by God. All are ominous, portending harm for Egypt if it resists. 6: The snowy encrustation looks like the skin disease that renders a person impure. (On “leprosy,” see Lev. 13.2ff. n.) 9: Blood here is a sign for the Israelites, in contrast to the plague in ch 7. 10: Slow of speech and . . . tongue, encumbered with a speech impediment. 13-17: Moses’ continued resistance, after God has answered all his concerns, causes God to lose patience, but even then He further modifies His plan to accommodate Moses: Aaron will go as Moses’ spokesman. No matter what, success will depend on God being “with” the spokesman (v. 15). 16: Aaron shall speak Moses’ words, just as the ground, and it—the water that you take from the Nile—will turn to blood on the dry ground.”

¹⁰But Moses said to the LORD, “Please, O Lord, I have never been a man of words, either in times past or now that You have spoken to Your servant; I am slow of speech and slow of tongue.” ¹¹And the LORD said to him, “Who gives man speech? Who makes him dumb or deaf, seeing or blind? Is it not I, the LORD? ¹²Now go, and I will be with you as you speak and will instruct you what to say.” ¹³But he said, “Please, O Lord, make someone else Your agent.”^a ¹⁴The LORD became angry with Moses, and He said, “There is your brother Aaron the Levite. He, I know, speaks readily. Even now he is setting out to meet you, and he will be happy to see you. ¹⁵You shall speak to him and put the words in his mouth—I will be with you and with him as you speak, and tell both of you what to do—¹⁶and he shall speak for you to the people. Thus he shall serve as your spokesman, with you playing the role of God^b to him, ¹⁷and take with you this rod, with which you shall perform the signs.”

¹⁸Moses went back to his father-in-law Jethro^c and said to him, “Let me go back to my kinsmen in Egypt and see how they are faring.”^d And Jethro said to Moses, “Go in peace.”

¹⁹The LORD said to Moses in Midian, “Go back to Egypt, for all the men who sought to kill you are dead.” ²⁰So Moses took his wife and sons, mounted them on an ass, and went back to the land of Egypt; and Moses took the rod of God with him.

²¹And the LORD said to Moses, “When you return to Egypt, see that you perform before Pharaoh all the marvels that I have put within your power. I, however, will stiffen his heart so that he will not let the people go. ²²Then you shall say to Pharaoh, ‘Thus says the LORD: Israel is My first-born son. ²³I have said to you, ‘Let My son go, that he may worship Me,’ yet you refuse to let him go. Now I will slay your first-born son.’”

4.18–31: Moses returns to Egypt. 20: The rod of God with which Moses will perform some of the signs and plagues (v. 17; cf. vv. 2–4; 7.20; 9.23; 10.13; 17.5, 9). This designation suggests that it was given him by God. Sons, Gershon and Eliezer (2.22; 18.3–5). 21: I . . . will stiffen his heart, make him unyielding, impermeable to reason. As in v. 23 and 7.3, God here speaks of the final stage of the confrontation with Pharaoh (see 9.12; 10.1, 20, 27; 11.10; 14.4, 8, 17). He does not stiffen Pharaoh’s heart initially, but only after Pharaoh has done so himself many times (7.13, 14, 22; 8.11, 15, 28; 9.7, 34, 35). Then God punishes Pharaoh in kind, depriving him of the freedom to change his mind and escape further punishment. The process is drawn out so that God’s power can be made abundantly clear (7.3–5; 10.1–2). 22: Thus says the LORD: This is the formula with which a messenger introduces the words of the One who sent him (Gen. 32.5; 45.9; Exod. 5.10; etc.). It is commonly used by prophets, reflecting the prophet’s role as God’s messenger. The designation of Israel as YHVH’s first-born son reflects God’s special attachment to Israel. 23: I will slay your first-born son: In the Torah God punishes or rewards offspring for their parents’ actions. This is part of the ancient view of families as organic units. (See 20.5–6 n.) 24–26: This episode, possibly abridged from a fuller, clearer version, is extraordinarily puzzling because the motive for God’s attack is unclear, the pronouns are equivocal, and Zipporah’s remarks are enigmatic. 25: Here circumcision seems to have apotropaic (magically protective) power, and by touching her son’s foreskin to Moses’ “legs” (genitals?), Zipporah saved him. The saving power of the bloody foreskin may foreshadow the protective role of the blood on the Israelites’ doorposts on the eve of the exodus (12.7, 13, 22–23). Bridegroom of blood, cognates of Heb

²⁷The LORD said to Aaron, "Go to meet Moses in the wilderness." He went and met him at the mountain of God, and he kissed him. ²⁸Moses told Aaron about all the things that the LORD had committed to him and all the signs about which He had instructed him. ²⁹Then Moses and Aaron went and assembled all the elders of the Israelites. ³⁰Aaron repeated all the words that the LORD had spoken to Moses, and he performed the signs in the sight of the people, ³¹and the people were convinced. When they heard that the LORD had taken note of the Israelites and that He had seen their plight, they bowed low in homage.

5 Afterward Moses and Aaron went and said to Pharaoh, "Thus says the LORD, the God of Israel: Let My people go that they may celebrate a festival for Me in the wilderness." ²But Pharaoh said, "Who is the LORD that I should heed Him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD, nor will I let Israel go." ³They answered, "The God of the Hebrews has manifested Himself to us. Let us go, we pray, a distance of three days into the wilderness to sacrifice to the LORD our God, lest He strike us with pestilence or sword." ⁴But the king of Egypt said to them, "Moses and Aaron, why do you distract the people from their tasks? Get to your labors!" ⁵And Pharaoh continued, ^a"The people of the land are already so numerous," and you would have them cease from their labors!"^b

⁶That same day Pharaoh charged the taskmasters and foremen of the people, saying, ⁷"You shall no longer provide the people with straw for making bricks as heretofore; let them go and gather straw for themselves. ⁸But impose upon them the same quota of bricks as they have been making heretofore; do not reduce it, for they are shirkers; that is why they cry, 'Let us go and sacrifice to our God!' ⁹Let heavier work be laid upon the men; let them keep at it and not pay attention to deceitful promises."

¹⁰So the taskmasters and foremen of the people went out and said to the people, "Thus says Pharaoh: I will not give you any straw. ¹¹You must go and get the straw yourselves wherever you can find it; but there shall be no decrease whatever in your work." ¹²Then the people scattered throughout the land of Egypt to gather stubble for straw. ¹³And the taskmasters pressed them, saying, "You must complete the same work assignment each day as

"ḥatan," bridegroom, mean "protect" in Akkadian and Arabic, and "circumcise" in Arabic. 31: The theme that God has taken note of Israel's plight ends the episode, just as it opened it in 2.23-25 and 3.7.

5.1-6.1. The first encounter with Pharaoh. The ensuing narrative of the plagues and the defeat of the Egyptians in chs 6-15 may be viewed as God's answer to Pharaoh's contemptuous question, Who is the LORD? (v. 2). 5.1: Here and in v. 3 Moses and Aaron request only a leave for worship, as instructed by God in 3.18. 3: Lest He strike us, a reason Pharaoh should understand; failure to worship the deity would lead to punishment. 5: This v. is best understood on the assumption that the Samaritan reading ("m'm" instead of MT "m") is correct: Pharaoh claims that the Israelites already outnumber the Egyptians, and if they cease their labors they will increase even more—the very thing he sought to prevent by enslaving them (1.9-14). 7-8: Bricks were made of Nile mud mixed with sand and straw gathered from harvested fields and chopped. Egyptian documents refer to daily brickmaking quotas and, in one case, to a lack of straw. Pharaoh's new requirement was a severe additional hardship. 9: Deceitful promises, of liberation, by Moses and Aaron. 10: The foremen of the people, Israelites whom the Egyptian taskmasters placed in charge of the Israelite laborers.

when you had straw.”¹⁴ And the foremen of the Israelites, whom Pharaoh’s taskmasters had set over them, were beaten. “Why,” they were asked, “did you not complete the prescribed amount of bricks, either yesterday or today, as you did before?”

¹⁵Then the foremen of the Israelites came to Pharaoh and cried: “Why do you deal thus with your servants? ¹⁶No straw is issued to your servants, yet they demand of us: Make bricks! Thus your servants are being beaten, when the fault is with your own people.” ¹⁷He replied, “You are shirkers, shirkers! That is why you say, ‘Let us go and sacrifice to the LORD.’ ¹⁸Be off now to your work! No straw shall be issued to you, but you must produce your quota of bricks!”

6 Then the LORD said to Moses, “You shall soon see what I will do to Pharaoh: he shall let them go because of a greater might; indeed, because of a greater might he shall drive them from his land.”

²God spoke to Moses and said to him, “I am the LORD. ³I appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as El Shaddai, but I did not make Myself known to them by My name יהוה.^a ⁴I also established My covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land in which they lived as sojourners. ⁵I have now heard the moaning of the Israelites because the Egyptians are holding them in bondage, and I have remembered My covenant. ⁶Say, therefore, to the Israelite people: I am the LORD. I will free you from the labors of the Egyptians and deliver you from their bondage. I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and through extraordinary chastisements. ⁷And I will take

6.1: Drive them: Ultimately Pharaoh will be forced to expel the Israelites as quickly as possible (12.31–33).

6.2–7.13: God’s promises and Moses’ mission reaffirmed. The vindication of God’s name is the main theme of the plagues. This section, from the P source, is a variant of 3.1–6.1 (from JE), partly inconsistent and redundant with it. For example, the introduction of God’s name and the promise of liberation (6.2–8) duplicate 3.7–15; Moses is to demand unconditional release (6.11, 13; 7.2), not merely three days’ religious leave (3.18; 5.1); and Moses uses a different idiom to describe his speech impediment (6.12, 30; contrast 4.10). In its present context, however, this section reads as a response to the challenges of ch 5. 6.2: God begins His reply to Moses (and to the people in v. 6) and concludes it in v. 8, by identifying Himself with the name that conveys His full power (“to know that He is יהוה” [6.7; 7.5] means to experience or witness His power [1 Kings 20.13, 28; Isa. 52.6; Jer. 9.2]). The people are thus reassured of the power and authority that guarantee His promises. 3: יהוה is the same God who, under the name of El Shaddai, made a covenant with Israel’s ancestors (see v. 4 and cf. Gen. 17.1–8; 28.3–4; 35.11–12; 48.3–4), and He now intends to fulfill that covenant. But I did not make Myself known to them by My name יהוה: They did not experience the full power that is expressed by the name יהוה, as Israel now will. From a critical point of view, this statement is inconsistent with such vv. as Gen. 15.7; 28.13; it is another indication that different sources underlie the present narrative. One source (J) holds that the name יהוה was first known in the days of Enosh (Gen. 4.26), while others (E and P) hold that it was first revealed in the days of Moses. 7: I will take you to be My people, and I will be your God: This refers to the covenant that will be established at Mount Sinai (cf. El Shaddai’s covenant promise you to be My people, and I will be your God. And you shall know that I, the LORD, am your God who freed you from the labors of the Egyptians. ⁸I will bring you into the land which I swore^a to give to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and I will give it to you for a possession, I the LORD.” ⁹But when Moses told this to the Israelites, they would not listen to Moses, their spirits crushed by cruel bondage.

¹⁰The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ¹¹“Go and tell Pharaoh king of Egypt to let the Israelites depart from his land.” ¹²But Moses appealed to the LORD, saying, “The Israelites would not listen to me; how then should Pharaoh heed me, a man of impeded speech!” ¹³So the LORD spoke to both Moses and Aaron in regard to the Israelites and Pharaoh king of Egypt, instructing them to deliver the Israelites from the land of Egypt.

These are the families of the Levites by their lineage.

in Gen. 17.7, 8 and those in Lev. 26.12; Jer. 31.33; Hos. 2.25). The expression of this relationship (“take” and “be someone’s x”) is modeled on idioms for marrying and adopting (Gen. 4.19; Exod. 2.10; Deut. 24.1–2; 2 Sam. 7.14), implying the intimate nature of the intended relationship between God and Israel. (Marriage and the parent-child relationship are used as metaphors for the relationship between God and Israel in many biblical passages, e.g., Exod. 4.22; Deut. 14.2; Isa. 54.5–7; 62.5; Jer. 2.2; 3.19, 22; Hos. ch 2.) And you shall know that I, the LORD, am your God: See v. 2 n.

6.14–27: The pedigree of Moses and Aaron. This is apparently an extract from a larger genealogy (cf. Gen. 46.8–11; Num. 3.17–39; 26.5–14, 57–60), beginning with the descendants of Jacob’s first two sons (see Exod 1.2; Gen. 29.32–34), but only for the sake of showing the place of his third son, Levi, the ancestor of Moses and Aaron. Levi’s descendants are listed in detail, particularly Aaron and his immediate successors as high priest (v. 25). The rest of the tribes are omitted here as they are not pertinent to identifying Moses and Aaron. 20: His father’s sister: Marriage with an aunt, apparently legitimate in Amram’s time, is forbidden in Lev. 18.12–13. Jochebed must have been a much younger sister of Kohath. Aaron and Moses: Miriam (Num. 26.59) is omitted as the list names only men, apart from the mothers of the most prominent individuals. 21: Korah, see Num. ch 16. 22: Mishael, Elzaphan, see Lev. 10.4. 23: Nadab and Abihu, see Lev. 10.1–5. 25: Eleazar, Aaron’s successor, Num. 20.26–28. Phinehas, Eleazar’s successor and ancestor of the subsequent high priests; see Num. 25.1–13. 26: Troop by troop: The Israelites would not leave Egypt as fleeing slaves but as an army marching to the promised land in military formation (7.4; 12.17; 18.21b; Num. 1.52; etc.). In order to pick up the narrative following the genealogical digression, 6.28–30 and 7.1–2 of Egypt to free the Israelites from the Egyptians; these are the same Moses and Aaron. ²⁸For when the LORD spoke to Moses in the land of Egypt ²⁹and the LORD said to Moses, "I am the LORD; speak to Pharaoh king of Egypt all that I will tell you," ³⁰Moses appealed to the LORD, saying, "See, I am of impeded speech; how then should Pharaoh heed me!"

7 The LORD replied to Moses, "See, I place you in the role of God to Pharaoh, with your brother Aaron as your prophet.^a ²You shall repeat all that I command you, and your brother Aaron shall speak to Pharaoh to let the Israelites depart from his land. ³But I will harden Pharaoh's heart, that I may multiply My signs and marvels in the land of Egypt. ⁴When Pharaoh does not heed you, I will lay My hand upon Egypt and deliver My ranks, My people the Israelites, from the land of Egypt with extraordinary chastisements. ⁵And the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD, when I stretch out My hand over Egypt and bring out the Israelites from their midst." ⁶This Moses and Aaron did; as the LORD commanded them, so they did. ⁷Moses was eighty years old and Aaron eighty-three, when they made their demand on Pharaoh.

⁸The LORD said to Moses and Aaron, ⁹"When Pharaoh speaks to you and says, 'Produce your marvel,' you shall say to Aaron, 'Take your rod and cast it down before Pharaoh.' It shall turn into a serpent." ¹⁰So Moses and Aaron came before Pharaoh and did just as the LORD had commanded: Aaron cast down his rod in the presence of Pharaoh and his courtiers, and it turned into a serpent. ¹¹Then Pharaoh, for his part, summoned the wise men and the sorcerers; and the Egyptian magicians, in turn, did the same with their spells; ¹²each cast down his rod, and they turned into serpents. But Aaron's rod swallowed their rods. ¹³Yet Pharaoh's heart stiffened and he did not heed them, as the LORD had said.

recapitulate 6.9–13. 7.3–5: See 4.21. The Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD: God's "signs and marvels" will answer Pharaoh's contemptuous declaration that he does "not know the LORD" (5.2). 9: Produce your marvel, produce evidence corroborating that you were sent by a god. The marvel is one of those Moses used to convince the people of his divine mission (4.1–5). 11–13: Since Pharaoh's magicians are able to duplicate this marvel (vv. 7–12a), he is unimpressed. Nonetheless, this early confrontation foreshadows the eventual outcome of the contest between Moses and Aaron and the Egyptian magicians. The magicians use "their spells" (v. 11; 7.22), conventional magic; while Aaron works silently, relying not on his own power or on magical technique, but on an unknown power that he identifies as the LORD, whose superiority is shown when Aaron's serpent overcomes those of the magicians.

7.14–10.29: The first nine plagues. There are ten plagues in all, though the Bible nowhere states the number. Source analysis indicates that the narrative is drawn from the J, E, and P sources, which differed in the number of plagues and their details. Indications of this are, for example, inconsistencies regarding whether Aaron or Moses is to bring about the first plague and the nature of the gesture that will initiate it (7.17, 19), whether the first two plagues will involve the Nile only or all the waters of Egypt (7.17, 19, 21, 28; 8.1), and the different terms used for Pharaoh's obstinacy, "stiffening his heart" (7.22; 8.15; 9.12, 35; 10.20, 27; 11.10) and "stubbornness [lit. heaviness] of heart" (8.11, 28; 9.7, 34; rendered "harden" in 10.1). The redactor has skillfully woven the sources into three triads, each with a consistent pattern, followed by a capstone tenth plague. In introducing the first plague of each triad, God tells Moses the main lesson that triad will teach (7.17; 8.18; 9.14). The first two plagues of each triad are preceded by warnings to Pharaoh, while the third is not. Before the first plague in each group God sends Moses to Pharaoh in the morning, saying "station yourself before [Pharaoh]," and before the second he says "Go to Pharaoh" without specifying the time of day. All the plagues in the first triad are brought on by an action of Aaron; in the second triad, the first two are brought about directly by God and the third by Moses; in the third triad, all are brought on by an action of Moses. These nine plagues resemble calamities known within nature (many are attested in ancient Near Eastern literature), but their patterns, their timing and rapid succession, and refuses to let the people go. ¹⁵ Go to Pharaoh in the morning, as he is coming out to the water, and station yourself before him at the edge of the Nile, taking with you the rod that turned into a snake. ¹⁶ And say to him, "The LORD, the God of the Hebrews, sent me to you to say, "Let My people go that they may worship Me in the wilderness." But you have paid no heed until now. ¹⁷ Thus says the LORD, "By this you shall know that I am the LORD." See, I shall strike the water in the Nile with the rod that is in my hand, and it will be turned into blood; ¹⁸ and the fish in the Nile will die. The Nile will stink so that the Egyptians will find it impossible to drink the water of the Nile.' "

¹⁹ And the LORD said to Moses, "Say to Aaron: Take your rod and hold out your arm over the waters of Egypt—its rivers, its canals, its ponds, all its bodies of water—that they may turn to blood; there shall be blood throughout the land of Egypt, even in vessels of wood and stone." ²⁰ Moses and Aaron did just as the LORD commanded: he lifted up the rod and struck the water in the Nile in the sight of Pharaoh and his courtiers, and all the water in the Nile was turned into blood ²¹ and the fish in the Nile died. The Nile stank so that the Egyptians could not drink water from the Nile; and there was blood throughout the land of Egypt. ²² But when the Egyptian magicians did the same with their spells, Pharaoh's heart stiffened and he did not heed them—as the LORD had spoken. ²³ Pharaoh turned and went into his palace, paying no regard even to this. ²⁴ And all the Egyptians had to dig round about the Nile for drinking water, because they could not drink the water of the Nile.

²⁵ When seven days had passed after the LORD struck the Nile, ²⁶ the LORD said to Moses, "Go to Pharaoh and say to him, "Thus says the LORD: Let My people go that they may worship Me. ²⁷ If you refuse to let them go, then I will plague your whole country with frogs. ²⁸ The Nile shall swarm with frogs, and they shall come up and enter your palace, your bedchamber and your bed, the houses of your courtiers and your people, and your ovens and your kneading bowls. ²⁹ The frogs shall come up on you and on your people and on all your courtiers.' "

8 And the LORD said to Moses, "Say to Aaron: Hold out your arm with the rod over the rivers, the canals, and the ponds, and bring up the frogs on the land of Egypt." ² Aaron held out his arm over the waters of Egypt, and the frogs came up and covered the land of Egypt. ³ But the magicians did the same with their spells, and brought frogs upon the land of Egypt.

their announcement and removal by Moses show that they are not a random succession of natural events but the purposeful workings of divine power. The tenth plague stands by itself: Moses, still in Pharaoh's presence following the ninth plague, receives word from God and warns Pharaoh immediately of the final plague, one that will be manifestly supernatural, unlike anything known in human experience.

In this triad, the Egyptians will begin to experience the LORD's power. 7.14–24: The first plague: blood. 17: Like Israel in 6.7 and Moses in 7.5, Pharaoh is now told what the coming events will show, though he will grasp the lesson by fits and starts and more slowly than his courtiers will. 17–18: This plague is far more ominous than the sign in 4.9 because here the river itself—the deified source of Egypt's life—is affected. 22: The magicians' ability to duplicate the plague can only make matters worse for the Egyptians, but it again (see 7.11–13) convinces Pharaoh that nothing but magic is involved, so he remains unmoved. 7.25–8.11: The second plague: frogs.

⁴Then Pharaoh summoned Moses and Aaron and said, "Plead with the LORD to remove the frogs from me and my people, and I will let the people go to sacrifice to the LORD."⁵ And Moses said to Pharaoh, "You may have this triumph over me: for what time shall I plead in behalf of you and your courtiers and your people, that the frogs be cut off from you and your houses, to remain only in the Nile?"⁶ "For tomorrow," he replied. And [Moses] said, "As you say—that you may know that there is none like the LORD our God;⁷ the frogs shall retreat from you and your courtiers and your people; they shall remain only in the Nile."⁸ Then Moses and Aaron left Pharaoh's presence, and Moses cried out to the LORD in the matter of the frogs which He had inflicted upon Pharaoh.⁹ And the LORD did as Moses asked; the frogs died out in the houses, the courtyards, and the fields.¹⁰ And they piled them up in heaps, till the land stank.¹¹ But when Pharaoh saw that there was relief, he became stubborn and would not heed them, as the LORD had spoken.

¹²Then the LORD said to Moses, "Say to Aaron: Hold out your rod and strike the dust of the earth, and it shall turn to lice throughout the land of Egypt."¹³ And they did so. Aaron held out his arm with the rod and struck the dust of the earth, and vermin came upon man and beast; all the dust of the earth turned to lice throughout the land of Egypt.¹⁴ The magicians did the like with their spells to produce lice, but they could not. The vermin remained upon man and beast;¹⁵ and the magicians said to Pharaoh, "This is the finger of God!" But Pharaoh's heart stiffened and he would not heed them, as the LORD had spoken.

¹⁶And the LORD said to Moses, "Early in the morning present yourself to Pharaoh, as he is coming out to the water, and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD: Let My people go that they may worship Me.'¹⁷ For if you do not let My people go, I will let loose 'swarms of insects' against you and your courtiers and your people and your houses; the houses of the Egyptians, and the very ground they stand on, shall be filled with swarms of insects.¹⁸ But on that day I will set apart the region of Goshen, where My people dwell, so that no swarms of insects shall be there, that you may know that I the LORD am in the midst of the land.¹⁹ And I will make a distinction^b between My people and your people. Tomorrow this sign shall come to pass.'²⁰ And the LORD did so. Heavy swarms of insects invaded Pharaoh's palace and the houses of his courtiers; through-

8.4: Despite the magicians' duplication of the plague (which, again, makes matters worse), this time Pharaoh apparently realizes that his magicians cannot end the plague, and therefore that the LORD is behind it. This is the first of several partial or temporary concessions by Pharaoh, each of which is soon withdrawn (see also vv. 21, 24; 9.27–28; 10.8–11, 16–17, 24–28). 6: Allowing Pharaoh to specify the time for removing the frogs should reinforce the lesson of the LORD's unique power: He can end a plague at the very moment specified. 8.12–15: The third plague: vermin. The Heb term refers to some small insect, such as mosquitoes or lice. 14–15: The magicians' inability to duplicate this plague with their spells leads them to explicitly recognize that this is not magic but divine power.

8.16–9.12: The second three plagues. In this triad God applies the punishments only to the Egyptians and not to the Israelites (8.18–19; 9.4, 6–7; cf. 9.11), showing that He is "in the midst of the land," directing events closely and discriminatingly. 8.16–28: The fourth plague. 17: Swarms of insects, the meaning of Heb "arov" is uncertain. 18: The region of Goshen, the area in the eastern part of the Nile delta (near the Sinai peninsula), where Joseph had settled his family (Gen. 46.29, 34; 47.6; 50.8; see map, p. 130).

out the country of Egypt the land was ruined because of the swarms of insects.

²¹Then Pharaoh summoned Moses and Aaron and said, "Go and sacrifice to your God within the land." ²²But Moses replied, "It would not be right to do this, for what we sacrifice to the LORD our God is untouchable to the Egyptians. If we sacrifice that which is untouchable to the Egyptians before their very eyes, will they not stone us! ²³So we must go a distance of three days into the wilderness and sacrifice to the LORD our God as He may command us." ²⁴Pharaoh said, "I will let you go to sacrifice to the LORD your God in the wilderness; but do not go very far. Plead, then, for me." ²⁵And Moses said, "When I leave your presence, I will plead with the LORD that the swarms of insects depart tomorrow from Pharaoh and his courtiers and his people; but let not Pharaoh again act deceitfully, not letting the people go to sacrifice to the LORD."

9 The LORD said to Moses, "Go to Pharaoh and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews: Let My people go to worship Me. ²For if you refuse to let them go, and continue to hold them, ³then the hand of the LORD will strike your livestock in the fields—the horses, the asses, the camels, the cattle, and the sheep—with a very severe pestilence. ⁴But the LORD will make a distinction between the livestock of Israel and the livestock of the Egyptians, so that nothing shall die of all that belongs to the Israelites. ⁵The LORD has fixed the time: tomorrow the LORD will do this thing in the land.' " ⁶And the LORD did so the next day: all the livestock of the Egyptians died, but of the livestock of the Israelites not a beast died. ⁷When Pharaoh inquired, he found that not a head of the livestock of Israel had died; yet Pharaoh remained stubborn, and he would not let the people go.

⁸Then the LORD said to Moses and Aaron, "Each of you take handfuls of soot from the kiln, and let Moses throw it toward the sky in the sight of Pharaoh. ⁹It shall become a fine dust all over the land of Egypt, and cause an inflammation breaking out in boils on man and beast throughout the land of Egypt." ¹⁰So they took soot of the kiln and appeared before Pharaoh; Moses threw it toward the sky, 21-24: Pharaoh weakens further and begins to recognize God, saying Plead, then, for me. He makes partial concessions but will not grant all that is asked.

22: Untouchable to the Egyptians: This may be related to the Egyptian aversion mentioned in Gen. 43.32, but whether Moses means what he says or is being evasive is unclear. 24: Do not go very far, less than a distance of three days (v. 23).

9.1-7: The fifth plague: pestilence. Some type of deadly epidemic affecting livestock, perhaps anthrax. 9.8-12: The sixth plague: boils. A severe skin inflammation (cf. Deut. 28.27).

and it caused an inflammation breaking out in boils on man and beast. ¹¹The magicians were unable to confront Moses because of the inflammation, for the inflammation afflicted the magicians as well as all the other Egyptians. ¹²But the LORD stiffened the heart of Pharaoh, and he would not heed them, just as the LORD had told Moses.

¹³The LORD said to Moses, "Early in the morning present yourself to Pharaoh and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews: Let My people go to worship Me. ¹⁴For this time I will send all My plagues upon your person, and your courtiers, and your people, in order that you may know that there is none like Me in all the world. ¹⁵I could have stretched forth My hand and stricken you and your people with pestilence, and you would have been effaced from the earth. ¹⁶Nevertheless I have spared you for this purpose: in order to show you My power, and in order that My fame may resound throughout the world. ¹⁷Yet you continue to thwart^a My people, and do not let them go! ¹⁸This time tomorrow I will rain down a very heavy hail, such as has not been in Egypt from the day it was founded until now. ¹⁹Therefore, order your livestock and everything you have in the open brought under shelter; every man and beast that is found outside, not having been brought indoors, shall perish when the hail comes down upon them!' " ²⁰Those among Pharaoh's courtiers who feared the LORD's word brought their slaves and livestock indoors to safety; ²¹but those who paid no regard to the word of the LORD left their slaves and livestock in the open.

²²The LORD said to Moses, "Hold out your arm toward the sky that hail may fall on all the land of Egypt, upon man and beast and all the grasses of the field in the land of Egypt." ²³So Moses held out his rod toward the sky, and the LORD sent thunder and hail, and fire streamed down to the ground, as the LORD rained down hail upon the land of Egypt. ²⁴The hail was very heavy—fire flashing in the midst of the hail—such as had not fallen on the land of Egypt since it had become a nation. ²⁵Throughout the land of Egypt the hail struck down all that were in the open, both man and beast; the hail also struck down all the grasses of the field and shattered all the trees of the field. ²⁶Only in the region of Goshen, where the Israelites were, there was no hail.

the LORD that there may be an end of God's thunder and of hail. I will let you go; you need stay no longer."²⁹ Moses said to him, "As I go out of the city, I shall spread out my hands to the LORD; the thunder will cease and the hail will fall no more, so that you may know that the earth is the LORD's."³⁰ But I know that you and your courtiers do not yet fear the LORD God."³¹ Now the flax and barley were ruined, for the barley was in the ear and the flax was in bud;³² but the wheat and the emmer^a were not hurt, for they ripen late.—³³ Leaving Pharaoh, Moses went outside the city and spread out his hands to the LORD: the thunder and the hail ceased, and no rain came pouring down upon the earth.³⁴ But when Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunder had ceased, he became stubborn and reverted to his guilty ways, as did his courtiers.³⁵ So Pharaoh's heart stiffened and he would not let the Israelites go, just as the LORD had foretold through Moses.

10 Then the LORD said to Moses, "Go to Pharaoh. For I have hardened his heart and the hearts of his courtiers, in order that I may display these My signs among them,² and that you may recount in the hearing of your sons and of your sons' sons how I made a mockery of the Egyptians and how I displayed My signs among them—in order that you may know that I am the LORD."³ So Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh and said to him, "Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews, 'How long will you refuse to humble yourself before Me? Let My people go that they may worship Me.⁴ For if you refuse to let My people go, tomorrow I will bring locusts on your territory.⁵ They shall cover the surface of the land, so that no one will be able to see the land. They shall devour the surviving remnant that was left to you after the hail; and they shall eat away all your trees that grow in the field.⁶ Moreover, they shall fill your palaces and the houses of all your courtiers and of all the Egyptians—something that neither your fathers nor fathers' fathers have seen from the day they appeared on earth to this day.' " With that he turned and left Pharaoh's presence.

⁷Pharaoh's courtiers said to him, "How long shall this one be a snare to us? Let the men go to worship the LORD their God! Are you not yet aware that Egypt is lost?"⁸ So Moses and Aaron were brought back to Pharaoh and he said to them, "Go, worship the LORD your God! and old: we will go with our sons and daughters, our flocks and herds; for we must observe the LORD's festival."¹⁰ But he said to them, "The LORD be with you the same as I mean to let your children go with you! Clearly, you are bent on mischief."¹¹ No! You menfolk go and worship the LORD, since that is what you want." And they were expelled from Pharaoh's presence.

¹² Then the LORD said to Moses, "Hold out your arm over the land of Egypt for the locusts, that they may come upon the land of Egypt and eat up all the grasses in the land, whatever the hail has left."¹³ So Moses held out his rod over the land of Egypt, and the LORD drove an east wind over the land all that day and all night; and when morning came, the east wind had brought the locusts.¹⁴ Locusts invaded all the land of Egypt and settled within all the territory of Egypt in a thick mass; never before had there been so many, nor will there ever be so many again.¹⁵ They hid all the land from view, and the land was darkened; and they ate up all the grasses of the field and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left, so that nothing green was left, of tree or grass of the field, in all the land of Egypt.

¹⁶ Pharaoh hurriedly summoned Moses and Aaron and said, "I stand guilty before the LORD your God and before you.¹⁷ Forgive my offense just this once, and plead with the LORD your God that He but remove this death from me."¹⁸ So he left Pharaoh's presence and pleaded with the LORD.¹⁹ The LORD caused a shift to a very strong west wind, which lifted the locusts and hurled them into the Sea of Reeds;^a not a single locust remained in all the territory of Egypt.²⁰ But the LORD stiffened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let the Israelites go.

²¹ Then the LORD said to Moses, "Hold out your arm toward the sky that there may be darkness upon the land of Egypt, a darkness that can be touched."²² Moses held out his arm toward the sky and thick darkness descended upon all the land of Egypt for three days.²³ People could not see one another, and for three days no one could get up from where he was; but all the Israelites enjoyed light in their dwellings.

²⁴ Pharaoh then summoned Moses and said, "Go, worship the LORD! Only your flocks and your herds shall be left behind; even your children may go with you."²⁵ But Moses said, "You yourself must provide us with sacrifices and burnt offerings to offer up to the LORD our God;²⁶ our own livestock, too, shall go along with us—not a hoof shall remain behind: for we must select from it for the worship of the LORD our God; and we shall not know with what we are to worship the LORD until we arrive there.”²⁷ But the LORD stiffened Pharaoh’s heart and he would not agree to let them go.²⁸ Pharaoh said to him, “Be gone from me! Take care not to see me again, for the moment you look upon my face you shall die.”²⁹ And Moses replied, “You have spoken rightly. I shall not see your face again!”

10.21–29: The ninth plague: darkness. Since the darkness "can be touched" (v. 21), it may reflect a "hamsin," the hot southerly wind from the Sahara desert, carrying unusually dense concentrations of sand and dust that block out sunlight. 24–26: Pharaoh will permit the people to go but not their flocks, as if to undermine the purpose for which the Israelites are leaving—to sacrifice, which requires animals from the flocks. Moses counters by demanding that Pharaoh provide the sacrificial animals from his own livestock, and also insists that the Israelite livestock also go with them. Moses seeks Pharaoh's total capitulation to God.

11 And the LORD said to Moses, “I will bring but one more plague upon Pharaoh and upon Egypt; after that he shall let you go from here; indeed, when he lets you go, he will drive you out of here one and all.² Tell the people to borrow, each man from his neighbor and each woman from hers, objects of silver and gold.”³ The LORD disposed the Egyptians favorably toward the people. Moreover, Moses himself was much esteemed in the land of Egypt, among Pharaoh’s courtiers and among the people.

⁴ Moses said, “Thus says the LORD: Toward midnight I will go forth among the Egyptians,⁵ and every first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first-born of Pharaoh who sits on his throne to the first-born of the slave girl who is behind the millstones; and all the first-born of the cattle.⁶ And there shall be a loud cry in all the land of Egypt, such as has never been or will ever be again;⁷ but not a dog shall snarl^a at any of the Israelites, at man or a Others “move (or whet) his tongue.”

28–29: Moses only partially quotes Pharaoh, acknowledging that they will never again meet, but undermining Pharaoh’s claim that it is Moses who will die.

11.1–13.16: The tenth plague, the exodus, and commemorative festivals. The composite nature of this section is indicated by differences in the ritual instructions (e.g., 13.3–10 n.), discontinuities in the narrative, and verbal and other links to the various sources in the Torah. Source critics agree that one component of this section is from the Priestly source (11.9–12.20; 12.28, 40–41; 12.43–13.2); they disagree over which parts of the remainder belong to J, E, and (in some views) D. The most puzzling issue is the premature location of 12.14–20: God refers to the exodus in the past tense (v. 17a), though the event does not occur until vv. 37–41, and He commands that the day be commemorated by eating unleavened bread for a week, though the reason for doing so does not occur until vv. 34 and 39. Vv. 21–27 (J) are unaware of this command: When Moses conveys God’s instructions about the pesah sacrifice, he tells the people instead to commemorate the event in the future by reenacting the sacrifice. He informs them of the seven-day festival of unleavened bread only later in 13.3–10, after the text explains why the people ate unleavened bread on the day of the exodus. The redactor’s reason for placing vv. 14–20 right after vv. 1–13 (both units are from P), despite the resultant disturbance of the continuity, was evidently his desire to fuse the festival of unleavened bread and the pesah offering—originally separate rites (see 12.14–20 n.)—into a single holiday with the same date (vv. 6, 18). He may have believed that the fact that the meal accompanying the pesah offering included unleavened bread implied that they are part of the same festival, as if the Feast of Unleavened Bread commemorated the fact that the people ate matzah with the pesah offering (v. 8).

11.1–10: The announcement of the tenth plague. The final and decisive plague would be a virulent epidemic (Ps. 78.50) of preternatural specificity, causing the sudden death of all first-born Egyptians. This plague corresponds to the Egyptians’ murder of the Hebrew baby boys (1.22; the Egyptian people’s cooperation with Pharaoh’s decree is implied by 2.2–3). Exod. 4.22–23 explains it as measure-for-measure punishment for Pharaoh’s refusal to free Israel, God’s “first-born.” 11.1: He will drive you out, see 6.1. 2–3: See 3.22. Much esteemed, held in awe because of the power he has displayed. 4–8: Although God does not tell Moses the nature of the final plague in vv. 1–3, according to the present form of the narrative Moses already knew it from God’s words in 4.22–23. To make the narrative read more clearly, the Samaritan Pentateuch has Moses quote those words to Pharaoh here, and it also copies vv. 4–7 into God’s words in vv. 1–3. According to that reading, then, in vv. 4–7 Moses is telling Pharaoh what God previously told him. Such additions to smooth out the narrative are typical of the Samaritan Pentateuch, and are also found in some Dead Sea Scrolls. 6–7: This plague manifests the probative qualities of the second and third triads of plagues: It will be unprecedented (9.18; 10.6, 14), and God will make a distinction between Egypt and Israel (see 8.18–19; 9.4, 6–7)—signs of the beast—in order that you may know that the LORD makes a distinction between Egypt and Israel.

⁸“Then all these courtiers of yours shall come down to me and bow low to me, saying, ‘Depart, you and all the people who follow you!’ After that I will depart.” And he left Pharaoh’s presence in hot anger.

⁹Now the LORD had said to Moses, “Pharaoh will not heed you, in order that My marvels may be multiplied in the land of Egypt.” ¹⁰Moses and Aaron had performed all these marvels before Pharaoh, but the LORD had stiffened the heart of Pharaoh so that he would not let the Israelites go from his land.

12 The LORD said to Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt: ²This month shall mark for you the beginning of the months; it shall be the first of the months of the year for you. ³Speak to the whole community of Israel and say that on the tenth of this month each of them shall take a lamb^a to a family, a lamb to a household. ⁴But if the household is too small for a lamb, let him share one with a neighbor who dwells nearby, in proportion to the number of persons: you shall contribute for the lamb according to what each household will eat. ⁵Your lamb shall be without blemish, a yearling male; you may take it from the sheep or from the goats. ⁶You shall keep watch over it until the fourteenth day of this month; and all the assembled congregaunique divine power beyond the event. 6: Loud cry, measure-for-measure punishment for causing the outcry of the Israelites (2.23). 7: Not a dog shall snarl! In contrast to the loud cry among the Egyptians, peace and quiet will prevail among the Israelites. 10: The LORD had stiffened the heart of Pharaoh: See 4.21 n.

12.1–28: Preparations for the exodus. Israel is to prepare for the coming redemption with a sacrificial banquet while the final plague is occurring and is to commemorate the event in the future on its anniversary by eating unleavened bread for a week and reenacting the banquet. This banquet became the prototype of the postbiblical Seder, the festive meal at which the exodus story is retold and expounded each year to this day on the holiday of Pesah (Passover), as explained below. 2: Since the exodus will be commemorated on its anniversary every year (vv. 6, 17–18), the preparatory instructions begin with the calendar. Henceforth the year will commence with the month of the exodus, and months will be referred to by ordinal numbers rather than names (see v. 18; 16.1; 19.1; Lev. 23.24; etc.). Since the numbers will mean essentially “in the Xth month since we gained freedom,” every reference to a month will commemorate the redemption. The first month (later called Nisan [Esth. 3.7; Neh. 2.1])—these later month names were borrowed from the Babylonian calendar during the exile) corresponds to March or April. In Jewish practice, this is the beginning of the liturgical year; it was also the beginning of the Babylonian year. The calendar year, starting with Rosh Ha-Shanah (the New Year holiday, in the seventh month!), begins in Tishri (September or October). (The older, nature-based, names of a few months are mentioned in 13.4; Deut. 16.1; 1 Kings 6.1, 37, 38; 8.2.) Because vv. 1–20 deal with the month in which Pesah falls and with preparations for the holiday, they are read as an additional Torah portion on the Sabbath preceding the month of Nisan, or on the first of Nisan if it is a Sabbath, and that Sabbath is called Shabbat ha-Ḥodesh, “the Sabbath of the passage beginning ‘This month.’” The rest of the ch, which includes the observance of the first Pesah and the exodus, is read on the first day of Pesah. 5: Without blemish, a standard requirement of sacrificial animals (Lev. 22.17–25; Deut. 15.21; 17.1; cf. Mal. 1.6–8). 6–14: Some of the vv. about the sacrifice reflect a different view of the tenth plague from that in the rest of the narrative. In the rest of the narrative, God Himself slays the Egyptian first-born; no special measures are necessary to protect the Israelites (11.4–7; 12.29; 13.15). But in some of the vv. about the sacrifice God is accompanied by “the Destroyer,” an angel of death who presumably kills the Egyptians on God’s command (v. 23; cf. Gen. 19.13–14; 2 Sam. 24.16; 2 Kings 18.35; 1 Chron. 21.15); the Israelites must apply the blood of the sacrifice to their doorways to prevent the plague from harming them (vv. 7, 13, 22 and 23), although no such measures were needed to protect them from the earlier plagues (8.18; 9.4, 6, 26—all from J; 10.23, E); in v. 22 God warns all Israelites (not just the first-born) to remain indoors; in v. 23 He “protects” their houses from the Destroyer; and again in v. 27 He “protects” and “saves” them, presumably from the Destroyer. From these details scholars have conjectured that the sacrifice was not an original part of the narrative about the plagues but was based on an older shepherds’ rite observed on a spring night (perhaps the night before they set tion of the Israelites shall slaughter it at twilight. ⁷They shall take some of the blood and put it on the two doorposts and the lintel of the houses in which they are to eat it. ⁸They shall eat the flesh that same night; they shall eat it roasted over the fire, with unleavened bread and with bitter herbs. ⁹Do not eat any of it raw, or cooked in any way with water, but roasted—head, legs, and entrails—over the fire. ¹⁰You shall not leave any of it over until morning; if any of it is left until morning, you shall burn it.

¹¹This is how you shall eat it: your loins girded, your sandals on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and you shall eat it hurriedly: it is a passover offering^a to the LORD. ¹²For that night I will go through the land of Egypt and strike down every first-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and I will mete out punishments to all the gods of Egypt, I the LORD. ¹³And the blood on the houses where you are staying shall be a sign for you: when I see the blood I will pass over^b you, so that no plague will destroy you when I strike the land of Egypt.

¹⁴This day shall be to you one of remembrance: you shall celebrate it as a festival to the LORD throughout the

out for summer pasture) when shepherds believed they were endangered by demons who could be warded off by remaining indoors and applying blood to their entrances. This view of the sacrifice and its blood as apotropaic (magically protective) is consistent with its Heb name, "pesah," "protection"; see v. 11. According to this theory, the Israelites inherited this rite from their pastoral ancestors (see Gen. 46.32) but, because of its proximity in the calendar to the time of the exodus, they reinterpreted it as a memorial of the exodus and introduced it into the narrative of the tenth plague. Gradually they abandoned its demonological-apotropaic aspects in favor of its meaning as a commemoration of the exodus. Traces of this process are visible here: Of the vv. attributed to a source other than P, only v. 23 implies that the Destroyer does the killing; vv. 27 and 29 say that God did the killing, but v. 27, in stating that God "protected" and "saved" the Israelites' houses, preserves a trace of the older tradition that it was the Destroyer. In vv. attributed to P (12–13), only God does the killing; the Destroyer becomes merely a destructive plague, and the blood is merely a sign to identify Israelite houses (like the red cord in Josh. 2.12, 18, 19), not an apotropaic substance. 6: Keep watch, to prevent it from becoming blemished or escaping during the interval. 8: Bitter herbs are pungent condiments (popular among pastoral nomads) and unleavened bread (Heb "matzah," bread that has not risen) frequently accompanied sacrifices (29.2; Lev. 2.4–5; 6.9; 7.12; Judg. 6.19–21; etc.); leavened bread was forbidden with most sacrifices: Exod. 23.18; 34.25; Lev. 2.11; 6.10). Following the prescription of vv. 24–27, this banquet is reenacted annually at the Seder, the liturgical banquet which includes the eating of unleavened bread, bitter herbs ("maror," interpreted as recalling the bitterness of slavery; romaine lettuce or horseradish are commonly used), and other symbolic foods. A roasted shankbone is displayed as a token of the roasted meat, and the story of the exodus, accompanied by rabbinic interpretations, is expounded, based on vv. 26–27 and 13.8. (The provisions of vv. 10 and 11 are not reenacted.) 10: The sacrifice must be used only for its sacred purpose; hence no leftovers may be saved for eating later. 11: The Israelites are to eat while prepared to leave on a moment's notice. Passover offering, Heb "pesah," which originally referred only to the sacrifice. Later it became the name of the entire festival, including the seven days of the Festival of Unleavened Bread ("Ḥag ha-Matzot"), originally a separate holiday. In most European languages it is also the name of Easter (as in French "Pâques"). The translation "passover" (and hence the English name of the holiday) is probably incorrect. The alternative translation "protective offering" is more likely; see v. 13. 12: Mete out punishments to all the gods of Egypt: This probably means that the Egyptians' idols would be destroyed in the course of the plague (Tg. Ps.-J.; Mek.), just as the Philistine idol Dagon is smashed, and other plagues inflicted on the Philistines, in 1 Sam. ch 5 (Ibn Ezra), and just as Assyrian armies sometimes smashed the idols of conquered cities (2 Kings 19.18). 13: Pass over (Heb "pesah"): The use of this verb in Isa. 31.5, "Like the birds that fly, even so will the LORD of Hosts shield Jerusalem, shielding and saving, protecting ("p-s-h") and rescuing," favors the translation "protect." So does context in v. 23 of the present ch. 14–20: The Feast of Unleavened Bread. The haste of the Israelites' departure from Egypt would leave them no time to bake leavened bread (see vv. 34, 39). In the future, their annual week-long self-deprivation of leavened bread will serve as a reminder that God so overwhelmed the Egyptians that the latter ultimately hastened the departure of the slaves they had earlier refused to free. As it does here, the Torah usually speaks of this festival as something distinct and separate from the pesah sac-

ages; you shall celebrate it as an institution for all time. ¹⁵Seven days you shall eat unleavened bread; on the very first day you shall remove leaven from your houses, for whoever eats leavened bread from the first day to the seventh day, that person shall be cut off from Israel.

¹⁶You shall celebrate a sacred occasion on the first day, and a sacred occasion on the seventh day; no work at all shall be done on them; only what every person is to eat, that alone may be prepared for you. ¹⁷You shall observe the [Feast of] Unleavened Bread, for on this very day I brought your ranks out of the land of Egypt; you shall observe this day throughout the ages as an institution for all time. ¹⁸In the first month, from the fourteenth day of the month at evening, you shall eat unleavened bread until the twenty-first day of the month at evening. ¹⁹No leaven shall be found in your houses for seven days. For whoever eats what is leavened, that person shall be cut off from the community of Israel, whether he is a stranger or a citizen of the country. ²⁰You shall eat nothing leavened; in all your settlements you shall eat unleavened bread.

²¹Moses then summoned all the elders of Israel and said to them, "Go, pick out lambs for your families, and slaughter the passover offering. ²²Take a bunch of hyssop, dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and apply some of rifice rather than part of the same holiday (see vv. 24–27, 43–49; 13.3–9; 23.15; 34.18; Lev. 23.5–6; Num. 9.1–14; 28.16–17; see also Ezra 6.19–22; 2 Chron. 35.17; only Deut. 16.1–8, 16; Ezek. 45.21; and 2 Chron. 30.2, 5, 13, 15 describe them as a single festival). This has led to the theory that the pesah sacrifice and the Feast of Unleavened Bread have separate origins, the former pastoral (see vv. 6–14 n.) and the latter agrarian. The avoidance of leaven in favor of unleavened bread—"bread of distress" (Deut. 16.3)—suggests that the latter may have begun as a rite of abstinence, perhaps expressing anxiety over the success of the coming grain harvest. The two rites were eventually brought together because of their proximity in the calendar and because unleavened bread was also eaten with the pesah sacrifice (v. 8). In this view, then, the Festival of Unleavened Bread became a commemoration of the exodus because, like the pesah sacrifice, it was observed at the time of year when the exodus took place. In the Bible, any agrarian significance the festival once had has been set aside in favor of its meaning as a commemoration of the exodus. 15: Unleavened bread: The "matzah" was probably similar to the flat unleavened bread like pita that Bedouin still bake on embers. In earlier times it was disk-shaped and less thin than now. Leaven refers to leavening agents, such as sourdough or yeast, while leavened bread is any food prepared from dough to which a leavening agent was added to make it rise faster. According to rabbinic halakhic exegesis the prohibition covers any leavened product of wheat, barley, spelt, rye, or oats; in traditional Ashkenazic practice, rice, millet, corn, and legumes are also forbidden. Remove leaven from your houses: In traditional Jewish practice, the home is cleansed of leavened products in preparation for Pesah and, on the night before the Seder, a few pieces of bread or other leavened products are hidden and "found" in a ceremonial search; the next morning the pieces are burned. Halakhic exegesis construes Deut. 16.4 to mean "no leaven of yours shall be seen," meaning that only leaven belonging to Jews must be eliminated. Leavened goods sold to non-Jews for the duration of the festival may be kept and stored out of sight in one's home. This avoids the economic hardship that would result from the destruction of large quantities of leavened goods. Cut off: The probable meaning is that God will cut him off (see Lev. 17.10; 20.1–6; 23.29–30), that is, cause him to die early and childless. This is the punishment for noncircumcision and cultic and sexual sins (v. 19; 30.33, 38; 31.14; Gen. 17.14; Lev. 7.20, 21, 25, 27; 17.4, 9, 14; 18.29; 19.8; 20.1–6, 17, 18; 22.3, 29; Num. 9.13; 19.13, 20) that are committed "defiantly" (Num. 15.30–31). 16: The sacredness of these days is to be expressed by ceasing from work, as on the Sabbath (20.8–11; cf. Gen. 2.2–3), except that, on the festival, food may be cooked (contrast 16.23). 17: Since the text reads lit. "You shall observe the unleavened bread," an especially stringent interpretation holds that the grain should be carefully guarded from the time it is harvested, or at least from the time it is ground into flour, to ensure that there is no fermentation. Matzah made in this way is called "matzah shemurah," "guarded matzah." 18: Since holy days begin and end in the evening (Lev. 23.32), the festival lasts from the evening at the end of the fourteenth day through the evening at the end of the twenty-first day. 19: Stranger, a foreigner residing among the Israelites. Although strangers are not obligated to offer a pesah sacrifice (v. 48), they may not eat leavened food during the festival. This is perhaps to prevent them from accidentally contaminating Israelites' food with leaven, since bread was sometimes baked in shared or communal ovens (Lev. 26.26; Jer. 37.21; Neh. 3.11;

the blood that is in the basin to the lintel and to the two doorposts. None of you shall go outside the door of his house until morning. ²³For when the LORD goes through to smite the Egyptians, He will see the blood on the lintel and the two doorposts, and the LORD will pass over^a the door and not let the Destroyer enter and smite your home.

²⁴“You shall observe this as an institution for all time, for you and for your descendants. ²⁵And when you enter the land that the LORD will give you, as He has promised, you shall observe this rite. ²⁶And when your children ask you, ‘What do you mean by this rite?’ ²⁷you shall say, ‘It is the passover sacrifice^b to the LORD, because He passed over^a the houses of the Israelites in Egypt when He smote the Egyptians, but saved our houses.’”

The people then bowed low in homage. ²⁸And the Israelites went and did so; just as the LORD had commanded Moses and Aaron, so they did.

²⁹In the middle of the night the LORD struck down all the first-born in the land of Egypt, from the first-born of Pharaoh who sat on the throne to the first-born of the captive who was in the dungeon, and all the first-born of the cattle.

³⁰And Pharaoh arose in the night, with all his courtiers and all the Egyptians—because there was a loud cry in Egypt; for there was no house where there was not someone dead. ³¹He summoned Moses and Aaron in the night and said, “Up, depart from among my people, you and the Israelites with you! Go, worship the LORD as you said! ³²Take also your flocks and your herds, as you said, and begone! And may you bring a blessing upon me also!”

³³The Egyptians urged the people on, impatient to have them leave the country, for they said, “We shall all be dead.” ³⁴So the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading bowls wrapped in their cloaks upon their shoulders. ³⁵The Israelites had done Moses’ bidding and borrowed from the Egyptians objects of sil-

12.38). 23: Pass over, rather, “protect” (see above, v. 13 n.). Destroyer, see introductory comment to vv. 6–14. The tradition that an angelic figure served as God’s agent in the exodus and subsequent events is also reflected in 14.19; 23.20–23 (see also the plan announced by God in 32.34 and 33.2 but withdrawn in 33.14; Num. 20.16; Josh. 5.13–15; Judg. 2.1–5; and Ps. 78.49). This tradition is rejected in other passages which hold that God was the only actor, using no intermediary (Exod. 33.14–15; Deut. 4.37; 7.1 [based on but modifying Exod. 23.20]; 32.12; see also the probably original text of Isa. 63.9 reflected in the readings of the ancient versions). This disagreement was still alive in talmudic times and led to the well-known midrashic passage quoted in the Haggadah which declares that Israel was taken out of Egypt by God personally, “not by means of an angel.” This declaration indicates that the Rabbis, like the authors of the biblical verses denying a role to angels, considered the tradition of angelic involvement incompatible with absolute monotheism. 24: Observe this: According to talmudic tradition (m. Pes. 9.5) only the sacrifice itself is to be repeated annually, not the rites accompanying it in vv. 3, 7, 10–11, 23. Ibn Ezra accepts this tradition on authority but observes that one would not infer this from the text itself.

26–27: Here and in 13.8, 14–15 and Deut. 6.20–25, the Torah anticipates that children will ask what the various commemorative rites and other laws mean (see also Josh. 4.21–24). The Israelites are to use these questions as opportunities to teach loyalty to God by explaining what He did for them. The religious value of such lessons about the past accounts for why much of the Bible is devoted to past events and for the theological viewpoint of biblical historiography. A midrashic elaboration of these passages about children figures prominently in the Haggadah as part of the answer to the children’s Four Questions about the unique procedures at the Seder banquet. It explains that the wording of the question in each passage reflects a different type of personality.

12.29–42: The tenth plague and the exodus. 31–33: Pharaoh and his people press the Israelites to leave (see also v. 39). Cf. 6.1; 11.1. 31: As you said, 3.18; 5.3; 7.16.

Pharaoh is granting no more than Moses asked, three days’ leave for worship (only in 14.5 does he realize they mean to leave for good, though he suspected that earlier [8.24; 10.10]). 32: May you bring a blessing upon me also, i.e., leave with your cattle to worship the LORD (v. 31) with sacrifice, as you said (3.18; 5.3, 8, 17; 8.4, 21–25; 10.25–26), and when you sacrifice and ask for His blessing (see 20.21 end; Lev. 9.22), ask Him to bless ver and gold, and clothing.³⁶ And the LORD had disposed the Egyptians favorably toward the people, and they let them have their request; thus they stripped the Egyptians.

³⁷The Israelites journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand men on foot, aside from children.³⁸ Moreover, a mixed multitude went up with them, and very much livestock, both flocks and herds.³⁹ And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough that they had taken out of Egypt, for it was not leavened, since they had been driven out of Egypt and could not delay; nor had they prepared any provisions for themselves.

⁴⁰The length of time that the Israelites lived in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years;⁴¹ at the end of the four hundred and thirtieth year, to the very day, all the ranks of the LORD departed from the land of Egypt.⁴² That was for me as well. Pharaoh may have a specific blessing—cessation of the tenth plague—in mind (cf. 8.4, 24; 9.28; 10.17), but in any case his plea indicates that his capitulation to the LORD is complete. 35–36: See 3.22. 37: From Rameses to Succoth: On Rameses, the capital, see 1.11. Succoth was the name of both a place and a region in the eastern Nile delta, in or near the land of Goshen where the Israelites lived (see 8.18 and map, p. 130). An Egyptian letter from the period of Pharaoh Seti II (1204–1198 BCE) indicates that the place Succoth was one day's journey from the palace, which was presumably in Rameses. On the reasons for the Israelites following this route, see 13.17 n. Six hundred thousand men, a round number; see also Num. 11.21; Num. 1.46 and 2.32 give the number more precisely as 603,550 (Num. 3.39 adds 22,000 Levites). According to Exod. 38.26 and Num. 1.46–47, these figures refer to men of military age, twenty and older. Adding women and children yields a population of at least two and a half million. Some scholars believe that in census contexts the word translated thousand ("elef") does not have numerical significance but means "clan" or "squad" (as in Num. 1.16; Judg. 6.15; 1 Sam. 10.19; and elsewhere), in which case the number of people need not be that high, but it is clear from 38.24–26 and other passages that individuals, not groups, are being counted. This number certainly accords with Exodus' assertions that the Israelites in Egypt were extraordinarily prolific (1.7–12), though the land of Goshen and later the Sinai peninsula could not have sustained such a population. The number probably originated in hyperbole, perhaps as an expansion of the common 600-man military unit (14.7; Judg. 18.11; 1 Sam. 13.15; 23.13; etc.). Comparably, the Haggadah inflates the number of plagues from ten to fifty, and Arabian Bedouin often magnify numbers by factors of ten. Note also the thousand-fold population growth wished for by Moses (Deut. 1.11) and the 3-million-person army attributed to Kirta, the king of the city-state of Ugarit. 38: Mixed multitude, non-Israelites, most likely members of other enslaved groups in Egypt. Egyptian texts and art show the presence of such groups, including Semites and Nubians. 39: In their haste, the Israelites made unleavened bread because it can be made quickly (for that reason, it is made for unexpected guests [Gen. 19.3; Judg. 6.19; 1 Sam. 28.24], as Arab peasants still do). 40–41: The figure of 430 years of Israelite residence in Egypt (P) is compatible with the 400 years of slavery and oppression predicted in Gen. 15.13 (JE or E), assuming that the oppression began thirty years after Israel arrived in Egypt. Gen. 15.16 (also JE or E), however, states that the Israelites would return in the fourth generation (of living there), a statement compatible with the fact that Moses is the great-grandson of Levi, who went down to Egypt (Exod. 6.16–20). If a generation is the period between a man's birth and the birth of his first child, these two passages are hard to reconcile: Even assuming a generation of forty years (although twenty to twenty-five is more likely), four generations would be no more than 160 years. The Septuagint, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and midrashic traditions (Seder Olam 1 and 3; Mek. R. Shimon bar Yohai, p. 34 at 12.40; Mek. Pisha 14 [Horovitz p. 50]; Pirqe R. El. 48, p. 114a) minimize the problem by including in these figures the time the patriarchs lived in Canaan, starting with the covenant of Gen. ch 15 or the birth of Isaac, though that is not what our v. or Gen. ch 15 says. 41: The ranks of the LORD: The Israelites are organized as an army, their goal being the conquest of Canaan; cf. v. 51 and 13.18 and their designation as "men on foot," that is, infantry, in v. 37. 42: Vigil, Heb "shimurim." Although derivatives of the root "sh-m-r," "watch, guard, observe" are common (they occur five other times in this ch, vv. 6, 17 twice, 24, 25), this form is unparalleled in the Bible. In rabbinic Heb it means "guarding, care." If that is the meaning here, this v. may represent an interpretation of the term "pesal" (see vv. 11, 13 n.). The sense would be that God guarded the Israelites from the Destroyer on the night of the exodus and will guard them against malevolent forces on the anniversaries of this night (thus Tg. Ps.-J. and b. Pes. 109b; in that case the v. is a vestige of a magical notion that this date is particularly dangerous, as in the presumed shepherds' belief mentioned in vv. 6–14 n.). Possibly, the term has different nuances and different subjects in the LORD a night of vigil to bring them out of the land of Egypt; that same night is the LORD's, one of vigil for all the children of Israel throughout the ages.

⁴³The LORD said to Moses and Aaron: This is the law of the passover offering: No foreigner shall eat of it. ⁴⁴But any slave a man has bought may eat of it once he has been circumcised. ⁴⁵No bound or hired laborer shall eat of it. ⁴⁶It shall be eaten in one house: you shall not take any of the flesh outside the house; nor shall you break a bone of it. ⁴⁷The whole community of Israel shall offer it. ⁴⁸If a stranger who dwells with you would offer the passover to the LORD, all his males must be circumcised; then he shall each clause; e.g., it was a night of God's protection of Israel at the exodus, so in the future it will be a night of Israel's observance of the pesah sacrifice. The translation "vigil" implies that it was a night of God's vigilance, protecting Israel (or of Israel's vigilance waiting for God to deliver them [taking "for the LORD a night of vigil" as "a night of waiting for the LORD"]), and in the future it will be a night of wakefulness for Israel to offer the pesah sacrifice ("a night of vigil in honor of the LORD").

be admitted to offer it; he shall then be as a citizen of the country. But no uncircumcised person may eat of it.
 49 There shall be one law for the citizen and for the stranger who dwells among you.

50 And all the Israelites did so; as the LORD had commanded Moses and Aaron, so they did.

51 That very day the LORD freed the Israelites from the land of Egypt, troop by troop.

13 The LORD spoke further to Moses, saying, ²“Consecrate to Me every first-born; man and beast, the first issue of every womb among the Israelites is Mine.”

12.43–51: Seven supplementary rules about the pesah offering (vv. 43b, 44, 45, 46a, 46b, 47, 48–49). V. 50, which recapitulates v. 28, implies that these instructions were given before the Israelites departed. They define who is eligible to take part in the pesah offering and other details concerning it. Those instructions pertaining to foreigners, “strangers” (resident aliens), and slaves and employees of Israelites seem, like those in vv. 24–27, to apply primarily to the future, after Israel settles in the promised land, rather than to their circumstances in Egypt; note particularly that once circumcised the stranger becomes “as a citizen of the country” (of Israel). 43: Foreigner, Heb “ben nekhar,” a non-Israelite; normally used of foreigners living or visiting in the land of Israel temporarily, usually for business. It is contrasted with “stranger” (“ger”), which refers to a long-term foreign resident. Here it could also refer to Egyptians or other foreigners in Egypt on friendly terms with the Israelites (cf. Isa. 56.3). Because the pesah sacrifice is integrally connected with Israel’s national experience of the exodus, those who do not identify with Israelites and their experience are ineligible to partake of it. Likewise, according to Lev. 23.42, only native Israelites are obligated to dwell in booths, another rite that commemorates Israel’s national experience. 44–45: The implications of the pesah sacrifice being a family-household ceremony (vv. 3, 4, 7, 27, 46). 44: Privately owned foreign slaves, as members of the household, may partake if they are circumcised in accordance with Gen. 17.12–13. 45: Bound or hired laborer: This phrase (lit. “resident and hireling”) is better taken as a hendiadys meaning “resident hireling” (as in Lev. 22.10; 25.6, 40), a long-term hired hand who lives on his employer’s property. He is not integrated into his employer’s household. If a foreigner, he is ineligible for the pesah; if an Israelite, the verse seems to imply that he should partake of his own family’s pesah sacrifice, not that of his employer. 46: All those sharing the same lamb were to eat it together and to remain indoors. See vv. 4, 7, 22–23. Break a bone of it, to eat the marrow. 47: Offering the pesah sacrifice is incumbent on all Israelites, like the obligation to eat nothing leavened during the festival (vv. 15, 19; cf. Num. 9.11). 48–49: Resident aliens, though they must abstain from leaven (v. 19), are not obligated to offer a pesah sacrifice but may do so voluntarily. They must first undergo circumcision. Then they may make the offering and become “as a citizen of the country,” at least for purposes of this offering. This is not a full religious conversion—the stranger’s motivation is to make a pesah offering, not to become an Israelite—but since circumcision is a sign of the covenant, and the sacrifice celebrates the exodus, he must first become a quasi-Israelite in order to identify with Israel’s defining national experience. If so, this ceremony is unique in the Bible; there is no other reference to a formal procedure for converting foreigners to Israelites, even quasi-Israelites. Foreigners normally became Israelites only by marriage or the informal, generations-long process of ethnic assimilation that resulted from living in the land. By the rabbinic period, a procedure for religious conversion, including circumcision of males, was created and the Heb word for stranger, “ger,” acquired the meaning “proselyte.” Since the idea of strangers joining Israel is explicitly mentioned in exilic or postexilic passages (Isa. 14.1; 56.3–8; Ezek. 47.22–23), it is possible that the present passage is also from that period. 49: One law for the citizen and for the stranger, see also Lev. 24.22; Num. 9.14; 15.14–16, 29. In each of these instances strangers and Israelites follow the same specific procedure (cf. Lev. 7.7); it is not a general rule covering all cases. In later halakhic exegesis, when “ger” (“stranger”) is understood as “proselyte,” this v. is understood as prescribing equality between proselytes and born Jews with respect to all the laws of the Torah (Mek. Pisha 14, end). 51: This v. recapitulates v. 40, indicating that the digression in vv. 43–49 is concluded and the narrative resumes.

13.1–16: Further commemorative rituals. 2: The first issue of humans and domestic animals is holy and reserved for the LORD; they must be given to Him or redeemed. According to Gen. 4.4, the sacrifice of firstling cattle goes back to the beginning of the human race when Abel brought “the choicest of the firstlings of his flock” as a gift to the Lord. In vv. 12–15 this practice is given a new raison d’être as a commemoration of God’s slaying the first-born of Egypt and sparing those of Israel at the time of the exodus. The first issue of every womb defines first-born as the first-born of the mother,

³And Moses said to the people,

“Remember this day, on which you went free from Egypt, the house of bondage, how the LORD freed you from it with a mighty hand: no leavened bread shall be eaten. ⁴You go free on this day, in the month^a of Abib. ⁵So, when the LORD has brought you into the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which He swore to your fathers to give you, a land flowing with milk and honey, you shall observe in this month the following practice:

⁶“Seven days you shall eat unleavened bread, and on the seventh day there shall be a festival of the LORD. ⁷Throughout the seven days unleavened bread shall be eaten; no leavened bread shall be found with you, and no leaven shall be found in all your territory. ⁸And you shall explain to your son on that day, ‘It is because of what the LORD did for me when I went free from Egypt.’

⁹“And this shall serve you as a sign on your hand and as a reminder on your forehead^b—in order that the Teaching of the LORD may be in your mouth—that with a mighty hand the LORD freed you from Egypt. ¹⁰You shall keep this institution at its set time from year to year.

not the father. 3–10: The festival of Unleavened Bread, repeating 12.14–20. Because of this duplication and some conflicting details (such as the use here of a name instead of a number for the first month, and the emphasis only on the seventh day and not on the first as well), scholars assign this paragraph to the J source and 12.14–20 to the P source. 4: The month of Abib: The old name of the first month (12.2), now called Nisan. “Aviv” means “new ears of grain”; this month begins when immature ears of grain have begun to grow on the stalks. The alternative translation “on the new moon of Abib” is based on the preceding phrase “on this day,” which seems to refer to a specific date (see also Deut. 16.1). If that is the meaning, this may be a variant tradition that the exodus occurred, and was celebrated, on the first day of the month rather than the fourteenth and fifteenth. 5: See 3.8. 8: See 12.26–27. Explain, Heb “vehi-gadta,” lit. “tell, relate.” The Rabbis derived the injunction to relate the story of the exodus at the Seder from this v., and the name of the text recited at the Seder, “Haggadah shel Pesah” (“The Pesah narrative”; Haggadah for short) from this verb. What the LORD did for me: Because every future Israelite is to speak thus, the Rabbis inferred that “In every generation one should look upon himself as if he personally had gone out of Egypt. . . . It was not only our ancestors whom the Holy One, Blessed is He, redeemed, but also us along with them” (Haggadah). The effect is that every individual Jew will identify personally with the exodus experience. 9–10: This shall serve you as a sign: It is not clear what shall serve as a sign: either something mentioned in the preceding vv. or in the second half of the present v. One or several of these things must be remembered well so that the LORD’s teaching will be remembered well. The same interpretation applies to v. 16: The sacrifice or redemption of the first-born (vv. 12–15) is to be “as a sign . . . and as a frontlet” (see translators’ note b). As noted by Rashbam, “sign,” “memorial,” and “frontlet” are here used metaphorically to indicate that these things are to be remembered well (cf. the metaphoric use of other ornaments and items of apparel in Isa. 62.3; Jer. 13.11; Prov. 6.21; 7.3; and elsewhere). In neither case does “it shall be a sign,” represent an additional observance beyond those mentioned in vv. 2–8 and 12–15. In Deut. 6.8 and 11.18, however, the same phrases are used literally to indicate that God’s words are to be “bound” as a sign on the arm and as a frontlet on the forehead, and this is accompanied by the injunction to write those words on the doorposts and city gates. In that context, the command is meant literally. Jewish tradition reinterpreted Exod. 13.9 and 16 in line with Deuteronomy, and took all four passages as referring to tefillin or phylacteries, small leather capsules fastened to the forehead and the upper arm by leather straps, and containing the paragraphs in which these vv. appear (Exod. 13.1–10, 11–16; Deut. 6. 5–9; 11.13–21). In talmudic times they were worn throughout the day on weekdays (that is, not on the Sabbath or festivals); today they are usually worn only during weekday morning prayers. 10: This institution, the eating of unleavened bread. At its set time: According to Nahmanides, this v. is the basis of the practice of creating leap years by periodically adding an extra month at the end of a lunar year to adjust it to the longer solar year so that the festival falls “at its set time,” that is, in the spring. This is done in order to delay the festival in years when it would otherwise occur before spring arrives (Hayim Dov Shevel, “Sefer ha-mitsvot leha-Rambam . . . ‘im hasagot ha-Ramban” [Jerusalem: Mosad Harav Kook, 1981], pp. 26–27). 11–16: The sacrifice and redemption of first-borns. 12–13: See also 22.28–29; 34.19–20;

the Canaanites, as He swore to you and to your fathers, and has given it to you, ¹²you shall set apart for the LORD every first issue of the womb: every male firstling that your cattle drop shall be the LORD's. ¹³But every firstling ass you shall redeem with a sheep; if you do not redeem it, you must break its neck. And you must redeem every first-born male among your children. ¹⁴And when, in time to come, your son asks you, saying, 'What does this mean?' you shall say to him, 'It was with a mighty hand that the LORD brought us out from Egypt, the house of bondage. ¹⁵When Pharaoh stubbornly refused to let us go, the LORD slew every first-born in the land of Egypt, the first-born of both man and beast. Therefore I sacrifice to the LORD every first male issue of the womb, but redeem every first-born among my sons.'

¹⁶"And so it shall be as a sign upon your hand and as a symbol^a on your forehead that with a mighty hand the LORD freed us from Egypt."

Lev. 27.27; Num. 18.15–18; Deut. 15.19–23 for further, and in some cases conflicting, details. 12: Set apart, for sacrifice (v. 15). Shall be the LORD's, that is, sacrificed.

13: Every firstling ass: Asses are domestic animals, but are impure and may not be sacrificed (cf. Lev. 27.26; Num. 18.15); hence the owner must redeem an ass by sacrificing a sheep in its place or breaking its neck (a nonsacrificial method of slaughter). Among your children: Since humans may not be sacrificed, they must be redeemed from the priests. Based on Num. 18.16, the ceremony, called "Pidyon ha-ben" ("Redemption of the Son"), takes place on the thirty-first day after birth (or the next day if that is a Sabbath or major holiday). The son is "redeemed" by giving a "kohen" (a descendant of the priestly family) five units of the local currency (e.g., five dollars). The money is generally returned to the father or donated to charity. Sons whose parents are the offspring of a kohen or a Levite, and sons born by Caesarian section or after the birth of a daughter or a miscarriage are not redeemed. 16: Symbol, the translation "frontlet" (i.e., headband), is preferable. The headband was the characteristic headdress in Canaan and nearby lands in biblical times, as illustrated in Egyptian and Assyrian art.

13.17–15.21. The crossing of the sea. The final episode of God's defeat of the Egyptians. God lures

Egypt to a crushing blow so as to "gain glory through Pharaoh and all his host" and show them that "I am the LORD" (14.4, 18). The Sabbath on which this pericope is read in the annual Torah reading cycle is known as Shabbat Shirah, the "Sabbath of the Song," referring to the poem of 15.1–18. It is also read on the seventh day of Pesah, when, according to tradition, the crossing of the sea took place. See also v. 18 n. 13.17: By way of the land of the Philistines, or "by The Way to the Land of the Philistines" (the name of the road)—in either case, the route leading from Egypt to Philistia in southern Canaan (see map, p. 130). This is presumably the route, called "The Ways of Horus" by the Egyptians, that ran parallel to the Mediterranean coast, from Zilu (Sile) to Gaza, and was the shortest route to Canaan (along it an army could reach Gaza in nine or ten days). If the exodus took place in the 13th century BCE, the reference to the Philistines is anachronistic, since the Philistines were among the "Sea Peoples" who migrated to the Levant from the Aegean region and did not settle in southern Canaan until the early 12th century. Have a change of heart, as they do in 14.11–12. When they see war, either with the Canaanites in the promised land or the Egyptian forces stationed in Zilu (Sile) and the other fortresses Egypt maintained all along the Ways of Horus in the 13th century BCE to protect its access to Canaan. To avoid demoralization, God leads the Israelites via the difficult southerly route through the marshy lake-land of the eastern delta to Sukkot and thence to the wilderness. 18: By way of the wilderness, or "by The Way to the Wilderness"—toward the Sinai wilderness. At the Sea of Reeds, Heb "yam suf," an unidentified body of water, probably in the Isthmus of Suez, the strip of land, lakes, and marshes between the Gulf of Suez and the Mediterranean (the strip traversed by the Suez Canal today). See map, p. 130. The same name is used for the Gulf of Eilat

Egypt. ¹⁹ And Moses took with him the bones of Joseph, who had exacted an oath from the children of Israel, saying, "God will be sure to take notice of you: then you shall carry up my bones from here with you."

14 The LORD said to Moses: ² Tell the Israelites to turn back and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon; you shall encamp facing it, by the sea. ³ Pharaoh will say of the Israelites, "They are astray in the land; the wilderness has closed in on them." ⁴ Then I will stiffen Pharaoh's heart and he will pursue them, that I may gain glory through Pharaoh and all his host; and the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD.

And they did so.

⁵ When the king of Egypt was told that the people had fled, Pharaoh and his courtiers had a change of heart about the people and said, "What is this we have done, releasing Israel from our service?" ⁶ He ordered^a his chariot and took his men with him; ⁷ he took six hundred of his picked chariots, and the rest of the chariots of Egypt, with officers^b in all of them. ⁸ The LORD stiffened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he gave chase to the Israelites. According to Josh. 2.4–32, Joshua buried Joseph in Shechem (modern Nablus; see Color Map 1). 20: Etham, an unidentified place, perhaps at the eastern end of the Wadi Tumilat, where the wadi meets the wilderness, near Lake Timsah (see map, p. 130). (Cf. Num. 33.8, "the wilderness of Etham.") 21: The LORD went before them in a pillar of cloud . . . and in a pillar of fire: The two pillars were probably one, a columnar cloud enveloping a fire that was visible through it only in the dark. Hence 14.24 refers to a single "pillar of fire and cloud" at daybreak, when the fire was still partly visible as the cloud gradually became opaque. Their role here may reflect the ancient practice of carrying a burning, smoking brazier at the head of an army or caravan to indicate the line of march by day and night. See further at 14.19. 22: For an exception to this statement, see 14.19. According to P, once the Tabernacle was erected, the pillar or cloud and fire remained above it even when directing the Israelites' march (Exod. 40.33–38; Num. 9.15–23; 10.11–12, 34). (For a reflection of this image in United States history, see the intro. to Exodus.)

14.1–31: The crossing of the Sea of Reeds. The compositeness of this narrative is indicated by inconsistencies and redundancies. For example, God's stiffening Pharaoh's heart to chase the Israelites (vv. 8–9) is redundant after Pharaoh has already decided to give chase (vv. 5–7). V. 19a says that the angel leading the Israelites moves to their rear, while 19b says that it was the cloud. V. 21b (through "dry ground") presents a relatively naturalistic picture of God causing a strong wind to blow back the waters of the sea, while the remainder of the v. and v. 22 present a more miraculous picture of the sea splitting, with the waters forming walls on either side of the Israelites. Source critics assign the components of the narrative to J, E, and P. By skillfully combining the sources, the redactor has harmonized the differences so as to show, for example, that Pharaoh's independent decision to pursue the Israelites is, in a mysterious way, carrying out God's plan (cf. v. 4), that the cloud is indeed the angel, and that God used the natural means of the wind to carry out His miraculous splitting of the sea. 2: Pi-hahiroth cannot be clearly identified with any known Egyptian toponym. Migdol ("watchtower") figures in several toponyms in and near the eastern delta. An Egyptian letter (see 12.37 n.) mentions one apparently in or near the Sinai desert not far from Wadi Tumilat. Baal-zephon must refer to a site at which the Canaanite deity of that name was worshipped in Egypt. Several in the eastern delta region are known. 4: Gain glory, more lit. "weightiness," honor, authority, by punishing those who disobey Him. The Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD, see 6.2 n. 5: Only now do the his horsemen, and his warriors overtook them encamped by the sea, near Pi-hahiroth, before Baal-zephon.

¹⁰As Pharaoh drew near, the Israelites caught sight of the Egyptians advancing upon them. Greatly frightened, the Israelites cried out to the LORD. ¹¹And they said to Moses, "Was it for want of graves in Egypt that you brought us to die in the wilderness? What have you done to us, taking us out of Egypt?" ¹²Is this not the very thing we told you in Egypt, saying, 'Let us be, and we will serve the Egyptians, for it is better for us to serve the Egyptians than to die in the wilderness?'" ¹³But Moses said to the people, "Have no fear! Stand by, and witness the deliverance which the LORD will work for you today; for the Egyptians whom you see today you will never see again. ¹⁴The LORD will battle for you; you hold your peace!"

¹⁵Then the LORD said to Moses, "Why do you cry out to Me? Tell the Israelites to go forward. ¹⁶And you lift up your rod and hold out your arm over the sea and split it, so that the Israelites may march into the sea on dry ground. ¹⁷And I will stiffen the hearts of the Egyptians so that they go in after them; and I will gain glory through Pharaoh and all his warriors, his chariots and his horsemen. ¹⁸Let the Egyptians know that I am LORD, when I gain glory through Pharaoh, his chariots, and his horsemen."

¹⁹The angel of God, who had been going ahead of the Israelite army, now moved and followed behind them; and the pillar of cloud shifted from in front of them and took up a place behind them, ²⁰and it came between the army of the Egyptians and the army of Israel. Thus there was the cloud with the darkness, and it cast a spell^a upon the night, so that the one could not come near the other all through the night.

²¹Then Moses held out his arm over the sea and the LORD drove back the sea with a strong east wind all that night, and turned the sea into dry ground. The waters were split, ²²and the Israelites went into the sea on dry ground, the waters forming a wall for them on their right and on their left. ²³The Egyptians came in pursuit after them into the sea, all of Pharaoh's horses, chariots, and horsemen. ²⁴At the morning watch, the LORD looked down upon the Egyptian army from a pillar of fire and cloud, and threw the Egyptian army into panic. ²⁵He locked^b the wheels of their chariots so that they moved forward with difficulty. And the Egyptians said, "Let us

11-12: The Israelites' continual complaining in the wilderness, a dominant theme of the Torah, is introduced here. (See 15.24; 16.2-3; 17.2-3; Num. 11.4-6; 14.2-3; 16.13-14; 20.2-5, 13; 21.4-5; Deut. 1.27-28.) 12: We told you in Egypt: No such comment is recorded earlier, but the Samaritan Pentateuch adds it after 6.9. (See 11.4-8 n.)

15-31: Some believe that the action of the sea corresponds to the rising and falling tides or shallow waters being blown back by wind in the southern part of the isthmus, or a combination of both. A document from Mari, in Syria, reports that an army escaped across a river one night at low tide and the pursuing army was prevented from overtaking them when the tide later rose again. In the present case the heavy Egyptian chariots became mired in the mud and were engulfed by the returning waters. The text, however, claims that miraculously the waters were split and stood up like walls (vv. 16, 22, 29). 19: The first clause of the v. (from the E source) says that the angel of God was at the head of the Israelites; the next clause (from J) indicates that the pillar of cloud led them, while 13.21 (also J) says that it was the LORD in the cloud. These three statements picture the divine manifestation in different ways (cf. 3.2 n.). 20: Cast a spell, turned it totally dark so that the Egyptians could not approach the Israelites (cf. 10.22-23a; Josh. 24.7). The one could not come near the other all through the night: According to a midrashic interpretation, this refers to the angels, who sought to sing a hymn to God as the Egyptians were drowning; God rebuked them, saying: "While my creatures are drowning in the sea you would sing a hymn?!" showing that He does not rejoice in the death of the wicked (b. Sanh. 39b, prompted either by the similar phraseology in Isa. 6.3 or by an interpretation of "k-r-v" ["come near"] as a term for prayer). 25: Locked: They became stuck in the mud.

²⁶Then the LORD said to Moses, “Hold out your arm over the sea, that the waters may come back upon the Egyptians and upon their chariots and upon their horsemen.” ²⁷Moses held out his arm over the sea, and at daybreak the sea returned to its normal state, and the Egyptians fled at its approach. But the LORD hurled the Egyptians into the sea. ²⁸The waters turned back and covered the chariots and the horsemen—Pharaoh’s entire army that followed them into the sea; not one of them remained. ²⁹But the Israelites had marched through the sea on dry ground, the waters forming a wall for them on their right and on their left.

³⁰Thus the LORD delivered Israel that day from the Egyptians. Israel saw the Egyptians dead on the shore of the sea. ³¹And when Israel saw the wondrous power which the LORD had wielded against the Egyptians, the people feared the LORD; they had faith in the LORD and His servant Moses.

15 Then Moses and the Israelites sang this song to the LORD. They said:

I will sing to the LORD, for He has triumphed gloriously;

Horse and driver He has hurled into the sea.

² The LORD^a is my strength and might;^b

He is become my deliverance.

This is my God and I will enshrine^c Him;

The God of my father, and I will exalt Him.

³ The LORD, the Warrior—

LORD is His name!

31: Feared: No longer frightened of the Egyptians (v. 10), they were awe-struck at God’s power. Had faith, i.e., trusted, now that their fears were proven groundless. “Faith” in the Bible regularly means trust, rather than belief in the existence of God or assent to a doctrine. His servant Moses: The people now realize that Moses is truly God’s servant. Cf. Num. 12.7–8; Deut. 34.10.

15.1–21: The Song at the Sea, a lyric poem, sung as a hymn, celebrating God’s defeat of Egypt at the sea. Rich in imagery, hyperbole, and poetic license, it expresses the unrestrained enthusiasm of the Israelites over their miraculous rescue from disaster. Formally it is divided into three sections, each ending with a simile followed by a bicolon addressed to God in which the opening phrase is repeated in the second colon (vv. 5b–6, 10b–11, 16a–b), and a conclusion (vv. 17–18). In terms of content, however, the sections are an introduction (vv. 1–3), the defeat of Pharaoh’s forces (vv. 4–12), God’s guidance of Israel to the promised land and the Temple Mount and the terrified reaction of its inhabitants and neighbors (vv. 13–17), and a coda acclaiming His eternal rule (v. 18). The general plot of the poem—God’s control of the sea followed by the building of His sanctuary and the acclamation of His kingship—and some of its vocabulary allude to passages in other biblical poems that tell of His primordial defeat of the sea and assumption of kingship (e.g., Pss. 74.12–16; 89.10–14; 93), which themselves hark back to ancient Near Eastern myths about the storm god’s defeat of the sea god followed by the building of his palace/temple. The language and style of the poem are archaic and share many features with Ugaritic poetry of the Late Bronze Age, suggesting that it is one of the oldest poems in the Bible. On the other hand, the mention of Philistia (v. 14; see 13.22 n.) and the Temple imply a date later than the putative date of the exodus, probably in the early monarchic period. In Jewish prayer, the entire poem is recited every morning in the preliminary prayers, and vv. 11 and 18 are recited following the Shema prayer morning and evening, as part of the daily acceptance of God’s kingship, the Jewish declaration of allegiance to God. 2: The first half of this v. also appears in Isa. 12.2 and Ps. 118.14, suggesting that it was a liturgical saying. I will enshrine Him, another interpretation of the enigmatic Heb verb is “glorify” or “beautify Him,” from which a midrash derived the duty of beautifying religious objects used in His worship, such as the sukkah, tallit, shofar, and Torah scroll; another midrash takes the verb as meaning “show His beauty” by imitating His compassion (Mek. Shirta, 3; b. Shab. 133b; Torah Temimah). The God of my father, see 3.6. 3: The LORD, the Warrior, see 14.14, 25. One of the various metaphors applied to God. The warrior metaphor was frequently applied to deities in the ancient world, reflecting the con-

 They went down into the depths like a stone.

 Your right hand, O LORD, shatters the foe!
 7 In Your great triumph You break Your opponents;
 You send forth Your fury, it consumes them like straw.
 8 At the blast of Your nostrils the waters piled up,
 The floods stood straight like a wall;
 The deeps froze in the heart of the sea.
 9 The foe said,
 "I will pursue, I will overtake,
 I will divide the spoil;
 My desire shall have its fill of them.
 I will bare my sword—
 My hand shall subdue them."

 They sank like lead in the majestic waters.

 Who is like You, majestic in holiness,
 Awesome in splendor, working wonders!
 12 You put out Your right hand,
 The earth swallowed them.
 13 In Your love You lead the people You redeemed;
 In Your strength You guide them to Your holy viction that victory is in reality an achievement of God, not of human warriors. Cf. Deut. 20.4; 1 Sam. 17.47; Zech. 4.6. LORD is His name: That is, YHWH ("adonai") is His name (see 3.15). This declaration reflects the further fulfillment of God's promises that all would come to know that "I am the LORD" (see 5.1–6 n., 6.2 n.). 6: Your right hand: In this poem Moses' arm, so prominent in the prose narrative of ch 14 (vv. 16, 21, 26, 27), is not mentioned. Only God's role—the ultimate reality behind the event—is celebrated. In this respect the poem is a forerunner of the Haggadah, which mentions only God, never Moses. 7: It consumes them like straw: Although the Egyptians drowned, the image here is of fire burning them. In vv. 6b and 7a God "shatters" and "breaks" the enemy. 8: The blast of Your nostrils, a metaphor for the wind of 14.21. 9: Desire, i.e., appetite. 10: After all the enemy's boasts, God sinks them in an instant. 11: Celestials, lit. "gods." Exclamations of God's uniqueness among the "gods" (2 Sam. 7.22; 1 Kings 8.23; Ps. 86.8) proclaim Him the greatest power in the universe. They go back to ancient Near Eastern polytheistic prototypes (cf. Jethro in 18.11). Later texts and interpretations retain the term "gods" vestigially to refer to the celestial or supernatural beings that surround God in the manner of a royal court—that is, the "host of heaven," including the sun, moon, stars, spirits, winds, flames, seraphs, and angels (Deut. 4.35–39; Pss. 86.10; 96.4–5; 135.5, 15–17). The translation "celestials" invokes the latter concept so that the verse conforms more closely to the modern sense of monotheism, but whether this ancient poem is referring to angelic beings or actual gods is debated. 13: Love, Heb "hesed," better rendered "faithfulness." It refers to acts of kindness that are expected between parties in a relationship—husband and wife, parents and children, relatives, and allies—and to reciprocation of kindness (Gen. 40.14; Deut. 7.9; 1 Sam. 20.8; 2 Sam. 9.1; 10.2). Here, as frequently, it refers to God's covenantal faithfulness to Israel (2.24; 6.4–8; cf. 20.6; 34.6, 7). To Your holy abode, to the destination mentioned in v. 17, the land of Israel (cf. the sequence of events in Ps. 78.53–55) and/or the Temple Mount in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 15.25; Isa. 33.20); cf. Jer. 25.30; 31.23. 14–16: Terrified by the power God exercised against Egypt on Israel's behalf, the Canaanites and neighboring nations are petrified at Israel's approach (cf. Josh. 2.9–11). 16: Still as stone, like the Egyptians, who sank

men, went into the sea; and the LORD turned back on them the waters of the sea; but the Israelites marched on dry ground in the midst of the sea.

20 Then Miriam the prophetess, Aaron's sister, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her in dance with timbrels. 21 And Miriam chanted for them:

Sing to the LORD, for He has triumphed gloriously;
Horse and driver He has hurled into the sea.

22 Then Moses caused Israel to set out from the Sea of Reeds. They went on into the wilderness of Shur; they traveled three days in the wilderness and found no water.
23 They came to Marah, but they could not drink the water

"like a stone" (v. 5). Cross over: This refers either to Israel's passing these nations (excepting the Canaanites) on its way to Canaan (Deut. 2.8, 18) or crossing the Jordan into the land (Josh. 1.11; 4.1). Ransomed, i.e., redeemed. 17: Plant them, permanently settle them (Amos 9.15; Pss. 44.3; 80.9). In Your own mountain: "Mountain" refers to the promised land, which is mountainous (Deut. 3.25; Isa. 11.9; 57.13; Ps. 78.54), but "God's mountain" often refers to the Temple Mount as well (Isa. 2.3; Ezek. 20.40; Zech. 8.3; Ps. 24.3), and the following phrases the place You made to dwell in and the sanctuary . . . clearly refer to that. The v. blends the concepts of the promised land and the Temple Mount: The Israelites, settled throughout the land with the Temple in the center, are pictured as dwelling around the Temple in which God dwells in their midst (cf. Exod. 25.8; 29.45–46; 1 Kings

6.13; Ezek. 37.25–28). This climactic verse indicates that the conquest of the promised land will not be an end in itself. The redemption will culminate when the Temple is built and Israel dwells there in the presence of God. You made . . . Your hands established: As in the victory over Egypt and the conquest of the promised land (vv. 6, 16b–17a), human agency in building the Temple (1 Kings chs 6–8, esp. 8.13) is ignored. In a theological sense it is God who will build the Temple (cf. Ps. 78.69). 18: God's kingship is acclaimed here because the Temple, as His palace ("heikhal," 1 Kings 6.3, 5, and elsewhere), symbolizes His kingship. This is the first explicit mention of the common biblical metaphor "God is king." 20–21: In keeping with the custom of women celebrating the victor after a battle (Judg. 11.34; 1 Sam. 18.6), the women dance and play music, led by Miriam who summons them, or all the Israelites, to sing God's praises (either the hymn of vv. 1–18 or a refrain). Miriam the prophetess: This title could refer to Miriam's recitation of the hymn, or part of it (cf. 1 Chron. 25.1–3) or to her prophetic status mentioned in Num. 12.2. The activities of Deborah the prophetess also include singing a hymn praising God for a victory (Judg. 4.4; 5), while Huldah delivers a prophetic oracle (2 Kings 22.14; cf. Ezek. 13.17; Joel 3.1; Neh. 6.14).

15.22–17.16: Challenges in the wilderness. Four episodes in which the Israelites face typical dangers of the wilderness: shortages of food and water and attack by marauders. In the face of the shortages the people grumble against Moses and Aaron. God responds to their complaints without anger or punishment, perhaps because they have not previously seen His ability to meet their material needs, or because these incidents occur before the covenant at Sinai at which God promised to meet such needs (23.25). Having seen God's ability to defeat armies (14.30–31), they do not complain (as in 14.10–12) when the Amalekites attack.

15.22–27: Complaints (14.11–12 n.) about food and water recur throughout the wilderness wanderings. See 16.2–3; 17.2–3; Num. 11.4–6; 16.13–14; 20.2–5; 21.4–5. 22: The wilderness of Shur, east of the Isthmus of Suez, apparently named for the defensive wall ("shur") that the Egyptians erected to prevent incursions from the east. Three days . . . no water: The midrash, which interprets "water" as Torah (since Torah is as essential for well-being as water), infers that it was three days without Torah that made the people rebellious, and holds that the practice of reading the Torah in the synagogue every Sabbath, Monday, and Thursday was instituted so that three days would not pass without Torah (Mek. Beshallah, Vayassa', 1; b. B. K. 82a). 23: Marah, lit. "bitter."

of Marah because it was bitter; that is why it was named Marah.^a ²⁴ And the people grumbled against Moses, saying, “What shall we drink?” ²⁵ So he cried out to the LORD, and the LORD showed him a piece of wood; he threw it into the water and the water became sweet.

There He made for them a fixed rule, and there He put them to the test. ²⁶ He said, “If you will heed the LORD your God diligently, doing what is upright in His sight, giving ear to His commandments and keeping all His laws, then I will not bring upon you any of the diseases that I brought upon the Egyptians, for I the LORD am your healer.”

16 Setting out from Elim, the whole Israelite community came to the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure from the land of Egypt. ² In the wilderness, the whole Israelite community grumbled against Moses and Aaron. ³ The Israelites said to them, “If only we had died by the hand of the LORD in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the fleshpots, when we ate our fill of bread! For you have brought us out into this wilderness to starve this whole congregation to death.”

⁴ And the LORD said to Moses, “I will rain down bread for you from the sky, and the people shall go out and gather each day that day’s portion—that I may thus test them, to see whether they will follow My instructions or not. ⁵ But on the sixth day, when they apportion what they have brought in, it shall prove to be double the amount they gather each day.” ⁶ So Moses and Aaron said to all the Israelites, “By evening you shall know it was the LORD

Brackish pools and wells are common in deserts (cf. the “Bitter Lakes” in the Isthmus of Suez). Assuming that the Israelites are now heading south, the site could be Bir el-Murrah, Arabic for “Bitter Well,” nine miles east of Suez, or the oasis Ein Hawarah, 75 km (47 mi) southeast of Suez, near Wadi Amarah which has a similar sounding name. 25: A piece of wood, or a branch with its foliage. Even today, Bedouin sweeten brackish water with shrubs that cause the salt to sink to the bottom. There He made for them a fixed rule, and there He put them to the test: The context suggests that this enigmatic sentence refers to the next v. and means that God told Israel the conditions of their future relationship, against which they will be tested (see 16.4; Deut. 8.2, 16). The promise in v. 26, which also implies a warning, is prompted by Israel’s grumbling against Moses, God’s servant (14.31), which contained the seeds of rebellion against God Himself (cf. 16.8). 26: The diseases that I brought upon the Egyptians, such as the sixth plague, skin inflammation (9.8–11). Healer: This quality of God, with its implicit warning of punishment by disease, is prompted by His purifying the water of its bitterness, which was regarded as “healing” the water (the same verb is translated “make wholesome” in 2 Kings 2.22; Ezek. 47.8, 9, 11). 27: Elim, possibly Wadi Gharandel, the best-watered site in western Sinai, about 15 km (9 mi) south of Ein Hawarah, or Uyun Musa, 12 km (7.5 mi) southwest of Bir el-Murrah, which has a palm grove and twelve springs even today.

16.1–36: Provision of food in the wilderness. This narrative is generally assigned to the Priestly source, but redundancies (such as God’s two responses to the people’s complaint [vv. 4–5 and 11–12]) and difficulties in the order (vv. 6–8 presuppose vv. 9–12) suggest the presence of a second source (JE) as well. Another episode in which God provides quail, which also refers to the manna, appears in Num. ch 11; it is in part a doublet of this episode. 1–3: A month after the exodus (Num. 33.3), having left the oasis of Elim and run low on food, the Israelites turn on Moses and Aaron and begin to idealize life in Egypt (cf. 14.11–12; Num. 11.5). 4: The people’s need for food is real, but their accusatory complaint portends rebellion, so God determines to provide food subject to rules that test their obedience and trust (vv. 19–20, 25–29). 5: When it is apportioned, the manna collected on the sixth day will miraculously double and suffice for the next day as well. Cf. Lev. 25.20–22. Apportion: Halakic exegesis assigns the Heb word its more common meaning, “prepare,” and infers a general rule that cooked food for the Sabbath must be prepared before the Sabbath (b. Shab. 117b; b. Pes. 47b; b. Betzah 2b; see also v. 23). 6–7: Divinely provided food and the appearance of God’s Presence will remind the people that, contrary to their charge in v. 3, it was who brought you out from the land of Egypt; ⁷and in the morning you shall behold the Presence^a of the LORD, because He has heard your grumblings against the LORD. For who are we that you should grumble against us? ⁸Since it is the LORD," Moses continued, "who will give you flesh to eat in the evening and bread in the morning to the full, because the LORD has heard the grumblings you utter against Him, what is our part? Your grumbling is not against us, but against the LORD!"

⁹Then Moses said to Aaron, "Say to the whole Israelite community: Advance toward the LORD, for He has heard your grumbling." ¹⁰And as Aaron spoke to the whole Israelite community, they turned toward the wilderness, and there, in a cloud, appeared the Presence of the LORD.

¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹²"I have heard the grumbling of the Israelites. Speak to them and say: By evening you shall eat flesh, and in the morning you shall have your fill of bread; and you shall know that I the LORD am your God."

¹³In the evening quail appeared and covered the camp; in the morning there was a fall of dew about the camp. ¹⁴When the fall of dew lifted, there, over the surface of the wilderness, lay a fine and flaky substance, as fine as frost on the ground. ¹⁵When the Israelites saw it, they said to one another, "What is it?"^b—for they did not know what it was. And Moses said to them, "That is the bread which the LORD has given you to eat. ¹⁶This is what the LORD has commanded: Gather as much of it as each of you requires to eat, an omer to a person for as many of you as there are; each of you shall fetch for those in his tent."

¹⁷The Israelites did so, some gathering much, some little. ¹⁸But when they measured it by the omer, he who had gathered much had no excess, and he who had gathered little had no deficiency: they had gathered as much as they needed to eat. ¹⁹And Moses said to them, "Let no one leave any of it over until morning." ²⁰But they paid no attention to Moses; some of them left of it until morning, and it became infested with maggots and stank. And Moses was angry with them.

Ezek. 1.26-28). But since this is to happen in the morning, Rashi holds that this v. does not refer to the theophany of vv. 9-10 but to the manna, which appeared in the morning (vv. 8, 12-13). In that case the Presence of the LORD refers to an act of providence or miracle that manifests His power, as in Num. 14.22; Ps. 96.3. 8: Flesh . . . bread, in the form of quail and manna (v. 13). 9-10: Advance toward the LORD, perhaps toward the pillar of cloud/fire (13.21-22). If so, there, in a [or "the"] cloud, appeared the Presence of the LORD would seem to mean that His fiery Presence became more visible within the cloud. 12: You shall know that I the LORD am your God: See 7.5 n.

13: Quail: Quail migrating, often in great numbers, between Africa and Europe in the spring and fall often drop exhausted in the Sinai and are caught by hunters. This experience was repeated in Num. 11.31-32 but did not become a regular occurrence as did the manna. The quail were not a supernatural phenomenon, but their timely appearance at God's promise was an act of divine providence. 14: A fine and flaky substance, named manna in v. 31. If this has a natural explanation, it is probably the sweet, edible honeydew (still called "manna" in Arabic) found in parts of the Sinai in June and July. Scale insects and plant lice ingest the sap of tamarisk trees and excrete it onto the branches, from which it crystallizes and falls to the ground as sticky solids. Bedouin use it as a sweetener. If this was the manna, the miracle was that it arrived just when the Israelites needed it, that enough was produced to feed the entire people but never more than an omer (about 2.3 liters, 2.1 quarts [dry measure]) per person daily, that it doubled on the sixth day and did not appear on the Sabbath, and that contrary to its natural pattern it appeared year-round.

16: Omer: See v. 36. 19: Using up the manna before morning shows trust that God will provide more the next day (hence Moses' anger in v. 20). 21-30: The Sabbath. Since God observes the Sabbath, He will

God, not Moses and Aaron, who took them from Egypt (cf. 15.6 n., 17.17 n.) and that their complaints are really against Him. The Presence of the LORD, the visual form in which God appears to humans, usually described as fiery or as enveloped in cloud or fire (v. 10; 24.17; 40.34-38), though sometimes as a human form (33.18, 22;

melt.²² On the sixth day they gathered double the amount of food, two omers for each; and when all the chieftains of the community came and told Moses,²³ he said to them, "This is what the LORD meant: Tomorrow is a day of rest, a holy sabbath of the LORD. Bake what you would bake and boil what you would boil; and all that is left put aside to be kept until morning."²⁴ So they put it aside until morning, as Moses had ordered; and it did not turn foul, and there were no maggots in it.²⁵ Then Moses said, "Eat it today, for today is a sabbath of the LORD; you will not find it today on the plain.²⁶ Six days you shall gather it; on the seventh day, the sabbath, there will be none."

²⁷ Yet some of the people went out on the seventh day to gather, but they found nothing.²⁸ And the LORD said to Moses, "How long will you men refuse to obey My commandments and My teachings?²⁹ Mark that the LORD has given you the sabbath; therefore He gives you two days' food on the sixth day. Let everyone remain where he is: let no one leave his place on the seventh day."³⁰ So the people remained inactive on the seventh day.

³¹ The house of Israel named it manna;^a it was like coriander seed, white, and it tasted like wafers^b in honey.³² Moses said, "This is what the LORD has commanded: Let one omer of it be kept throughout the ages, in order that they may see the bread that I fed you in the wilderness when I brought you out from the land of Egypt."³³ And Moses said to Aaron, "Take a jar, put one omer of manna in it, and place it before the LORD, to be kept throughout the ages."³⁴ As the LORD had commanded Moses, Aaron placed it before the Pact;^c to be kept.³⁵ And the Israelites ate manna forty years, until they came to a settled land; they ate the manna until they came to the border of the land of Canaan.³⁶ The omer is a tenth of an ephah.

not provide manna on the seventh day but will provide a double portion on the sixth day and Israel will observe the Sabbath as well. The Sabbath, having been "created" in Gen. ch 2, is first revealed to Israel here. 22: See v. 5 n. Told Moses, of the mysterious fact that the day's yield turned out to be double the amount of food (Heb "leḥem mishneh," lit. "double the bread"). This v. is the source of the Jewish custom of placing two loaves of bread (called "leḥem mishneh") on the table at the main Sabbath and festival meals. 23: Day of rest . . . sabbath, Heb "shabbaton . . . shabbat." Both Heb terms literally refer to "cessation" of activity. The seventh day is a day of cessation from normal labor (20.10), such as gathering and cooking food, because it is a holy day of cessation to God: He does not provide manna on it because He ceased creative activity on it, blessed it and declared it holy (Gen. 2.1–3). Bake . . . and boil . . .

cf. Num. 11.8. And all that is left put aside . . .: This means either "cook today for two days, and save what you don't eat today for tomorrow" (Rashi) or "cook what you will eat today and eat the rest raw tomorrow" (Ibn Ezra). 28: Refuse to obey My commandments . . .: Unless this means simply that they refused to believe that there would be no manna on the Sabbath, it must mean that they violated the implicit command not to go out for manna on the Sabbath (vv. 25b–26) or the explicit command to eat the manna that was kept overnight (v. 25a). 29: Given you the sabbath: God has given the Sabbath, previously holy only to Him (Gen. 2.1–3), as a gift to Israel. Let no one leave his place, to gather manna. Rabbinic exegesis saw here a broader prohibition on all Sabbath travel and inferred that one may not walk more than 2,000 cubits (roughly 1,000 meters, 3,000 feet) beyond the city limits on the Sabbath. This distance (based on Num. 35.5) is called the "Sabbath boundary" ("teḥum shabbat"). 31: Named it manna (Heb "man"), playfully reinterpreting their original question, "what (Heb 'man') is it?" (v. 15), as a declaration, "it is 'man.'" In essence, then, the term means "whatchamacallit" and expresses the manna's unprecedented character in Israelite experience. Tasted: Num. 11.8, a different tradition, says "it tasted like rich cream" and notes various ways to prepare it. This gave rise to the rabbinic tradition that the manna had many different tastes, suiting the palate of each person. 32–34: One day's portion of manna is to be preserved as a future reminder of God's care for the Israelites in the wilderness. Cf. Lev. 23.42–43. 34: Before the Pact, before the Ark of the Pact (25.10–22), P's term for the Ark of the Covenant (Num. 10.33; Josh. 3.6); the suggestion is that the jar of manna stored in front of the Ark could be taken out to show to future generations. 35: Until they came to the border of the land of Canaan, see Josh. 5.10–12. 36: Ephah, about 23 liters (21 quarts).

17 From the wilderness of Sin the whole Israelite community continued by stages as the LORD would command. They encamped at Rephidim, and there was no water for the people to drink. ²The people quarreled with Moses. "Give us water to drink," they said; and Moses replied to them, "Why do you quarrel with me? Why do you try the LORD?" ³But the people thirsted there for water; and the people grumbled against Moses and said, "Why did you bring us up from Egypt, to kill us and our children and livestock with thirst?" ⁴Moses cried out to the LORD, saying, "What shall I do with this people? Before long they will be stoning me!" ⁵Then the LORD said to Moses, "Pass before the people; take with you some of the elders of Israel, and take along the rod with which you struck the Nile, and set out. ⁶I will be standing there before you on the rock at Horeb. Strike the rock and water will issue from it, and the people will drink." And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel. ⁷The place was named Massah^a and Meribah,^b because the Israelites quarreled and because they tried the LORD, saying, "Is the LORD present among us or not?"

⁸Amalek came and fought with Israel at Rephidim. ⁹Moses said to Joshua, "Pick some men for us, and go out and do battle with Amalek. Tomorrow I will station myself on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in my hand." ¹⁰Joshua did as Moses told him and fought with Amalek, while Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill. ¹¹Then, whenever Moses held up his hand, Israel prevailed; but whenever he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed. ¹²But Moses' hands grew heavy; so they took a stone and put it under him and he sat on it, while

17.1–7: The incident at Massah and Meribah. 1: Rephidim, the last station before Sinai (19.2; Num. 33.14–15) and, to judge from v. 6, near Sinai. 2: Why do you quarrel with me? Why do you try the LORD? Cf. 16.8. Try, i.e., test, demanding proof that God was present among them and controlling the events (see v. 7; cf. 8.18; Deut. 7.21; 31.17; Josh. 3.10). 3: Cf. 16.3b. 5–6: Moses is to take some of the elders, perhaps as witnesses, and set out for Horeb (Sinai), "the mountain of God" (3.1), to obtain water. Apparently the water would flow from Horeb back to Rephidim via a wadi (cf. 32.20; Deut. 9.21). Strike the rock: In the Sinai there are limestone rocks from which small amounts of water drip, and a blow to their soft surface can expose a porous inner layer containing water. A similar but enigmatic episode, with differences suggesting that it was an oral variant of this one, appears in Num. 20.2–13 (mostly from P in its present form). According to talmudic legend, the water came from the "Well of Miriam" which henceforth accompanied the Israelites on their journeys through the wilderness; it was given to them because of Miriam's merits and named after her (Seder Olam 5; t. Sot. 11.1, 8; b. Ta'an. 9a). 7: The place, Rephidim, not Horeb. Massah and Meribah, meaning "The Place of Testing and Quarreling." These names, playing on the verbs "quarrel" and "try" used in v. 2, became bywords for Israel's lack of trust in God (Deut. 6.16; 9.22; Ps. 95.8).

17.8–16: The attack of the Amalekites. The Amalekites are depicted as marauding nomads living in the Negev and Sinai. In later times they periodically raided and pillaged Israel and joined other enemies in threatening to wipe Israel out (Judg. 3.13; 6.3–5; 30.1; 1 Sam. 30.1–2; Ps. 83.4–9). This passage is read in the synagogue on Purim because Haman, the arch anti-Semite who sought to exterminate all the Jews in the Persian empire, was an Agagite, a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag (cf. Esth. 3.1; 1 Sam. 15.32). In later Jewish tradition Amalek came to symbolize anti-Semites in general. 8: Fought with Israel: According to Deut. 25.18 this was a sneak attack on the defenseless weak lagging at the rear, which showed that Amalekites had no fear of God or conscience (see 1.17 n.). 9: Joshua, Moses' attendant and eventual successor who led the Israelites in conquering the promised land. See 24.13; 33.11; Num. 11.28; 27.15–23; Deut. 1.38; ch 31. 10: Hur, a public figure, associated again with Aaron in 24.14; possibly the Hur who was Bezalel's grandfather (31.2). 11: Whenever Moses held up his hand [or "hands," v. 12]: a gesture of uncertain meaning, perhaps to raise his staff and focus God's power against the enemy (7.20; 14.16; cf. Josh. 8.18–26) or a sign of triumph (see 14.8, translators' note; Deut. 32.27; Mic. 5.8). In any case, the victory is not won by military efforts alone. The Mekhilta, sensitive to the impression that Moses is (magically?) controlling the battle (he acts without divine command), states that his hands directed the Israelites' thoughts to God in heaven who gave them victory (Mek., Aaron and Hur, one on each side, supported his hands; thus his hands remained steady until the sun set. ¹³And Joshua overwhelmed the people of Amalek^a with the sword.

¹⁴Then the LORD said to Moses, “Inscribe this in a document as a reminder, and read it aloud to Joshua: I will utterly blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven!”

18 Jethro priest of Midian, Moses’ father-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses and for Israel His people, how the LORD had brought Israel out from Egypt. ²So Jethro, Moses’ father-in-law, took Zipporah, Moses’ wife, after she had been sent home, ³and her two sons—of whom one was named Gershom, that is to say, “I have been a stranger^d in a foreign land”; ⁴and the other was named Eliezer,^e meaning, “The God of my father was my help, and He delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh.” ⁵Jethro, Moses’ father-in-law, brought Moses’ sons and wife to him in the wilderness, where he was encamped at the mountain of God. ⁶He sent word to Moses, “I, your father-in-law Jethro, am coming to you, with your wife and her two sons.” ⁷Moses went out to meet his father-in-law; he bowed low and kissed him; each asked after the other’s welfare, and they went into the tent.

⁸Moses then recounted to his father-in-law everything that the LORD had done to Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel’s sake, all the hardships that had befallen them on the way, and how the LORD had delivered them. ⁹And Jethro rejoiced over all the kindness that the LORD had shown Israel when He delivered them from the Egyptians. ¹⁰“Blessed be the LORD,” Jethro said, “who delivered you from the Egyptians and from Pharaoh, and who delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians. ¹¹Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods, memorial altars are also mentioned in Gen. 33:20; 35:7; Josh. 22:26–27; Judg. 6:24. 16: Hand upon the throne of the LORD: The anomalous Heb word rendered “throne” may be an error for “banner” (that is, battle standard), which would make the connection to v. 15 clearer. This difficult phrase is possibly an oath formula meaning “I swear by the LORD’s throne/banner.”

18.1–27: The visit of Jethro. The fact that v. 3 seems unaware of 2.22, and that Moses’ father-in-law was called Reuel in that episode (2.16–22, from J), suggests that this episode is drawn from a different source; the predominance of the name “God” (“‘elohim”) here and other details indicate that it is E.

18.1–12: Jethro’s arrival. 1: Jethro, see 2.18 n. 2: This source assumes that Zipporah and the children (2.21–22; 4.20) had been sent back from Egypt to Midian. 4: This is the first we hear of Eliezer’s name. Delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh, see 2.15. 5: At the mountain of God, Sinai/Horeb (3.1). Since Israel does not reach Sinai until 19.2, this episode evidently took place afterwards. This is also implied by the context in Deut. 1.6–17 and by the presumption in Exod. 24.14b that the pre-Jethro judicial system is still in place, with Aaron and Hur substituting for Moses. Thus, this passage is not where it belongs chronologically. Talmudic sages recognized that the Torah sometimes narrates events out of their chronological sequence for literary or rhetorical purposes (“there is no earlier or later in the Torah”). Radak suggested that the Torah’s aim was to juxtapose Jethro’s visit with the attack of the Amalekites (17.8–16) so as to contrast the Midianites’ friendliness with the Amalekites’ enmity as a guide for future dealings with these two nations (Radak at Judg. 1.16; see 1 Sam. 15:5–7). 11: Now I know: In a further fulfillment of the LORD’s aim that all come to know His name and acknowledge Him (see 5.1–6.1 n.; 6.2 n.; 14.4; 15.3), Jethro recognizes His superiority, though Amalek 1). 14: This event, too, is to be memorialized (cf. 12.14, 26–27; 13.3, 8–9, 14–16; 16.32–34), both in writing and orally (cf. Deut. 25.17). This is the first time writing is mentioned among the Israelites. Document, a scroll or an inscription. I will utterly blot out, cf. Num. 24.20. In Deut. 25.19 Israel is commanded to wipe out the Amalekites, apparently acting as God’s agents. 15: The event is also commemorated with a monument, in the shape of an altar. Named me-

“yes, by the result of their very schemes against [the people].”^a ¹²And Jethro, Moses’ father-in-law, brought a burnt offering and sacrifices for God; and Aaron came with all the elders of Israel to partake of the meal before God with Moses’ father-in-law.

¹³Next day, Moses sat as magistrate among the people, while the people stood about Moses from morning until evening. ¹⁴But when Moses’ father-in-law saw how much he had to do for the people, he said, “What is this thing that you are doing to the people? Why do you act^b alone, while all the people stand about you from morning until evening?” ¹⁵Moses replied to his father-in-law, “It is because the people come to me to inquire of God. ¹⁶When they have a dispute, it comes before me, and I decide between one person and another, and I make known the laws and teachings of God.”

¹⁷But Moses’ father-in-law said to him, “The thing you are doing is not right; ¹⁸you will surely wear yourself out, and these people as well. For the task is too heavy for you; you cannot do it alone. ¹⁹Now listen to me. I will give you counsel, and God be with you! You represent the people before God: you bring the disputes before God, ²⁰and enjoin upon them the laws and the teachings, and make known to them the way they are to go and the practices they are to follow. ²¹You shall also seek out from among all the people capable men who fear God, trustworthy men who spurn ill-gotten gain. Set these over them as chiefs of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, and ²²let them judge the people at all times. he does not renounce other gods (contrast Naaman in 2 Kings 5.15, 17). The Torah does not expect Gentiles to become monotheists (see Deut. 4.19), only to recognize the LORD’s superiority and authority when He asserts it, as in the case of Egypt. The ideal of universal monotheism first appears in the classical prophets (Jer. 16.19–20; Zech. 14.9). Neither the prophets nor Jewish tradition call for conversion to Judaism of Gentiles, even monotheistic Gentiles, though later Jewish tradition—characteristically reading the Bible through the prism of the prophets—believed that Jethro did abandon idolatry (Exod. Rab. 1.32) and, going even further, became a Jew (Tg. Ps.-J. Exod. 18.6, 27; Tanḥ. Buber Yitro, 5). Yes, by the result of . . . , i.e., “Yes, they perished as the result of . . .” 12: A burnt offering and sacrifices: A burnt offering was entirely burnt as a tribute to God on the altar (Lev. ch 1). The sacrifice (short for “sacrifice of well-being,” Lev. 3.1) was partly burnt, but most of it was eaten by the donor and guests at a sacrificial meal (v. 12; cf. 24.5, 9–11; 32.6; Deut. 12.27; 27.7).

18.13–27: The organization of a judiciary, also related (with variations) in Deut. 1.9–18. Remarkably, the judicial institution was ascribed to a priest of the Midianites, a nation with whom the Israelites later had hostile relations. 13: As magistrate, better, “to judge” the people’s disputes. 15: To inquire of God: Moses would either consult God for a verdict (cf. 22.8) or decide based on prior rulings by God (cf. the laws generated by Moses’ continued consultation with God in Lev. 24.10–23; Num. 9.1–14; 15.32–36; chs 27, 36). The judicial role of the prophets Deborah and Samuel (Judg. 4.4–5; 1 Sam. 7.15–17) may also have involved oracular consultation of God. 19: And God be with you: Jethro may be either praying or promising that if Moses follows his advice, God will grant him success (= “you will be able to bear up,” v. 23), or he may mean “and if God agrees” (= “and God so commands you,” v. 23). 19–22: Jethro advises Moses to continue consulting God in cases without legal precedent, but to make the resulting laws and . . . teachings (v. 20) public, to reduce the need for adjudication and enable him to delegate authority to officials who could judge most remaining cases, leaving only the difficult ones for him (cf. Deut. 17.8–13). 21: Jethro defines the ideal qualities of character required of judges. Fear God, men of conscience (1.17 n.). Trustworthy men, or “men of truth.” Spurn ill-gotten gain, unsusceptible to bribes (23.8). In recounting this event in Deut. 1.13, 15, Moses lists intellectual qualifications. Maimonides, in defining the qualifications for judges, holds that the qualities of both lists, character as well as intellect, are required (Hilkhot Sanh. 2.7). Chiefs of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens: These are military ranks, consistent with the fact that the Israelites are organized as an army (12.41 n.) and have just fought a battle (17.8–16). Military officers sometimes held judicial responsibilities in the ancient Near East. 22: Major, according to v. 26, “difficult.” 23: And God so com-them share the burden with you. ²³If you do this—and God so commands you—you will be able to bear up; and all these people too will go home unwearied.”

²⁴Moses heeded his father-in-law and did just as he had said. ²⁵Moses chose capable men out of all Israel, and appointed them heads over the people—chiefs of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens; ²⁶and they judged the people at all times: the difficult matters they would bring to Moses, and all the minor matters they would decide themselves. ²⁷Then Moses bade his father-in-law farewell, and he went his way to his own land.

19 On the third new moon after the Israelites had gone forth from the land of Egypt, on that very day, they entered the wilderness of Sinai. ²Having journeyed from Rephidim, they entered the wilderness of Sinai and encamped in the wilderness. Israel encamped there in front of the mountain, ³and Moses went up to God. The LORD called to him from the mountain, saying, “Thus shall you say to the house of Jacob and declare to the children of Israel: ⁴‘You have seen what I did to the Egyptmands you, i.e., authorizes you to follow this suggestion. 27: According to Num. 10.29–32, from a different source, Moses sought to persuade Jethro to remain with the Israelites and share God’s bounty with them in the promised land, but he declined.

Chs 19–24: The theophany, covenant, and laws at Sinai. The momentous encounter with God at Sinai is, for the Torah, the defining and seminal moment in Israel’s relationship with God. Nevertheless, it is extraordinarily difficult to follow. It was transmitted in multiple versions that differed about the nature of the event and what God communicated to the people. The text clearly combines material from J, E, and P, but the relative paucity of identifying characteristics in several vv. has made it more difficult than usual to reach a consensus about which source they belong to. The combination of these sources, based on the redactor’s perception that they are all true, resulted in significant tensions within the narrative. For example, according to 19.9, the theophany was to be auditory: The people would hear God speaking to Moses, although it is not clear what they would hear. According to v. 19 it was a dialogue (possibly consisting of vv. 20–25), but 20.1 says that it was the Decalogue. In contrast, in 19.11 God speaks of a visual rather than auditory theophany, although in v. 21 He warns against the people trying “to gaze.” The account of Moses’ writing and communicating the laws during the covenant ceremony in 24.3 and 7 apparently refers to the laws of 20.19–23.33 and seems unaware of the Decalogue; only in 24.12 does God summon him to receive the stone tablets, which played no role in the covenant just concluded (24.3–8). Moses’ reports in 19.8b and 9b are redundant, as are God’s two descents to the mountain (19.18a, 20a), while “Come up to the LORD” (24.1) is a non sequitur since Moses has already done so (20.18). Despite, or perhaps because of, these tensions, the narrative has great power, expressing the multifaceted, ambiguous nature of revelation.

seems designed to foreground the date because of the historic significance of what will happen at Sinai. The third new moon, the new moon of Sivan, counting the new moon of Nisan as the first (12.2 n.). The Israelites will remain at Sinai for just short of a year (Num. 10.11). The wilderness of Sinai, the wilderness surrounding Mount Sinai, where Moses’ mission had begun (see 3.1 and n.). The arrival there heralds the fulfillment of God’s promise to Moses (3.12). 3–6: God announces the purpose, first revealed in 6.6–7, toward which everything has led: Having redeemed Israel, as promised, He proposes a covenant relationship, as promised in 6.7. This relationship is modeled on ancient royal covenants, in which a citizenry accepted a king, and on suzerainty treaties, in which a weaker king accepted a more powerful one as his suzerain. The covenant proposed here goes beyond the one established with Israel’s ancestors (Gen. chs 15, 17). Here, God imposes specific, detailed obligations and, in return, promises Israel an especially close relationship with Him. This covenant, along with the earlier one, became the basis on which Judaism defined its relationship with God. As befits the solemnity of the proposal, much of God’s statement is in a quasi-poetic style, marked by parallelism and metaphors. According to the final form of the text, the terms of the covenant—which is formally established in 24.7–8—are the Decalogue (20.2–14) and the “Book of the Covenant” (20.19–23.33). 3: House of Jacob, the Israelites, Jacob’s descendants (1.1–5). According to Mek. Bahodesh 2, this phrase refers specifically to the women, while the children of Israel refers to the men. 4: God reminds Israel of what He has already done, since in the ancient Near East a suzerain’s prior benefactions to a vassal, such as delivering him from enemies, are the vassal’s motivation to accept a treaty with him (cf. 20.2–3). You have seen: The premise of the covenant is Israel’s national experience.

tians, how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to Me. ⁵Now then, if you will obey Me faithfully and keep My covenant, you shall be My treasured possession among all the peoples. Indeed, all the earth is Mine, ⁶but you shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.' These are the words that you shall speak to the children of Israel."

⁷Moses came and summoned the elders of the people and put before them all that the LORD had commanded him. ⁸All the people answered as one, saying, "All that the LORD has spoken we will do!" And Moses brought back the people's words to the LORD. ⁹And the LORD said to Moses, "I will come to you in a thick cloud, in order that the people may hear when I speak with you and so trust you ever after." Then Moses reported the people's words to the LORD, ¹⁰and the LORD said to Moses, "Go to the people and warn them to stay pure^a today and tomorrow. Let them wash their clothes. ¹¹Let them be ready for the third day; for on the third day the LORD will come down, in the sight of all the people, on Mount Sinai. ¹²You shall set bounds for the people round about, saying, 'Beware of going up the mountain or touching the border of it. Who-

From biblical times on, Jewish belief has been based primarily on Jewish historical experience rather than speculative thought. On eagles' wings: God led Israel swiftly and safely through the wilderness, like an eagle training its young to fly, catching them on its back when they tire or fall. Cf. Deut. 32.11–12. To Me, to Mount Sinai/Horeb, "the mountain of God." 5: Treasured possession, Heb "segulah" is personal property: the private property of a king, as distinct from that used for public purposes (1 Chron. 29.3; Eccl. 2.8), or of economic dependents, such as a wife's nest egg or the "peculium" of a son or slave. One's personal stake in his private property gives it the connotation of something "treasured." Although God owns all things, if Israel accepts His covenant He will cherish Israel because of His personal relationship with it. A Hittite king described one of his vassals by this term, and an ancient Syrian royal seal describes the king as the servant, beloved, and treasure of the gods. 5b–6a: Although all the (peoples of the) world are mine, if you obey My covenant it is you who shall be My kingdom of priests and a holy nation: enjoying the status of priests, close to God and sacrosanct (Deut. 26.19; 28.9; and esp. Isa. 61.6; 62.12; for "holy meaning sacrosanct and inviolable," see Jer. 2.3). Deuteronomy (Deut. 7.1–6; 14.2, 21) and later Jewish tradition converted this from a promise to a responsibility (noblesse oblige) requiring the entire Jewish people, not just the priests, to live by a code of holiness—God's commandments—and to serve as priests, bringing knowledge of Him to the world. 7: All that the LORD had commanded him, in vv. 3–6. 8: Although they have not yet heard the terms of the covenant, the people willingly and unanimously accept God's proposal and promise to obey Him, as they reconfirm twice in 24.3, 7. 8b–13: Vv. 8b–9a and 9b–13 seem to be alternative versions of Moses' report to God and God's reply. According to 8b–9a, God replied by telling Moses, privately, that He would come and speak to Moses in the people's hearing in order to confirm Moses' credibility. According to vv. 9b–13 He told Moses to prepare the people for His coming appearance, but did not divulge its purpose (cf. 20.17). 9a: In order that the people may hear when I speak with you and so trust you ever after: Once the people personally overhear God and Moses conversing (v. 19b), they will be convinced once and for all that Moses really is God's prophet. This conviction, first instilled in 4.1–9 and 14.31, is essential for their acceptance of all the rest of the Torah, which God communicates through Moses after the people decline to hear Him directly following the Decalogue (20.16). In classical Jewish thought, the fact that the entire nation witnessed God speaking to Moses is the definitive evidence that the Torah is from God (Judah Halevi, Kuzari 1:87–88; Maimonides, Hilkhot Yesodei Hatorah 8:1), though according to Saadia Gaon, this demonstration of the truth of Judaism was only a stopgap until the Jewish people could derive the same lesson by the slower process of reasoning (Beliefs and Opinions, Introductory Treatise, sec. 6). 9b–13: God's descent to the mountain will turn it into a holy place and it will accordingly have to be safeguarded from impurity and encroachment by zones of increasingly restricted access, like the Tabernacle. 10: Warn them to stay pure, lit. "purify them," possibly meaning "have them purify themselves"—by laundering (cf. Lev. 11.25, 28, 40, etc.), abstaining from sexual relations (v. 15), and possibly by bathing as well (2 Sam. 11.2, 4). 11: Purification the day before witnessing a manifestation of God's power is also prescribed in Num. 11.18; Josh. 3.5; cf. Josh. 7.13. Here an extra day is prescribed because of the momentousness of the event. Come down, from His dwelling-place in heaven. 12: Set bounds, temporarily (see v. 13b). Cf. 3.5; Josh. 5.15. Whoever touches the ever touches the mountain shall be put to death: ¹³no hand shall touch him, but he shall be either stoned or shot; beast or man, he shall not live.’ When the ram’s horn “sounds a long blast,”^a they may go up on the mountain.”

¹⁴Moses came down from the mountain to the people and warned the people to stay pure, and they washed their clothes. ¹⁵And he said to the people, “Be ready for the third day: do not go near a woman.”

¹⁶On the third day, as morning dawned, there was thunder, and lightning, and a dense cloud upon the mountain, and a very loud blast of the horn; and all the people who were in the camp trembled. ¹⁷Moses led the people out of the camp toward God, and they took their places at the foot of the mountain.

¹⁸Now Mount Sinai was all in smoke, for the LORD had come down upon it in fire; the smoke rose like the smoke of a kiln, and the whole mountain^b trembled violently. ¹⁹The blare of the horn grew louder and louder. As Moses spoke, God answered him in thunder. ²⁰The LORD came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mountain, and the LORD called Moses to the top of the mountain and Moses went up. ²¹The LORD said to Moses, “Go down, warn the people not to break through to the LORD to gaze, lest many of them perish. ²²The priests also, who come near the LORD, must stay pure, lest the LORD break out against them.” ²³But Moses said to the LORD, “The people cannot come up to Mount Sinai, for You warned us saying, ‘Set bounds about the mountain and sanctify it.’” ²⁴So the LORD said to him, “Go down, and come back together with Aaron; but let not the priests or the people mountain shall be put to death, like unauthorized persons who encroach upon the sanctuary (Num. 3.10, 38). 13: Since violators become subject to death for touching the holy mountain (cf. Num. 4.15; 1 Chron. 13.10), they must be executed by methods that do not require touching them, lest they infect their executioners with its fatal holiness. Shot, by arrow. When the ram’s horn sounds a long blast, they may go up on the mountain: It is never reported that this happened. The v. could mean that a final, long blast of the trumpet will later indicate when God has left the mountain and it is safe for people to go up; alternately, it reflects a different tradition that did not believe that contact with the mountain was deadly. 15: Do not go near a woman: Sexual relations produce ritual impurity, which disqualifies one from entering the sanctuary (Lev. 15.18; 1 Sam. 21.5–6). Some modern Jewish feminist exegesis, noting that this clause is clearly addressed to the men only and that it was not part of God’s instructions in vv. 10–13, infers that not regarding women as part of the active community reflects Moses’ own, male-centered, viewpoint, not God’s. For a more inclusive view of women, see Deut. 29.10; 31.12. 16: Thunder . . . lightning . . . dense cloud . . .: The arrival of God (v. 18) is heralded by these awesome forces of nature serving like a king’s outrunners (2 Sam. 15.1; 1 Kings 1.5) and by a loud blast of the horn. See also 1 Kings 19.11–13; Hab. 3.3–5; Pss. 18.8–16; 68.9–10. Outside the Bible these phenomena also appear in theophanies, particularly of storm gods. In Israelite tradition, although the LORD is no mere storm god, these motifs were taken over to describe the overwhelming power and majesty of the direct experience of the divine. 18: The LORD had come down upon it in fire, see 3.2 n. Like the smoke of a kiln, cf. Gen. 19.28. 19: As Moses spoke, God answered him: The Heb verbs are iterative, indicating that Moses kept speaking and God kept answering him; what the people overheard was a dialogue. Its contents are not specified (it cannot be the dialogue of vv. 20–24 since Moses conveyed its contents to the people [v. 25], and it cannot be the Decalogue since that is a monologue; in the present context, however, the redactor may have believed it was one of those). In thunder, in a thunderous voice; cf. Pss. 18.14; 29.3–9; Job 40.9. 21–24: Further instructions to prevent the people from encroaching and dying. 21: Lest many of them perish, see 3.6 n.; 33.20; cf. Although priests will later have access to the sanctuary, at the theophany they are restricted like the rest of the people. Break out, strike them down; cf. 2 Sam. 6.8. 23: Sanctify it, treat it like a sanctuary, by the restrictions specified above. 24: Come back together with Aaron: The summit of the mountain, like the Holy of Holies, is accessible only to Moses (25.22; 26.33; Lev. 16.3). 25: Spoke to them: He told them what God had said in vv. 21–24.

20.1–14: The Decalogue. The Decalogue, Heb “‘aseret hade-varim,” lit. “ten words,” i.e., “statements” (see 34.28; Deut. 4.13; 10.4) is the initial stipulation of the covenant. (“Decalogue,” from the Latin for “ten words,” or “ten statements,” is a more literal rendition of Heb than “Ten Commandments.”) They are addressed directly to the people. No punishments are stated; obedience is motivated not by fear of punishment but by God’s absolute authority and the people’s desire to live in accordance with His will. The belief that God is the author of the laws is a distinctive feature of biblical law. Elsewhere in the ancient Near East the laws were believed to be the product of human minds, particularly the king. While Mesopotamian kings claimed to have learned the principles of truth and justice from the gods, they themselves turned those principles into specific laws. Implicit in this biblical view is that God is Israel’s king, hence its legislator. This elevated the status of law beyond matters of practicality and endowed it with sanctity. Obedience to law—civil no less than moral and ritual law—became a religious duty; obedience made one holy and crimes were sins, a flouting of God’s authority. The items in the Decalogue are arranged in two groups. Duties to God come first. Each commandment in this group contains the phrase, “the LORD your God.” The second group contains duties toward fellow humans, which are depicted as being of equal concern to God. The first five are accompanied by explanatory comments or exhortations. The remaining five, as widely recognized ethical requirements, need no such support. Exod. 34.28 and Deut. 4.13 and 10.4 all refer to “Ten Commandments,” but do not clarify how these should be divided to reach that number, and this issue was debated in antiquity, and continues to be disputed. The translation follows the view of Philo, Josephus, and some talmudic sources. The Decalogue is repeated in Deut. 5.6–17 with a few variations, especially in the Sabbath commandment. 1: The addressee is not specified. The present sequence of the narrative suggests that it was the people, as stated in Deut. 5.4 and 19, but according to Deut. 5.5 and, possibly, Exod. 20.15–18, God spoke only to Moses, who later communicated His words to the people. Talmudic exegesis resolves the inconsistency by explaining that the people heard the first two commandments, in which God speaks in the first person, directly from God and the remainder, in which God is spoken of in the third person, via Moses (b. Mak. 24a). 2–3: The first commandment. 2: I the LORD am your God: This v. lacks an imperative verb and is not itself a commandment but an introduction to the entire Decalogue. The LORD identifies Himself by name to solemnly indicate that His authority stands behind the following stipulations. His authority derives from His freeing Israel from bondage (cf. 19.4 n.). This v. also serves as the motive clause for the first commandment (v. 3), explaining that since the LORD alone freed Israel from Egypt, He alone is Israel’s God, and the worship of other gods is prohibited (cf. Judg. 6.8–10; Ps. 81.9–11). This is a central doctrine of biblical religion, which is based on the historical experience of the Israelites (see 19.4 n.). The logic is that of covenants, which establish an exclusive relationship: A subject population or king may have only one sovereign or suzerain, and ancient oaths of allegiance and treaties explicitly prohibit subjects and vassals from accepting another. As noted (19.4 n.), subjects entered into such relationships because of the past benefactions of the king or suzerain, such as delivering them from enemies. The covenant was thus an apt metaphor for Israel’s exclusive relationship with YHWH because of the exodus. Although this v. lacks an imperative verb, and thus cannot be called a commandment, later Jewish tradition interpreted it as a command in itself requiring belief in God (Maimonides, Hilkhot Yesodei Hatorah 16; Sefer Hamitsvot, positive no. 1; Ramban) or belief that the LORD alone is God (Ibn Ezra). 3: You shall have no other gods: This is not a theological statement denying the existence of other gods (such as Deut. 4.35–39) but a behavioral injunction ruling out worship of the other beings and objects known as gods (see 15.11 n.). This prohibition, banning the worship of all but one deity, was unique. Polytheism was inherently tolerant of the worship of many gods since no single god was believed to control all the phenomena of nature that are vital to human life. Besides Me, in addition to Me. Israelites tempted to worship other gods would not abandon the LORD but would worship others in addition to Him 4–6: The second commandment. 4: A sculptured image: Only images made for any likeness of what is in the heavens above, or on the earth below, or in the waters under the earth. ⁵You shall not bow down to them or serve them. For I the LORD your God am an impassioned God, visiting the guilt of the parents upon the children, upon the third and upon the fourth generations of those who reject Me, ⁶but showing kindness to the thousandth generation of those who love Me and keep My commandments.

worship (v. 5) are prohibited. Non-idolatrous statues of certain creatures were permitted, such as the cherubs (Exod. 25.18–20) and the oxen supporting the water tank in Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 7.25); see also Num. 21.8–9. What is in the heavens above, such as birds (Deut. 4.17), the sun, moon, and stars, or other members of God's heavenly retinue (see 15.11 n.). Not even an idol of the LORD is permitted. On the earth below, such as animals (Deut. 4.17–18a) or sacred trees (Exod. 34.13). In the waters under the earth, i.e., in oceans, lakes, and rivers. The surface of the earth is conceived as standing or floating on a huge body of water which surrounds it in the form of oceans and breaks through to the earth's surface in the form of lakes, springs, and rivers. For the reasons for this commandment, see vv. 19–20; Deut. 4.9–18. 5: An impassioned God: This is a warning against provoking God's jealous indignation—the rage felt by one whose prerogatives are given to another (cf. Isa. 42.8; 48.11). God's reaction reflects His emotional tie with Israel, described metaphorically by the prophets as a marital bond (see 6.7 n.). Hence, worship of other gods is as repugnant as adultery (34.15–16; Ezek. ch 16) and God's response, like that of an aggrieved husband, is jealousy (see the use of this term ["k-n-"] in Prov. 6.34). In the biblical view, this is an aspect of His passionate involvement with human beings and no more a character flaw than is human jealousy over marital infidelity. But postbiblical commentators found the implications of divine jealousy troubling, and Maimonides interpreted the term as merely an anthropomorphism based on the necessity of borrowing terms from human experience to describe God based on His actions: "[In reality, His punitive actions] are in accordance with the guilt of those who are to be punished, and not the result of any emotion; for He is above all defect!" (Guide of the Perplexed, 1.54). Visiting the guilt of the parents upon the children: God does not punish the idolater alone, but his descendants as well, just as He rewards descendants for their ancestors' loyalty and obedience. This view of divine retribution as extending to descendants corresponds to the concept of family solidarity in ancient societies, especially those with a tribal background, like Israel. It is stated most starkly in 34.7 and Num. 14.18. Here, the phrases of those who reject Me and of those who love Me (v. 6) modify it to indicate that God punishes or rewards descendants for ancestral sins and virtues only if they act as their ancestors did. For further, outright rejection of transgenerational retribution, see Deut. 24.16; Jer. 31.29–30; Ezek. 18.1–20. Upon the third and . . . fourth generations: That is, upon grandchildren and great-grandchildren—the descendants the guilty are likely to see in their own lifetimes. This indicates that the punishment of descendants is intended as a deterrent to, and punishment of, their ancestors, not a transfer of guilt to the descendants in their own right. Those who reject Me: A polytheistic Israelite would not literally reject the LORD but would worship Him together with other gods or, at worst, ignore Him, but since He demands total fidelity, worshipping another god alongside Him is tantamount to rejection. 6: Showing kindness, better, "keeping faith" or "dealing faithfully." On Heb "hesed" see 15.13 n. This v. assures Israel, which is covenanted to God, that He will faithfully reciprocate its devotion and obedience. To the thousandth generation, infinitely. God's favor far exceeds His wrath, which extends only to the third and fourth generation. Those who love Me, those who are loyal to Me. In biblical Heb, "love" includes the loyalty of allies and of a vassal toward his suzerain (1 Sam. 18.1, 3; 20.17; 1 Kings 5.15). 7: The third commandment. Swear falsely by the name of the LORD: Assurances in court, in public affairs, and even in ordinary conversation were often backed up with conditional self-curses that would take effect if the swearer's assertion were false or his promise unfulfilled. Typical formulations were: "By the life of the LORD, I will (or will not) . . ." or, "May the LORD do such and such to me if I did (or if I didn't) . . ." The swearer proved his sincerity by invoking punishment from God, who cannot be deceived or evaded. A false oath would show contempt for God by implying that the swearer does not fear His punishment. Cf. Lev. 19.12. Will not clear, will not leave unpunished. 8–11: The fourth commandment. The first three prohibit acts of disrespect for God; this requires a positive act of honoring Him. This is the longest commandment in the Decalogue, indicating the sabbath's importance as one of the quintessential expressions of loyalty to God. 8: Sabbath, See 16.23 n. Keep it holy, withdraw it from common use (by you shall labor and do all your work,¹⁰ but the seventh day is a sabbath of the LORD your God: you shall not do any work—you, your son or daughter, your male or female slave, or your cattle, or the stranger who is within your settlements.¹¹ For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth and sea, and all that is in them, and He rested on the seventh day; therefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it.

desisting from labor [v. 10]) and reserve it for a special purpose associated with God. Dedication to God was expressed by visits to sanctuaries and prophets (2 Kings 4.23; Isa. 1.13; 66.23), by special sacrifices and other activities in the Temple (Num. 28.9–10; Lev. 24.8), by the recitation of a special psalm for the day (Ps. 92), and by a joyous atmosphere (Hos. 2.13; Isa. 58.13; Lam. 2.6). 10: A sabbath of the LORD your God: Since He observes the Sabbath (Gen. 2.2; Exod. 16.21–30) it must be used for His purposes, not one's own (cf. Isa. 58.13). You shall not do any work, defined by various biblical passages to include gathering food and fuel, kindling fire, agriculture, and business activities (16.23–30; 34.21; 35.3; Num. 15.32–36; Amos 8.5; Jer. 17.21–22; Neh. 13.15–21). The Rabbis defined more precisely what kinds of work fell under this prohibition, identifying thirty-nine categories (e.g., weaving, hammering, writing) based on the inference that the activities performed in constructing the Tabernacle— forbidden on the Sabbath—exemplified the definition of “work” (Exod. 31.13–17; 35.2; m. Shab. 7.2; b. Shab. 49b). Your male or female slave: This one day a week the servant is treated as the master's equal. The stranger, the resident alien (12.19 n., 43 n.). Cf. 23.12. The text reads lit. “your stranger,” which implies that the resident alien was, at least in some cases, dependent on a specific individual. 11: Keeping the Sabbath holy honors God by emulating His actions at the time of creation (Gen. 2.1–3; cf. Exod. 21.17). In place of this explanation of the origin of the Sabbath, the Decalogue in Deuteronomy states its purpose of providing rest to servants and cites the exodus as the reason for observing it (Deut. 5.14–15). 12: The fifth commandment. Honoring one's parents is a counterpart to the honor due God; it forms a bridge between duties toward God and toward humans. Honor: One aspect of this duty is respect, which includes obedience and forbids hitting, insulting and behaving disrespectfully toward them, and misappropriating their property (21.15, 17; Lev. 20.9; Deut. 27.16; Prov. 30.17). Another is caring for them when they are infirm, as recognized in the Talmud: “What is honoring? Providing them food and drink, clothing and covers, and taking them in and out” (b. Kid. 31b). That you may long endure on the land: This does not refer to personal longevity. Ancient Near Eastern legal documents make children's right to inherit their parents' property contingent on honoring them by providing and caring for them. Here God applies this condition on a national scale: The right of future generations of Israelites to inherit the land of Israel from their parents is contingent upon honoring them. 13: The sixth through tenth commandments. You shall not murder: This refers to illicit killing. The King James Version's “thou shalt not kill” is too broad; it implies that even capital punishment and war are prohibited, whereas the Torah sometimes mandates these. You shall not commit adultery: In the Bible this refers to voluntary sexual relations between a married or engaged woman and a man other than her husband. It did not refer to the extramarital relations of a married man (in polygamous societies a wife might share her husband with other wives and did not have an exclusive right to him). The Torah views adultery as a sin against God (Gen. 20.6; 39.9; cf. Ps. 51.6; Prov. 2.7) and a capital crime (Lev. 20.10; Deut. 22.22–27). You shall not steal: Although b. Sanh. 86a, followed by some modern scholars, holds that this refers to stealing of persons, i.e. kidnapping (21.16), the plain sense is, as Ibn Ezra recognized, that the commandment refers to theft. You shall not bear false witness: This covers both false accusation and false testimony in court. False accusation is a means of depriving one's fellow of what belongs to him, as when the accuser falsely claims ownership of something in another's possession and the accused cannot disprove it (cf. 22.8). The penalty for false testimony is described in Deut. 19.16–21. 14: You shall not covet: Some view this as an ethical exhortation to master the kinds of impulses that would lead to violation of the preceding commandments, but the Heb verb sometimes refers to having designs on a desired object, perhaps even to scheming or ma-

¹⁵ All the people witnessed the thunder and lightning, the blare of the horn and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they fell back and stood at a distance. ¹⁶“You speak to us,” they said to Moses, “and we will obey; but let not God speak to us, lest we die.” ¹⁷Moses answered the people, “Be not afraid; for God has come only in order to test you, and in order that the fear of Him may be ever with you, so that you do not go astray.” ¹⁸So the people remained at a distance, while Moses approached the thick cloud where God was.

¹⁹The LORD said to Moses:

Thus shall you say to the Israelites: You yourselves saw

neuvering to acquire it (see especially 34.24). Hence, the sense could be “do not scheme to acquire. . . .” Your neighbor’s house: that is, “household,” which the second clause explicates as consisting of wife, servants, and livestock. In Deut. 5.18, which places the wife in the first clause and house, field, servants, and cattle in the second, “house” means dwelling. The wording in Exodus reflects conditions when the Israelites lived as nomadic herders without real estate (Gen. 12.5, 16; 26.14; Num. 16.30, 32; Deut. 11.6); Deut. refers to the kinds of property people will own after settlement in Canaan.

20.15–18: The people’s response to the theophany. ^{15:} Since the people do not refer to God’s words but only to the thunder and lightning, etc. (cf. 19.16–19), Ramban infers that this scene took place before God spoke the Decalogue. ^{16:} Moses’ office and authority as prophet are now made permanent at the people’s request (cf. Deut. 5.19–28; 18.15–19). The circumstances explain why God continued to communicate to Israel through prophets rather than directly. You speak to us, anything further that God says. If this scene preceded the Decalogue, the people (who already know that God will proclaim laws [19.5]) mean that Moses should hear the Decalogue by himself and convey it to them. Lest we die: They fear that auditory contact with God may be as lethal as visual contact (3.6 n.; 19.21 n.). 17: In order to test you: It is not clear what is tested. Another possible translation is “to give you an experience (of Him)” (M. Greenberg), meaning that the theophany would give the people a vivid, sensory experience of God. This interpretation fits the rest of the v., That the fear of Him may be ever with you, so that you do not go astray, namely the experience would instill “fear of God,” a deterrent to sin (1.17 n.; cf. Deut. 5.26). 18: Moses approached the thick cloud where God was: to hear either the Decalogue or further instructions (20.19–23.33), depending on when this scene took place.

20.19–23.33: The Book of the Covenant (or Covenant Code or Collection) lays out the terms of the covenant in detail, beginning with a law about idolatry and proper worship (20.19–23), followed by a series of civil and criminal laws (21.1–22.16) and then a collection of ethical and religious exhortations concluding with further laws about worship (22.17–23.19), and an epilogue containing promises of reward for fidelity and warnings about idolatry (23.20–33). These laws may reflect a settled society of farmers and herders in premonarchic times (since the highest official of whom they are aware is the chieftain, not the king; 22.27 n.). Like the laws of the Torah as a whole, they are not a complete, systematic code. Practical details of how to apply the law are rarely spelled out, and areas such as commerce, real estate, marriage, inheritance, and government are mentioned barely or not at all. Apparently only part of the existing laws have been selected, perhaps to illustrate certain ideal principles of justice and religion. Other areas and details of enforcement must have been governed by the oral law, courts, and administrative agencies. These details became the subject of the Oral Torah in rabbinic times, embodied in the Mishnah, Talmud, and halakhic midrashim. The Book of the Covenant (for this term, see Exod. 24.7, translated “the record of the covenant”) constitutes the first of four major collections of law in the Torah. The others (in addition to the brief variant of the Book of the Covenant in 34.11–26) are the Priestly laws (primarily Exod. chs 25–40, most of Leviticus, and the laws in Numbers), the Holiness Collection (Lev. chs 17–26), and the Deuteronomic laws (Deut. 11.31–28.69). Unlike most narratives, the law collections were not blended by a redactor into a single, integrated whole but were left separate. The resolution of their discrepancies is a fundamental feature of rabbinic exegesis.

20.19–23: The altar. All of the Torah’s law collections begin with laws contrasting forbidden, pagan means of worship with permitted ones at a proper place of worship (see also chs 25–31 in contrast to Exod. 32 [see introductory comment to 31.18–32.35]; Lev. ch 17; Deut. ch 12). 19–21: Since Israel has seen that God communicates with them directly from heaven without the use of idols (which idolaters use to draw the gods close), they should not make idols to secure His presence and blessing but instead build Him an altar, offer sacrifices, and invoke His name. Cf. the similar argument in Deut. 4.9–18. 19: I spoke to you from the very heavens: This v. (probably from E, which distances God from that I spoke to you from the very heavens: ²⁰With Me, therefore, you shall not make any gods of silver, nor shall you make for yourselves any gods of gold. ²¹Make for Me an altar of earth and sacrifice on it your burnt offerings and your sacrifices of well-being,^a your sheep and your oxen; in every place where I cause My name to be mentioned I will come to you and bless you. ²²And if you make for Me an altar of stones, do not build it of hewn stones; for by wielding your tool upon them you have profaned them. ²³Do not ascend My altar by steps, that your nakedness may not be exposed upon it.

human beings and avoids anthropomorphism) contradicts ch 19, according to which God came down onto Mount Sinai (19.3, 9, 11, 18, 20, 21, from J). The midrash reconciled the contradiction by inferring from Deut. 4.36 that God spoke from heaven and only the fire and His power were on earth; another view is that He lowered the heavens to the top of Mount Sinai (Mek. Bahodesh 9; Rashi). 20: With Me, therefore, you shall not make any gods of silver, nor shall you make for yourselves any gods of gold, to draw God close and secure His blessings (v. 21b). Idolatry assumes that the deity is somehow present in (though not limited to) its image and available to bless its worshippers. Israel is to eschew such means and instead follow the instructions in the next v. 21: In every place: This law permits numerous places of sacrifice (Maimonides, Sefer Hamitzvot, positive commandment no. 20); contrast the later restriction of sacrifice to a single site in Deut. ch 12. Where I cause My name to be mentioned: The Heb is problematic; the original reading was probably "In every place where you invoke My name," as implied by the Peshitta, Targum Neofiti, and the Fragmen-tary Targum. Invoking God's name refers to calling upon Him in worship. I will come to you and bless you: Altars, instead of idols, will serve as the locus and symbol of God's presence, as does the altar in 24.4–8. 22: And if you make for Me an altar of stones: An exception to the requirement that the altar be made of earth (v. 21); perhaps the clause has in mind locations where the soil is sandy and cannot be packed firmly, but stones are available. Do not build it of hewn stones; for by wielding your tool upon them you have profaned them: The stones must be in their natural state, uncut. Cf. Deut. 27.5–6. The reason for the prohibition is uncertain. The Mishnah explains that "iron was created to shorten man's days [through its use in weapons], while the altar was created to lengthen man's days [by means of sacrifice]; what shortens may not rightly be lifted up against what lengthens" (m. Mid. 3:4). Rashbam suggests that the prohibition on cutting the stones is to preclude the temptation to carve images on them. 23: Do not ascend My altar by steps, that your nakedness may not be exposed upon it: The altar must either be low or, if built on a platform, have a ramp rather than stairs to climb onto it, lest one's private parts be exposed beneath the skirtlike garments that were worn. According to later Priestly legislation, when the Tabernacle was built, the priests were required to wear undergarments for this reason (28.42).

21.1–22.16: Civil and criminal laws to establish a just society, the purpose for which, according to Gen. 18.19, God chose Abraham and his descendants. The Torah's strong emphasis on law led to the important place that law and its study have in Judaism. The casuistic formulation of these laws ("if /when x happens, [then] y shall happen") is typical of all the ancient Near Eastern legal collections, and several laws are notably similar to their counterparts in those collections and later Arabic law, but they also display uniquely Israelite values, as in the treatment of murder and crimes against property and the concern for slaves and strangers. 21.1: Teaching the laws to the entire people is practically unparalleled in the ancient world. See further, "Exodus and the Jewish Tradition" in intro. to Exodus. 2–6: Manumission of indentured servants. Biblical law deals with two types of bondsmen: Israelite ("Hebrew"; see 1.15 n.) slaves, who are really indentured servants, and full slaves. Hebrew slaves (v. 2) must be freed after six years; full, lifelong slavery is in principle limited to foreigners (Deut. 15.12–18; Lev. 25.39–55). Both types were domestic slaves living in their owners' homes (see 12.44 n.), not members of slave gangs working on plantations. Biblical law and ethical teachings require humane treatment of slaves, based on the shared humanity of master and servant (Job 31.13–15) and the Israelites' own experience as slaves (Deut. 5.15; 15.15; 16.12; 24.18, 22). When you acquire a Hebrew slave: An indigent Israelite might indenture himself or a member of his household to obtain support him a wife, and she has borne him children, the wife and her children shall belong to the master, and he shall leave alone.⁵ But if the slave declares, "I love my master, and my wife and children: I do not wish to go free,"⁶ his master shall take him before God.^a He shall be brought to the door or the doorpost, and his master shall pierce his ear with an awl; and he shall then remain his slave for life.

⁷When a man sells his daughter as a slave, she shall not be freed as male slaves are.⁸ If she proves to be displeasing to her master, who designated her for himself, he must let her be redeemed; he shall not have the right to sell her to outsiders, since he broke faith with her.⁹ And if he designated her for his son, he shall deal with her as is the practice with free maidens.¹⁰ If he marries another, he must not withhold from this one her food, her clothing, or her conjugal rights.^b ¹¹If he fails her in these three ways, she shall go free, without payment.

¹²He who fatally strikes a man shall be put to death.¹³ If he did not do it by design, but it came about by an act of God, I will assign you a place to which he can flee.

¹⁴When a man schemes against another and kills him treacherously, you shall take him from My very altar to be put to death.

(see Lev. 25:39, 47), and a convicted thief who could not make restitution would be sold to raise the money to pay it (Exod. 22:2). Debtors and members of their households might also be seized to work off defaulted loans (2 Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:1–6); it is questionable whether the Torah permits this, but in any case the present law would have the effect of limiting debt servitude. In the seventh year he shall go free, so, too, Deut. 15:12. According to the Babylonian laws of Hammurabi (par. 117; in M. Roth, Law Collections from Mesopotamia and Asia Minor, p. 103 = Context of Scripture 2, p. 343), debt servants went free after three years. Lev. 25:10, 40–41 prescribe an entirely different system: All Hebrew slaves go free simultaneously in the jubilee year no matter how long they have served. 5: The servant might become attached to his master or the family he has established in the master's household, or consider security in subservience preferable to the financial risks of independence. 6: Before God . . . to the door or the doorpost, either at a sanctuary near the master's home or before some symbol of God kept at the master's door. Pierce his ear: This may symbolize the servant's obligation to have his ear permanently open to hear his master's orders or (see Deut. 15:17) permanent attachment to the master's house. The midrash saw the ceremony as symbolic: The ear, which heard God say that Israelites are His servants and may not be sold into permanent servitude (Lev. 25:42), is punished for electing to remain a servant to a human master (b. Kid. 22b). For life: According to halakic interpretation, for the rest of the master's life, unless a jubilee year (Lev. ch 25) comes first; even if the servant chooses to remain with the master, he does not remain beyond the jubilee (Mekhilla, Nezikin 2). This reconciles Exod. ch 21 with Lev. ch 25:7–11: According to Deut. 15:12–18, females sold into slavery go free, like males, after six years. The present law deals with a special case, that of a father selling his minor daughter for the purpose of marriage or concubinage in the purchaser's family. (Similar arrangements are known from the ancient Near East, where a poor father might arrange for his daughter's adoption by a well-to-do family in order to ensure a marriage for her.) Since the sale is for marriage, it is not terminated after six years, but the purchaser must meet certain conditions. If he reneges on these conditions (either those of v. 10 or those of vv. 8–10), she goes free. Conjugal rights, or "ointments," or "lodging." 12–32: Crimes against persons. 12–14: Capital punishment for murder. Unlike ancient Near Eastern and Arabic law, the Bible does not permit compensation of the victim's family for economic loss instead of capital punishment (Num. 35:31). Human life is sacred and beyond economic value, according to Gen. 1:26; 9:6 because of man's creation in the divine image. 13–14: In tribal societies lacking strong central authority the kinship group is the primary defender of its members. When a person is killed a kinsman is obliged to "redeem" the blood by slaying the killer (2 Sam. 3:27–30). Such "blood-vengeance" was originally exacted even if the killing was accidental. This v. limits it to deliberate murder and allows the accidental killer to seek refuge from the victim's kin at an altar or perhaps other places of sanctuary until a court can determine whether he acted intentionally (see the development of this idea in Num. 35:9–34; Deut. 19:1–13; Josh. ch 20). Originally in the ancient world the innocent and guilty alike could claim sanctuary; this v. subjects the institution to a moral criterion. 15: Obedience toward parents is considered the cornerstone of all order and authority, especially in a tribal, patriarchal society like ancient Israel. In the Laws of Hammurabi (par. 195; in Roth, Law Collections, p. 120 = Context, p. 348) a son who strikes his father is punished by cutting off his hand. The biblical law applies to both parents. The death penalty suggests that the Bible regards this crime as posing a severe danger to society. 16: The primary purpose of kidnapping was to enslave the victim. See also Deut. 24.7, where some details differ. 17: Insults: The Heb verb (lit. "treat lightly") has a wide range of meanings from "disrespect" to "revile, treat contemptuously, curse." The death penalty may be meant only rhetorically as a deterrent (cf. Deut. 21.18–21), though if the verb means "curse" it may be meant literally because of the potentially serious consequences that cursing was thought to entail. 18–19: This law and the next provide a rule of thumb for assessing the killer's motive: immediate death from a fight or disciplinary beating is presumptive evidence of murderous intent and calls for capital punishment, but death following temporary recovery, and a lingering death, are not. Idleness, income lost during convalescence. Cure: From this clause the Rabbis determined that the Bible permits medical care and people should not refuse it on the grounds that their injury or illness is the will of God and that the cure must come from Him alone (b. B. K. 85a, Rashi and tosafot). 20–21: This law and vv. 26–27 protect slaves from extreme corporal punishment. They do not distinguish between Hebrew slaves and others. 21: Since he is the other's property: That is, the slave is the master's property. This means either that the master was within his rights to punish the slave corporally, or that (in addition to the slave's lingering death) his investment in the slave makes it unlikely that he would have intentionally killed him. 22: Other damage to the woman. Based on reckoning: perhaps reckoning the age of the fetus, but both this translation and the alternative "as the judges determine" are questionable. Halakhic exegesis infers that, since the punishment is monetary rather than execution, the unborn fetus is not considered a living person and feticide is not murder (cf. 12–14 n.); hence, abortion is permitted when necessary to save the mother (Rashi and Yad Ramah to b. Sanh. 72b; see also Gen. 9.5–6 n.). 23–25: Life for life, eye for eye: This is the "lex talionis," measure-for-measure punishment by which the law strives to make punishment for death or injury fit the crime perfectly. See Deut. 19.21 and esp. Lev. 24.17–21. It may not be an obligatory requirement (Num. 35.31 implies that for injuries other than death an indemnity could be accepted instead; Josephus, Ant. 4.280) but a limitation of vengeance: It may not exceed the original injury (contrast Gen. 4.23). Talmudic loose construction of the law considered the equitable application of talion impossible and inferred that it requires the assailant to pay damages corresponding to the severity of the injury (m. B. K. 8.1; b. B. K. 83b–84a). In Mesopotamia, perpetrators were originally required to pay monetary indemnities; later, talion was imposed when the victim was a member of the upper class. Biblical law is the same for all classes. 28–32: These laws have especially close parallels in Babylonian law (Laws of Eshnunna, pars. 53–55; Laws of Hammurabi pars. 250–252; in Roth, Law Collections, pp. 67, 128 = Context of Scripture 2, pp. 335, 350), suggesting that the Bible might have bor-shall be stoned and its flesh shall not be eaten, but the owner of the ox is not to be punished. ²⁹If, however, that ox has been in the habit of goring, and its owner, though warned, has failed to guard it, and it kills a man or a woman—the ox shall be stoned and its owner, too, shall be put to death. ³⁰If ransom is laid upon him, he must pay whatever is laid upon him to redeem his life. ³¹So, too, if it gores a minor, male or female, [the owner] shall be dealt with according to the same rule. ³²But if the ox gores a slave, male or female, he shall pay thirty shekels of silver to the master, and the ox shall be stoned.

³³When a man opens a pit, or digs a pit and does not cover it, and an ox or an ass falls into it, ³⁴the one responsible for the pit must make restitution; he shall pay the price to the owner, but shall keep the dead animal.

³⁵When a man's ox injures his neighbor's ox and it dies, they shall sell the live ox and divide its price; they shall also divide the dead animal. ³⁶If, however, it is known that the ox was in the habit of goring, and its owner has failed to guard it, he must restore ox for ox, but shall keep the dead animal.

³⁷When a man steals an ox or a sheep, and slaughters it or sells it, he shall pay five oxen for the ox, and four sheep 22 for the sheep.—¹If the thief is seized while tunneling,^a and he is beaten to death, there is no bloodguilt in his case. ²If the sun has risen on him, there is bloodguilt in that case.—He^c must make restitution; if he lacks the means, he shall be sold for his theft. ³But if what he stole—whether ox or ass or sheep—is found alive in his possession, he shall pay double.

rowed and revised them. 28: The ox shall be stoned: Stoning, otherwise used only for humans, treats the ox as a criminal because it has killed a human (see Gen. 9.5). This and the avoidance of the ox's flesh express abhorrence at its taking of a human life. The owner is not punished because the accident was unpredictable. 29: If the owner ignored warnings that the ox had previously gored, he is executed for criminal negligence. The penalties in these vv. are not paralleled in Babylonian law, where nothing is done to the ox and the owner is only required to pay damages. V. 30 permits this if the victim's family agrees because his responsibility was only indirect and unintentional (contrast Num. 35.31).

31: According to the same rule apparently means that if the ox kills somebody's child, it is still the owner who is executed and not his child (cf. Deut. 24.16), as would apparently have been done as a form of talion under Babylonian law (cf. Laws of Hammurabi pars. 209–210, 229–230; in Roth, Law Collections, pp. 122, 125 = Context 2, pp. 348, 349). 32: The anomalous prescription of monetary compensation for killing a human being is puzzling since v. 20 prescribes capital punishment for killing a slave and the stoning of the ox treats the slave's death like that of freemen (v. 28). Perhaps in this case the slave is a foreigner, and the master, acting in lieu of the slave's absent family, has agreed to accept a ransom as in v. 30. This case differs from v. 30 by setting a fixed amount for the ransom, perhaps because a slave has a market value (thirty silver shekels is the price of a slave in several documents from Nuzi).

21.33–22.16: Crimes against property. 21.34: He . . . shall keep the dead animal, which has some value. Thus the owner of the dead animal receives full restitution, but no more, and the person who dug the pit can recover some of his costs. 35–36: If the goring was an unpredictable accident, both parties share in the loss, but if the owner of the goring ox was negligent, he must make full restitution. 37: This law continues in 22.2b–3. It establishes the principle that a thief (whose action was direct, intentional, and intended for profit) owes the victim more than restitution. 22.1–2a: These vv., set between hyphens, are a separate law, interposed here for an unknown reason. There is no bloodguilt in his case, i.e., if the circumstances are such that the homeowner has reason to fear for his or his family's life, such as where the thief is not visible to witnesses. But if he catches the thief in broad daylight, when the thief would presumably fear detection and not risk killing anybody, the homeowner is guilty of homicide. In the absence of danger to life, there is no right to kill a thief. 2b–3: These vv. continue 21.37. He shall be sold for his theft, to raise funds to pay restitution and the fine. According to the Laws of Hammurabi, a thief who is unable to make restitution is executed (par. 8; in Roth, Law Collections, p. 82 = Context 2, p. 337). Mesopotamian law often prescribes death for property offenses (Laws of Hammurabi, pars. 6–13, 21–22; in Roth, Law Collections, pp. 82–85 = Context 2, pp. 337–38). Biblical law, which considers human life

⁴When a man lets his livestock loose to graze in another's land, and so allows a field or a vineyard to be grazed bare, he must make restitution for the impairment^a of that field or vineyard.

⁵When a fire is started and spreads to thorns, so that stacked, standing, or growing^b grain is consumed, he who started the fire must make restitution.

⁹When a man gives to another an ass, an ox, a sheep or any other animal to guard, and it dies or is injured or is carried off, with no witness about, ¹⁰an oath before the LORD shall decide between the two of them that the one has not laid hands on the property of the other; the owner must acquiesce, and no restitution shall be made. ¹¹But if [the animal] was stolen from him, he shall make restitution to its owner. ¹²If it was torn by beasts, he shall bring it as evidence; he need not replace what has been torn by beasts.

¹³When a man borrows [an animal] from another and it dies or is injured, its owner not being with it, he must make restitution. ¹⁴If its owner was with it, no restitution need be made; but if it was hired, he is entitled to the hire.

¹⁵If a man seduces a virgin for whom the bride-price has not been paid,^d and lies with her, he must make her his

them. 9–12: (b) But if he was asked to keep cattle, which roam in the field, extra precautions are expected and if they are stolen (v. 11) he is held negligent and must pay for the loss. If, however, the loss was unpreventable, he may establish this by oath (v. 10) or by producing the carcass (v. 12; cf. Amos 3.12; Gen. 31.39). 13–14a: (c) If the bailee borrowed an animal for his own use, since all the benefit is his, he assumes liability for whatever causes its death or injury unless its owner was with it, presumably because the owner would then be expected to protect it. 14b: This may introduce a fourth case: (d) where the bailee has hired the animal and any damage to it is covered by the fee. The Talmud identifies these four types of bailee as the unpaid and paid guardians, the borrower and the hirer, and holds that their different degrees of liability depend on the benefit each receives or expects from the arrangement (m. B. M. 7.8 and Gemara). 8: This covers the case when, in these or other circumstances, a man claims to have identified his possessions among another's (such as the bailee's); the matter is to be decided by an oracle, such as the Urim and Thummim (28.29–30; cf. Josh. 7.14–18; 1 Sam. 14.37–42). 9: Carried off, captured in war or a raid, as distinct from being stolen. 10: An oath before the LORD: The use of the Tetragrammaton suggests that this law was drawn from a different source than vv. 7–8, which use "God." 13: And it dies or is injured, rather, "and it is injured and dies" or "and it is injured or dies." 15: For whom the bride-price has not been paid: Betrothal normally consisted of paying a bride-price to a girl's father (Gen. 34.12; Deut. 20.7). Seduction of an unbetrothed virgin diminishes her chances of marriage and her father may never receive the bride-price (hence this law's inclusion with economic damages; if the girl is already betrothed the seduction counts as adultery, Deut. 22.23–27). Her seducer must make good on both losses. Contrast the case of rape, Deut. 22.28–29.

beyond economic value (vv. 12–14 n.), never does. 4–5: Damaging another's field or crops. V. 4 continues the theme of theft. The owner of the livestock must make restitution, either by replacing the crop or by giving the owner another field. For the impairment [rather: "from the best part"] of that field or vineyard: Whatever the quality of the damaged field or crops, the damages are assessed as if they were of the highest quality. 5: If a fire spreads accidentally, the one who started it must repay only the actual value of the loss.

6–14: When property is lost or damaged while in another's care, liability depends on the degree of responsibility implicitly assumed by the bailee. The comments below list the four main cases, followed by comments on other matters. 6–7: (a) In the case of small movables deposited for safekeeping, since the bailee is expected simply to keep them in his house without taking precautions beyond those he takes with his own property, if they are stolen he may clear himself with an oath (20.7 n.) that he did not misappropriate wife by payment of a bride-price. ¹⁶If her father refuses to give her to him, he must still weigh out silver in accordance with the bride-price for virgins.

¹⁸Whoever lies with a beast shall be put to death.

¹⁹Whoever sacrifices to a god other than the LORD alone shall be proscribed.^b

²⁰You shall not wrong a stranger or oppress him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt.

²¹You shall not ill-treat any widow or orphan. ²²If you do mistreat them, I will heed their outcry as soon as they cry out to Me, ²³and My anger shall blaze forth and I will put you to the sword, and your own wives shall become widows and your children orphans.

²⁴If you lend money to My people, to the poor among you, do not act toward them as a creditor; exact no interest from them. ²⁵If you take your neighbor's garment in pledge, you must return it to him before the sun sets; ²⁶it is his only clothing, the sole covering for his skin. In what else shall he sleep? Therefore, if he cries out to Me, I will pay heed, for I am compassionate.

²⁷You shall not revile God, nor put a curse upon a chieftain among your people.

²⁸You shall not ^cput off the skimming of the first yield of your vats.^c You shall give Me the first-born among your sons. ²⁹You shall do the same with your cattle and your flocks: seven days it^d shall remain with its mother; on the eighth day you shall give it to Me.

c-c Meaning of Heb. uncertain. d I.e., the male first-born.

22.17–23.19: Ethical and religious exhortations. 17: Sorceress, a practitioner of malevolent magic (usually a woman but males are banned in Deut. 18.10), which is punished severely because it was deemed dangerous and antisocial. The Bible does not deny the efficacy of magic, but bans it as rebellion against God (Deut. 18.9–15). 18: See Lev. 18.23; 20.15–16; Deut. 27.21. 19: Proscribed, executed. This law applies only to Israelites; only they are subject to the first commandment (Exod. 20.3) and punished for violating it. Cf. 18.11 n.; Deut. 4.19–20; 32.8–9. (The Canaanites are punished for abominable rituals, such as child sacrifice [Lev. 18.24–29; Deut. 12.31; 20.18], not for idolatry per se.)

20–26: Resident aliens (12.19 n., 43 n.), the poor, widows, and orphans are often mentioned together because, lacking social or family protection, they are vulnerable to exploitation. The duty of treating these groups fairly and compassionately is reiterated frequently (e.g., 20.10; 23.6, 9, 12; Lev. 19.33–34; 23.22; Deut. 1.16; 10.18–19; 24.17–22; 27.19). Concern for foreigners, not found in other ancient Near Eastern law collections, grows out of Israel's consciousness of being foreigners in Egypt. 24: Charitable loans to countrymen who have fallen on hard times. Lending to them is a moral obligation and must be done without further increasing the borrower's poverty by requiring interest, which could be ruinous (rates of 20 to 50 percent were common in the ancient Near East). Loans to foreigners were not subject to this rule, since visiting foreigners were normally businessmen. If they borrowed, it was for business and not to survive poverty. 22: I will heed their outcry, cf. v. 25. God is the ultimate patron of the powerless and He will punish those who mistreat them. This warning may imply that human government was not well equipped to protect their rights and that God was their only recourse. Cf. Deut. 24.13, 15. 23: Measure-for-measure punishment, a very common principle in the Bible. 25–26: Take . . . in pledge, rather, as noted by Rashi, "seize . . . as collateral." Creditors might legally seize property from defaulting debtors to induce them to repay. The poorest debtors might have nothing left but the cloaks they slept in (Amos 2.8; Job 22.6). In such circumstances, the present law subordinates the creditor's right to repayment to the welfare of the debtor. See also Deut. 24.6, 10–13, 17. You must return it to him before the sun sets each day, to sleep in, and he will return it to you in the morning. 27: Revile, cf. Lev. 24.10–16; Job 2.9. Chieftain, of a clan or tribe, the highest human authority prior to the monarchy. The two offenses covered by this v. are mentioned together in 1 Kings 21.10, 13, where "chieftain" is reasonably construed as applying to the king and the law is (falsely) enforced. 28–29: The first fruits of the soil and first-born animals (13.2) must be given to God, thereby acknowledging Him as the source of the land's fertility and the true owner of its produce. 28: The uncertain nouns refer to the first wine and oil, and possibly to the first grain as well (see also Num. 18.27; Deut. 22.9). Give Me the first-born among your sons, see 13.2, 12–13. Here no provision for redemption is mentioned. 29: On first-born animals, see 13.2, 12–13. This is a humane law, respecting the mother-child relationship among animals. See also 23.19;

³⁰You shall be holy people to Me: you must not eat flesh torn by beasts in the field; you shall cast it to the dogs.

23 You must not carry false rumors; you shall not join hands with the guilty to act as a malicious witness: ²You shall neither side with the mighty^a to do wrong—you shall not give perverse testimony in a dispute so as to pervert it in favor of the mighty^a—³nor shall you show deference to a poor man in his dispute.

⁴When you encounter your enemy's ox or ass wandering, you must take it back to him.

⁵When you see the ass of your enemy lying under its burden and would refrain from raising^b it, you must nevertheless raise it with him.

⁹You shall not oppress a stranger, for you know the feelings of the stranger, having yourselves been strangers in the land of Egypt.

Lev. 22.27–28; Deut. 22.6–7. 30: You shall be holy people to me: The prohibition of eating torn flesh, and the related one in Deut. 14.21, are addressed to priests in Lev. 22.8 and Ezek. 44.31. The present v. requires all Israelites to maintain a quasi-priestly level of holiness (cf. Lev. 19.2). You must not eat flesh torn by beasts: Only properly slaughtered animals may be eaten by Israelites. The word for "torn" (Heb "terefah") is the source of the postbiblical Heb term "taref" (in English [from Yiddish] "treif"), referring to any animal or food that does not conform to the Jewish dietary laws. Food that does conform is termed in postbiblical Heb "kasher," "fit," "proper" ("kosher" in Yiddish and English); the sys-

23.1–3: These vv. and vv. 6–8 concern judicial procedures. 1: Cf. 20.13; Lev. 19.11, 16; Deut. 19.15–21. 2: So as to pervert it in favor of the mighty: The ambiguity of the Heb permitted this to be construed as a separate, positive command meaning "follow the majority" in determining the law. As a jurisprudential principle this meant that, in general, judicial rulings and legal questions are decided not simply by invoking the literal interpretation of the Torah nor by invoking new revelations, but by flexible interpretation (loose construction) of the Torah, based on the circumstances, as determined by a majority of competent sages (b. Hul. 11a; y. Sanh. 4:2, p. 22a). 3: This v. and Lev. 19.15 presume that the Bible's concern for the poor will be internalized, and warn against taking it to an unjust extreme: It is wrong to favor the powerful in a trial, and also wrong to favor the poor. 4–5: One must assist others facing difficulty or possible economic loss (Deut. 22.1–4), even a personal enemy. 4: Ox or ass, the usual beasts of burden; according to the halakhah the obligation applies to any animal (m. B. K. 5.7; b. B. K. 54b). Wandering: Since much of the population was engaged in herding and animals were used for transport, it was common to come upon strays (cf. 1 Sam. 9.3, 20). 5: A pack animal might collapse or lose its balance under its load. The fastest way to raise it was for two people to lift the load simultaneously, one on each side of the animal. Talmudic sages hold that this commandment is meant to benefit the animal as well as its owner, citing it as the basis of the obligation to prevent animals from suffering (called "tza'ar ba'alei hayim") (b. B. M. 32a-b). 6–9: Another group of exhortations concerning the weak (cf. 22.20–26). 6: You must not rule unfairly against the poor in a trial. 7: The wrongdoer, the judge or witness who causes the death of the innocent. 8: Bribes, lit. "gifts" (Prov. 21.14; perhaps 17.8). This could refer to a payoff to influence judges (see Deut. 27.25; Isa. 5.23; Prov. 17.23) or to a fee charged by judges merely for hearing cases (Isa. 1.23; Mic. 3.11; cf. 7.3). For bribes blind the clear-sighted, see also Deut. 16.19. The explanation is in a poetic style resembling that of wisdom literature; cf. Eccl. 7.7. Upset the pleas of those who are in the right, i.e., influence the judge against the claims of the innocent party. 9: See 22.20. This v. may be repeated here because strangers, who lack kin to protect their rights, are at a disadvantage in courts composed of local or tribal elders (cf. Ps. 127.5). 10–19: The religious calendar and related requirements. Vv. 10–12 and 14–17 deal with requirements that occur at fixed intervals.

10–13: The sabbatical fallow year (cf. Lev. 25.1–7, 20–22) and the Sabbath day. In line with the theme of vv. 1–9, only their social and humanitarian goals are stated here; Exod. 16.23; 20.10; Lev. 25.2, 4 describe both as “a sabbath of the LORD,” indicating their religious significance. According to Deut. 15.1–3, debts were also remitted in the seventh year, possibly because debts commonly came due at harvest time, when farmers realized their income, and there would be no harvest in the seventh year. Neh. 10.32 mentions both fallowing and debt cancellation in the seventh year. 13: Be on guard . . . : This may be intended as a conclusion to all the preceding laws and exhortations (21.1–23.12) or to the mostly negative commandments in 22.17–23.12 (or just 23.1–12) before turning to the laws of worship in vv. 14–19. Or, in view of its position between v. 12 and the next clause, it may mean: Remember not only the Sabbath, but all of the first four commandments (20.2–11) and have nothing to do with any other god. Note the similar sequence of commands in Lev.

19.3–4 followed by laws about worship in vv. 5–8 (cf. Exod. 34.17 followed by vv. 18–23). Make no mention . . . : That is, do not invoke other gods in worship (cf. 20.21); instead, worship the LORD, as prescribed in vv. 14–19. This warning is especially pertinent to the agricultural festivals mentioned in those vv., since several non-Israelite deities mentioned in the Bible were closely associated with fertility. The Bible teaches that the LORD alone controls nature.

14–17: The festivals mark the two agricultural seasons. The Feast of Unleavened Bread and the Feast of the Harvest, respectively, precede and follow the spring grain harvest, while the Feast of Ingathering occurs in the fall when the new grain and wine are stored away for the winter. See also 34.18–26; Lev. ch 23; Num. 9.1–14; chs 28–29; Deut. 16.1–17. 15: In Jewish tradition the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see 12.14–20 n.), which commemorates the exodus, is called “zeman herutenu,” “the time of our freedom.” The Bible does not connect it to the harvest, which follows the festival, but in the popular mind eating primitive, unleavened bread was possibly perceived as a type of abstinence expressing anxiety about the success of the coming harvest. The month of Abib, see 13.4 n. Lev. 23.6 gives a specific date, the fifteenth of the month. As I have commanded you, see 12.14–20, 34, 39. None shall appear before Me empty-handed: All must bring offerings. This is emphasized in connection to this festival here since no new agricultural produce is ready. In Deut. 16.16–17 this obligation is explicitly applied to all three festivals. 16: The Feast of the Harvest, also called “the day of the first fruits” (of the grain harvest, Num. 28.26) and “the Feast of Weeks” (“Shavu’ot,” 34.22), because it is observed exactly seven weeks after the harvest begins (Lev. 23.15–21; Deut. 16.10). Because of the later tradition that this festival falls on the anniversary of the giving of the Torah, it is also known as “zeman matan toratenu,” “the time when our Torah was given.” Here it is an agricultural festival only, and is not connected to the previous Feast of Unleavened Bread. The Feast of Ingathering, at the end of the summer, celebrates the gathering of the processed grain and new wine into storage for the coming year, the goal of all the preceding agricultural activities. It is also known as “the Feast of Booths” (“Sukkot,” Lev. 23.34; Deut. 16.13), after the practice of dwelling in booths during the festival (Lev. 23.42; Neh. 8.14, 17), or simply “the Feast,” meaning “the festival par excellence” (1 Kings 8.2, 65; Ezek. 45.25; Neh. 8.14). In Jewish tradition it is also called “zeman simhatenu,” “the time of our rejoicing,” because it was the most joyous festival, coming at a time when the bounty of the harvest was manifest. At the end of the year, at the close of the agricultural year. Cf. 34.22. According to Lev. 23.34, 39 the festival begins on the fifteenth day of the seventh month (September–October). 17: All your males: The obligation is limited to males, probably because pregnant and nursing women could not travel to distant sanctuaries. Appear before . . . the LORD, visit a sanctuary in any of the country's temple cities (34.24; Deuteronomy 31.11; 1 Sam. 1.22; Isa. 1.12). Deut. later limited this to a single sanctuary (Deut. 12.4–14; 16.2–7; cf. 2 Kings 23.21–23; 2 Chron. ch 30). This clause probably originally read "see the face of the LORD," meaning to visit Him and pay Him homage at His sanctuary. The reading was probably changed to prevent the impression that God could literally be seen there. God's designation as the Sovereign (see also 34.23; cf. Zech. 14.16) emphasizes that He is Israel's king, and therefore His subjects must appear before Him regularly to acknowledge His sovereignty, just as subjects of a human suzerain were required to do. 18–19: These rules about offerings and food seem to apply both year-round and also specifically to the festivals just mentioned. 18: Leavened bread was forbidden with most sacrifices (12.8 n.), and several types of sacrifice must be consumed before morning (29.34; Lev. 7.15; 22.30), but 12.8, 10 apply both rules to the "pesah" sacrifice in particular, as does 34.25b to the second rule. The fat of [the] festal offering refers to the fat on the entrails of sacrificial animals; it is burnt as part of the sacrifice, and eating it is forbidden (Lev. 3.17; 7.23, 25; 17.6). 19: First fruits, see 22.28–29 n. Farmers probably brought first-fruit offerings at various times of the year, according to when each species was harvested, but in v. 16 the practice is mentioned particularly in connection with the Feast of the Harvest. See also Lev. 23.16–20; Num. 28.26; Deut. 26.1–11. You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk: Meat boiled in sour milk ("leben") was probably considered a delicacy, as it is by Arabs, since it is tastier and more tender than meat boiled in water. As noted by Philo (Virt. 143–144), Ibn Ezra, and Rashbam, this law is similar to the rules that forbid acts of insensitivity against animals such as slaughtering cattle on the same day as their young, sacrificing cattle in their first week, and taking a mother bird along with her fledglings or her eggs (22.29; Lev. 22.27–28; Deut. 22.6–7). It is therefore likely that it also applied to lambs and calves, kids being mentioned only because goats were the most common type of cattle or because their meat is most in need of tenderizing and flavoring. Jewish law construes this rule broadly, forbidding cooking or eating any domestic cattle with the milk or milk products of any domestic cattle. Supplementary regulations also prohibited eating fowl or game with milk and required the use of separate utensils for milk and meat, including their products (Maimonides, Hilkhot Ma'akhalot 'Asurot, ch 9). The association of this rule with the festivals is probably due to the fact that meat was eaten infrequently but was part of festival meals. Since in Israel goats begin to give birth in the fall, the Feast of Ingathering was probably the one at which kids were typically eaten.

23.20–33: Conclusion. The Book of the Covenant (see 24.7) concludes with an epilogue containing promises of the reward for fidelity to the preceding laws. This is comparable to ancient Near Eastern treaties, which conclude with promises and warnings about the consequences of fidelity to or betrayal of the treaty, though here (contrast Lev. ch 26 and Deut. ch 28) only rewards are described.

The final exhortations against idolatry (vv. 24, 32–33) hark back to the book's first law (20.19–20) and the beginning of the Decalogue (20.2–6). 20: Angel, lit. "messenger," "emissary" (from God); see 3.2 n. and 12.23 n. To guard you, cf. 1.4.19; 33.2; Gen. 24.7; 48.16. The place that I have made ready, the promised land. 21: The angel will instruct and chastise the people on God's behalf since God's Name is in him, that is, God's presence and authority are manifest in him (3.2 n.). Cf. Judg. 2.1–4. 22: A classic expression of a treaty relationship in which the parties agree that the enemy of one is the enemy of the other. Cf. Gen. 12.3; Ps. 139.21–22. 24–26: Cf. 34.11–17; Num. 33.52; Deut. 7.5, 25–26. Victors sometimes worshipped the gods of the nations they defeated, believing that they had abandoned their people to enable the victor to triumph (2 Chron. 25.14; cf. 1 Sam. 5.2). 24: Follow their practices, i.e. (according to Deut. 12.2–4, 29–31), adapt Canaanite rituals for worshipping the LORD. Israel may not even take Canaanite idols as booty (2 Sam. 5.21) but must tear them down: At Hazor archeologists found a statue with its head deliberately chopped off in the stratum likely destroyed by the incoming Israelites. Pillars, stones erected for a cultic purpose, whether plain or engraved with images of a deity or its symbols.

shall not bow down to their gods in worship or follow their practices, but shall tear them down and smash their pillars to bits. ²⁵You shall serve the LORD your God, and He will bless your bread and your water. And I will remove sickness from your midst. ²⁶No woman in your land shall miscarry or be barren. I will let you enjoy the full count of your days.

²⁷I will send forth My terror before you, and I will throw into panic all the people among whom you come, and I will make all your enemies turn tail^a before you. ²⁸I will send a plague^b ahead of you, and it shall drive out before you the Hivites, the Canaanites, and the Hittites. ²⁹I will not drive them out before you in a single year, lest the land become desolate and the wild beasts multiply to your hurt. ³⁰I will drive them out before you little by little, until you have increased and possess the land. ³¹I will set your borders from the Sea of Reeds to the Sea of Philistia, and from the wilderness to the Euphrates; for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hands, and you will drive them out before you. ³²You shall make no covenant with them and their gods. ³³They shall not remain in your land, lest they cause you to sin against Me; for you will serve their gods—and it will prove a snare to you.

Apparently they were thought to embody the presence of a deity, either by representing it or serving as its residence (cf. Gen. 28.16–22; 2 Kings 3.2; 10.27). Sacrifices were offered to them and they were treated like idols. Although they were sometimes used in the worship of the Lord (Gen. 28.16–22; 21.13; 35.14; cf. Isa. 19.19; Hos. 3.4), Deut. 16.22 bans even such use because of their associations with idolatry. 25–26: These are rewards typically promised in ancient treaties; see also Lev. 26.3–10; Deut. 11.13–15, 21; 28.1–13. 27: My terror, a divinely induced panic, here reified as in Gen. 35.5; 1 Sam. 14.15; Isa. 24.17; Jer. 48.44. Alternatively, in view of the following verb, “My terror” might refer to God’s fearsome aura, comparable to the fearsome aura of Mesopotamian gods and kings which overwhelms their enemies; cf. Isa. 2.10, 19, 21. Throw into panic, rather, “rout” (14.24; Deut. 7.23; Josh. 10.10; Judg. 4.15; 1 Sam. 7.10; Esth. 9.24). 28: Plague, better, “hornets” or “wasps,” meaning either that ferocious swarms of wasps will chase the Canaanites or that God will induce a panic or frenzy like that caused by wasps and cause the Canaanites to flee.

31: Starting at a line running from the Sea of Reeds (here the Gulf of Eilat, 13.18 n.) to the Sea of Philistia (the Mediterranean off the coast of Philistia—roughly the Gaza Strip today), Israel’s territory will extend from the (Sinai-Negev) wilderness in the south to the Euphrates in the northeast (see also Gen. 15.18; Deut. 1.7; 11.24; Josh. 1.4); other passages in the Torah place the northern boundary in Lebanon’s Bekaa Valley in Lebanon (Num. 13.21; 34.8). You will drive them out, see also 33.2; 34.11 (cf. Lev. 18.25b, 28; Num. 33.52–55; Josh. 24.12, 18; Judg. 6.9). According to Deut. 7.2, 16; 20.15–18, however, the Canaanites are to be killed. Jewish exegesis resolves the inconsistency by holding that the Canaanites were given the option of fighting, emigrating, or remaining in the land as forced laborers, provided they accept the seven Noahide laws (Gen. 9.8–17 n.) (Maimonides, Hilkhot Melakhim 6.5). Historically speaking, there was probably no policy of either expulsion or extermination. Archeological evidence and passages such as Josh. 15.63; 16.10; 17.12–13; Judg. 1.19, 27–36; 1 Kings 9.20–21 indicate that Canaanites remained in the land. Driving out or killing the Canaanites are both probably late, theoretical reconstructions. 32: Covenant, conditions under which the Canaanites or their idolatry could remain. 33: Lest they cause you to sin . . ., cf. 34.15–16; Deut. 7.3–4. According to Deut. 20.18 the danger is that the Canaanites would influence Israelites to adopt their abhorrent rites, such as child sacrifice and various occult practices (Deut. 12.31; 18.9–12). According to Genesis and Leviticus, God will expel the Canaanites because of immorality, occult practices, and child sacrifice (see Gen. 9.22–27; 15.16; 19.4–5; Lev. chs 18, 20).

24.1–18: The covenant ceremony. The covenant proposed in 19.4–6 is formally established when Moses reads its terms to the people in the course of a blood rite in which they ratify its terms, followed by a sacrificial meal for the leaders in the presence of God. The sequence of events is hard to follow because of the interweaving of conflicting versions of the narrative (see chs 19–24, introductory comment), though the ch as a whole is organized to suggest that different groups, according to their status, ascended the mountain to different levels. Vv. 1–2 (Come up . . .) interrupt the preceding narrative, since near the LORD; but the others shall not come near, nor shall the people come up with him."

³Moses went and repeated to the people all the commands of the LORD and all the rules; and all the people answered with one voice, saying, "All the things that the LORD has commanded we will do!" ⁴Moses then wrote down all the commands of the LORD.

Early in the morning, he set up an altar at the foot of the mountain, with twelve pillars for the twelve tribes of Israel. ⁵He designated some young men among the Israelites, and they offered burnt offerings and sacrificed bulls as offerings of well-being to the LORD. ⁶Moses took one part of the blood and put it in basins, and the other part of the blood he dashed against the altar. ⁷Then he took the record of the covenant and read it aloud to the people. And they said, "All that the LORD has spoken we will faithfully do!" ⁸Moses took the blood and dashed it on the people and said, "This is the blood of the covenant that the LORD now makes with you concerning all these commands."

⁹Then Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel ascended; ¹⁰and they saw the God of a-a Lit. "we will do and obey."

20.18 shows that Moses was already on the mountain when he received the laws of 20.19–23.33. The immediate sequel to that narrative is 24.3–8, followed by vv. 12–15a and 18b (from E). Vv. 1–2 and 9–11, in which Moses is called up to God, are the sequel to 19.25; they are from J, while 15b–18a—the sequel of 19.1–2—are from P. There are differences in detail between these groups of vv. In J, Moses is to be accompanied part way by the priests and elders (vv. 1–2, 9); in E he is apparently accompanied part way by Joshua (13–14; cf. 32.17) but leaves the elders, Aaron and Hur, behind; while in P (vv. 15b–18a) he seems not to be accompanied at any time. J does not tell of any lawgiving; to it the event at Sinai was a visual encounter with God, experienced in differing degrees by the people, the leaders, and Moses, and the covenant was established by a meal (24.1–2, 9–11; cf. 19.11, 18, 21). E, preserved more fully, tells of a primarily auditory experience, the establishment of the covenant by a blood rite and ratification of the "Book of the Covenant," and Moses' ascent to receive the tablets of the Decalogue (19.9, 16, 19; chs 20–23; 24.3–8, 12–15a). To P the event consisted primarily of Moses going up on the mountain to receive the instructions for constructing the Tabernacle (chs 25–31) in which God will dwell among the Israelites and give Moses laws, and where they will worship Him; He also gave Moses the "Pact" to put in the Ark (25.8, 22; 29.38–46; 31.18). 1–2: The summons is answered, and this source is continued in vv. 9–11. Nadab and Abihu, 6.23 n. For the various zones of permitted access cf. 19.12, 24. 3: Repeated to the people, as they had requested in 20.16 and as God had commanded in 21.1. After hearing the specific terms of the covenant, the people repeat the assent they first expressed in 19.8. All the commands of the LORD, 20.19–23.33. All the people answered with one voice, the slightly redundant language emphasizes the unanimity of their assent, as in 19.8. We will do, as they promised in 20.16. 4: Once the people assent to the terms of the covenant, Moses prepares for a ceremony formally establishing it. In the ceremony the altar (cf. 20.21) and twelve pillars will represent, respectively, God and Israel. These pillars are not cultic as in 23.24.

5: Young men, perhaps the first-borns (Rashi; Targum) assisting Moses. Apparently E, like P (28.1), assumes that the Aaronide priestly order has not yet been established (J, in vv. 1, 9 and 19.22, assumes otherwise). Priests' assistants are called "young men" in 1 Sam. 2.13–18; 3.1. Burnt offerings . . . offerings of well-being, 18.12 n.

6–8: Dashing the blood on the altar and on the people (v. 8) joins God and Israel in the covenant. Here the altar represents God, as in 20.21; cf. Ps. 42.3–4; 1 Kings 8.22, 31, 54; 2 Kings 18.22; Isa. 19.19 (cf. Gen. 15.17, where a torch and smoking oven represent God in a covenant ceremony). Establishing a covenant by the parties sharing blood, each other's or that of an animal, is attested in many places; Aeschylus describes a covenant in which the parties dip their hands in the blood of a slaughtered animal (Aeschylus, Seven Against Thebes, 43–48). 7: Record, i.e., a scroll or a stone inscription (cf. Deut. 27.2–3, 8), containing, apparently, 20.19–23.33. On the basis of this phrase, the legal collection of 20.19–23.33 is called the Book of the Covenant. We will faithfully do: The most literal translation would be "we will do and listen," and the midrash inferred from this that the people trusted God so thoroughly that they committed themselves to obeying His commands before they even heard their contents (b. Shab. 88a). 8: On the people, perhaps, on the pillars representing the people. 9: See v. 1. 10: For this unique occasion the people's leaders and representatives are granted a visual experience of God. Later Jewish writers, who believed that God is not visible, held that the experience was not literally visual but was either an intellectual perception (Maimonides, Guide, 1.4) or a prophetic vision such as those in Isa. 6.1 and Ezek. ch 1 (Ibn Ezra). The Bible does not deny that God is visible, but the text is reticent about describing Him. By focusing on what was under His feet, it seems to suggest that the leaders did not see God directly but from below, through a transparent sapphire- (or rather, lapis-lazuli-) colored pavement. Cf. Ezek. 1.26–28; 10.1–2. This lapis-lazuli pavement is the floor of God’s palace, and also explains why the sky is blue. 11: He did not raise His hand: Despite their seeing God, no harm befell them; see 3.6 n. They ate and drank: A well-attested way of celebrating the establishment of a covenant; see Gen. 26.28–30; 31.54; and the ceremony reaffirming the covenant in Deut. 27.1–8; cf. the parallelism in Obad. 7 and Ps. 41.10. In covenants between humans both parties share the meal. Here, one of the parties, God, does not eat, and Moses and the leaders merely eat in His presence. 12: In addition to the Book of the Covenant (v. 7), the Israelites would receive two tablets containing the Decalogue inscribed by God Himself (31.18; 32.16) as a monument to their revelation at Sinai. Stone was normally used only for permanent inscriptions, such as royal and ceremonial inscriptions, boundary inscriptions, and treaties. The tablets may have resembled a square stone tablet containing a 7th-century BCE Aramaic decree. Two such tablets, 15 or 16 inches square and inscribed on both sides (like the Decalogue, 32.16), could have contained the entire Decalogue. This shape is consistent with Jewish tradition and early Christian art, which conceived of the tablets as rectangular. The tablets with curved tops, familiar today, reflect later Roman practice, and were first introduced in Christian art around the 11th century. With the teachings and commandments, according to 34.28, the Decalogue. The Heb can also be construed as “and the teachings and commandments,” which midrashic exegesis took to mean the rest of the written Torah (or of the Bible) plus the Oral Torah; in other words, all were given to Moses at Mount Sinai (b. Ber. 5a; Lekah Tov; Midrash HaGadol). 13: Joshua (17.9 n.) apparently accompanied Moses part way (see v. 14; cf. 32.17). 14: Aaron and Hur, 17.10 n. They are to perform Moses’ duties in his absence (18.16a). 15: The cloud, in which God’s Presence is manifest; see 13.21 n., 22 n. 16: The Presence of the LORD, 16.6–7 n. This Presence is the main manifestation of the divine in Priestly thought. Abode on Mount Sinai: The main thrust of the instructions in chs 25–32 is the construction of the Tabernacle (Heb “mishkan,” lit. “abode”) to which God will transfer His abode (40.34–38) and accompany Israel; see 25.8, where “dwell” should be rendered “abide” to indicate that it is the same Heb verb (sh-k-n) as here. The Tabernacle, in other words, is essentially a portable Mount Sinai, the locus of God’s presence. 17: On the appearance of God’s Presence, see 16.6–7 n.

¹²The LORD said to Moses, “Come up to Me on the mountain and wait there, and I will give you the stone tablets with the teachings and commandments which I have inscribed to instruct them.”¹³ So Moses and his attendant Joshua arose, and Moses ascended the mountain of God.¹⁴ To the elders he had said, “Wait here for us until we return to you. You have Aaron and Hur with you; let anyone who has a legal matter approach them.”

25.1–31.17: Instructions for building the Tabernacle (see diagram, p. 164) and inaugurating the priesthood. The sanctuary will enable God to abide among the Israelites henceforth, and will be the place from which He issues commands for Israel (25.22 n.). It will also be the place of sacrificial worship (v. 30; 29.38–42; Lev. chs 1–7), where the priests officiate daily (29.9–12, 21, 29); but its main purpose is for the benefit of Israel, that they may experience God's guiding presence, and not for the benefit of God, who has no need for sacrifice (see also 29.42b-46 n.). In contrast, an important purpose of sanctuaries in polytheistic religions was to serve as places where worshippers feed the gods. Like Mount Sinai (19.9b-13 n.), the sanctuary will have three carefully delimited zones of holiness and restricted access. They are, in descending order of holiness: (a) the "Holy of Holies," where the Ark and Tablets of the Covenant are kept, (b) its antechamber, "the Holy Place"—both of these inside the Tent of Meeting, the Tabernacle proper—and (c) the surrounding courtyard. Nonpriests will be admitted only to the courtyard (c); the Holy Place (b) will be accessible only to priests and Moses; and the Holy of Holies (a) only to the High Priest, and that only on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16.2; whether Moses may enter the Holy of Holies is unclear; see below, 25.22 n.). In all cases, access will be limited to those who are ritually pure (cf. Lev. 12.4; Num. 5.3; 2 Chron. 23.19). These restrictions will protect the Ark, above which God's Presence is situated

(25.22 n.), from impurity so that the Tabernacle will remain fit for His Presence (Lev. 15.31; 20.3). The materials used in constructing the Tabernacle, its paraphernalia, and the priestly vestments reflect its varying levels of holiness: the closer to the Ark and the Holy of Holies, the more precious the materials. For example, all the furniture in the Tent of Meeting is made of gold or wood overlaid with gold, while the altar and laver outside in the courtyard are overlaid or made with bronze; the fabric directly covering the Tent of Meeting is made of fine twisted linen and blue, purple, and crimson yarns, while the layers of fabric above that one are made of less precious fabrics; the outer vestments of Aaron, who ministers inside the Tent, are made of gold thread, blue, purple, and crimson yarns and fine twisted linen, while the garments of the other priests, who officiate only in the courtyard, are made mostly of linen. The instructions for the Tabernacle fall into two main sections: The Tabernacle structure and its contents (25.10–27.19) and its activities (27.20–30.38). These are preceded by an introduction (25.1–9) and followed by two paragraphs dealing with the builders of the Tabernacle (31.1–11) and suspending its construction on Sabbaths (31.12–17). These instructions, and the narrative of their implementation in chs 35–40, are drawn from the Priestly source (P), with some additions from the Holiness Collection (H; see comments on Lev. chs 17–26). In many respects they echo the Priestly account of creation in Gen. 1.1–2.4a: The instructions are divided into seven separate divine commands, culminating in the Sabbath (see 25.1; 30.11, 17, 22, 34; 31.1, 12), the lampstand holds seven candles (25.37), Aaron wears seven sacrificial vestments (28.1–39), the account of the building of the Tabernacle culminates in several allusions to the creation account (compare 39.32 to Gen. 2.1, 3; 39.43 to Gen. 1.31; and 40.33 to Gen. 2.2), and the Tabernacle is completed on New Year's day (40.17). See comments to 39.32, 43; 40.16, 33. The Priestly Tabernacle instructions are an unexpected sequel to 24.12–18, according to which Moses was summoned to receive the stone tablets (24.12, E) which the present order of the text delays for seven chs until 31.18. In the present sequence it seems that God's first order of business was to arrange for the housing of the tablets (the role of the Tabernacle according to 25.10–16 n.; 38.21), but Rashi holds that the Tabernacle instructions were actually not given until after the entire golden calf episode was concluded (Rashi at 31.18, following Tanh. Ki Tissa 31). For a likely reason for the present sequence, see the introductory comments to 31.18–34.35. To modern readers, the quantity of detail of this section and much of the end of Exodus, which repeats, with minor variations, the execution of these commands, seems excessive. The key is found in 25.8, "And let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them." The indwelling of God, along with the blessing and protection that this offers, is crucial for the well-being of the community; thus it is crucial to construct a "house" to exact divine specifications. There is significant scholarly debate concerning the existence of the Tabernacle. Some believe that some form of the First Temple is being described, and that it is historically retrojected into the period of the wanderings to give it legitimacy. Others note that aspects of the Tabernacle's architecture are paralleled in second millennium Egypt and Syria (Mari) and that portable shrines are attested among Arab tribes, and suggest that at least in broad strokes, the Tabernacle here reflects a recollection of a pre-monarchic sanctuary, perhaps one that antedates the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan.

25.1–9: Introduction. 1: The LORD spoke to Moses, while he was on Mount Sinai (24.18). For the Priestly author, the instructions for the Tabernacle, rather than laws, are given on Sinai. 2: Gifts . . . from every person whose heart so moves him: The Tabernacle is to be built entirely of voluntary gifts from the entire community. 3: Gold, silver, and copper, for the Tabernacle paraphernalia and the priestly vestments. The metal of which each object is made will depend on its proximity to the Holy of Holies. Copper, more likely bronze. 4–5: Blue, purple, and crimson yarns, fine linen, goats' hair, tanned ram skins, dolphin skins, the finest fabrics, for the Tabernacle curtains, hangings, and covers, and the priests' vestments. As with the metals, these are listed in descending order of quality, and the material of which an item is made depends on its proximity to the Holy of Holies. Blue, purple, bluish- and reddish-purple colors manufactured from fluid obtained from the murex snails found in abundance along the Mediterranean coast north of Acco, also called Acre (the ancient name of the region, "Phoenicia," is related to Greek "phoinix," "purple," "crimson"). Dolphin skins, more likely, dyed sheep or goat leather. Acacia wood, for the frame of the Tabernacle, its furniture and carrying-poles. 8: Sanctuary: The sanctuary is referred to by three main terms, each expressing different aspects of it: "mikdash" ("sanctuary"), lit. "holy place," "sanctum," referring to its sacred dimension; "mishkan" ("Tabernacle"), lit. "abode," referring to it as God's dwelling (v. 9 and frequently); and "ohel mo'ed" ("Tent of Meeting"), referring to it as an oracle site, the place where God would communicate with Moses (29.42–43; 30.6, 36; cf. 33.7–11; 25.22 n.; cf. 29.46 n.). "Sanctuary" refers to the entire compound described below—the covered structure and the courtyard surrounding it. "Tabernacle" and "Tent of Meeting" sometimes refer to the entire compound and at other times only the covered structure (see also 26.1; 27.19). That I may dwell among them, rather, "that I may abide among them," the same verb as that used in 24.16. This verb and the Heb word for Tabernacle ("mishkan"; see above) are from the same root, as is "Shekhinah," the term for the divine Presence in later Jewish tradition. 9: God showed Moses either "blueprints," pictures, or a model of the Tabernacle. This information is repeated in connection with the table and the lampstand, the Tabernacle structure, and the sacrificial altar and its utensils (v. 40; 26.30; 27.8; Num. 8.4; cf. 1 Chron. 28.11–19; Ezek. chs 40–42). The Tabernacle is not to be a product of human creativity but must conform exactly to divine specifications ("One cannot ap-

25.10–27.19: The Tabernacle structure and its contents.

25.10–49: The furnishings of the building. The furnishings of both chambers of the Tabernacle building—the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place—are to be of solid gold or overlaid with gold. 10–16: The Ark. The instructions begin with the Ark (Heb “aron,” lit. “chest”). The Ark will hold the “Pact,” the two tablets containing the Decalogue (31.18). For that reason it will be placed in the innermost chamber of the Tabernacle, the “Holy of Holies” (meaning “the holiest” chamber; 26.31–44). As the container of the Pact, the Ark is the heart of the Tabernacle, which is called “the Tabernacle [lit. the Abode] of the Pact” in 38.21, as if the main purpose of the Tabernacle is to serve as the housing for the Pact (Rashbam at v. 10). It is significant that the heart of the sanctuary is a symbol of God’s law, rather than an image as was the case in non-Israelite sanctuaries. In postbiblical Judaism the Torah scroll, housed in the Holy Ark (see below) and carried in procession around the synagogue, came to symbolize God’s Presence, and the study of the Torah’s laws and teachings became one of the primary means of access to Him. (Nowadays the term “Ark,” more fully “Holy Ark” [“aron kodesh”), is used of the wall cabinet that houses the Torah scrolls in the synagogue.) 10: Cubits: The Ark’s dimensions were 1.25 m long, .75 m wide, and .75 m high (3.75 ft by 2.25 ft by 2.25 ft). 16: Cf. 1 Kings 8.9.

25.17–22: The Ark cover. The Ark is to be covered with a lid made of gold hammered into the shape of two cherubs standing on a base. Cherubs are not the chubby, naked, winged boys known from medieval art, but winged composite creatures (cf. Ezek. 1.6–11; 10.14–22). Various types of such creatures are known from ancient Near Eastern art, such as winged sphinxes, with lions’ bodies, eagles’ wings, and human faces (sometimes with a second, animal face), and winged anthropoids with eagles’ wings and birds’ heads. Such creatures, frequently in pairs, often serve as protective spirits for kings, their palaces and thrones. Images of royal thrones with cherubs sculpted on their sides, several of which were found in Canaan and ancient Israel, are consistent with v. 22, which indicates that God would be present between the cherubs. They suggest that the Ark cover represented God’s throne (cf. 1 Sam. 4.4; 2 Sam. 6.2; 2 Kings 19.15; Pss. 80.2; 99.1) and the Ark itself His footstool. The symbolism thus represents God as King and the Holy of Holies as the literal seat of divine government. This symbolism is consistent with the fact that architecturally the Tabernacle resembles a royal residence, particularly the royal tent in Egyptian military camps. It also is similar in structure to temples of surrounding nations. 20: Unlike the cherubs flanking royal thrones, and the free-standing cherubs in Solomon’s Temple (1 Kings 6.23–27), the Tabernacle cherubs face each other. 21: Treaties were often stored in sanctuaries in the presence of the deities who would enforce their observance. In some cases treaties and other documents are explicitly said to be placed beneath the deity’s feet; this is consistent with the conception of the Ark as God’s footstool. 22: See 29.42–43; 30.36; Num. 7.89; 17.19; and cf. Lev. 16.2, 13. Appropriately, the place where the first revelation is stored will serve as the site of future revelations. The text expresses this by paronomasia (punning),

³¹You shall make a lampstand of pure gold; the lampstand shall be made of hammered work; its base and its shaft, its cups, calyxes, and petals shall be of one piece. ³²Six branches shall issue from its sides; three branches from one side of the lampstand and three branches from the other side of the lampstand. ³³On one branch there shall be three cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals, and on the next branch there shall be three cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals; so for all six branches issuing from the lampstand. ³⁴And on the lampstand itself there shall be four cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals: ³⁵a calyx, of one piece with it, under a pair of branches; and a calyx, of one piece with it, under the second pair of branches, and a calyx, of one piece with it, under the last pair of branches; so for all six branches issuing from the lampstand. ³⁶Their calyxes and their stems shall be of one piece with it, the whole of it a single hammered piece of pure gold. ³⁷Make its seven lamps—the lamps shall be so mounted as to give the light on its front side—³⁸and its tongs and fire pans of pure gold. ³⁹It shall be made, with all these furnishings, out of a talent of pure gold. ⁴⁰Note well, and follow the patterns for them that are being shown you on the mountain.

since the Heb words for "Pact" ("edut") and "meet" ("no'ad") sound alike (though they are from different roots), as if to say that the site of the Pact ("edut") is the site of meeting ("no'ad"). Whether Moses enters the Holy of Holies or listens to God from the Holy Place (Sforno at Lev. 1.1) is debated.

25.23–40: The table and lampstand. The furnishings of the an-techamber, the Holy Place.

23–30: The table was to hold the "bread of display," that is, "the Bread of the (Divine) Presence" (also called "shewbread"), explained as bread placed "before (that is, in the presence of) God." It consisted of twelve loaves placed on the table every Sabbath and replaced a week later and then eaten by the priests (see Lev. 24.5–9; cf. Num. 4.7; 1 Sam.

21.4–7; 1 Chron. 9.32). Ancient Near Eastern art often shows tables holding gifts of food before enthroned royalty and deities. In Mesopotamian ritual, curtains were drawn around the image of the deity and the table when sacrificial food was brought in for the deity to eat. It is significant that here the table is in the antechamber, separated from the Holy of Holies by the curtain (26.31–35). This partition between God and the Table makes it clear that the bread of display is not actually consumed by God but is only a token gift—this is also underlined by the fact that it was eaten by priests. That its purpose was display, not consumption, is also indicated by the fact that it is replaced weekly, not daily as elsewhere in the ancient Near East. See also vv. 31–40 n. and 30.9 n. 31–40: The lampstand ("menorah") for illuminating the interior of the Holy Place each night (27.20–21). Its location in the antechamber indicates that the light is for the benefit of the officiating priests, not God. With its central shaft and three branches emerging from each side it resembled a stylized tree, possibly symbolizing fertility or the sustenance of life. It held seven lamps (v. 37), i.e., cups to hold the oil and wicks (it is debated whether six of these were on the branches or all seven were on the central shaft). The seven-branched lampstand later became a popular Jewish symbol in synagogues, tombs, and amulets, and today it is a symbol of the State of Israel. According to the Talmud it is forbidden to make exact replicas of the menorah except for the Tabernacle or the Temple (b. Rosin Hash. 24a–b); hence synagogue menorahs have six or eight branches instead of seven, although this prohibition is not always observed. 40: Cf. v. 9 n.

26 As for the Tabernacle,^a make it of ten strips of cloth; make these of fine twisted linen, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, with a design of cherubim worked into them. ²The length of each cloth shall be twenty-eight cubits, and the width of each cloth shall be four cubits, all the cloths to have the same measurements. ³Five of the cloths shall be joined to one another, and the other five cloths shall be joined to one another. ⁴Make loops of blue wool on the edge of the outermost cloth of the one set; and do likewise on the edge of the outermost cloth of the other set: ⁵make fifty loops on the one cloth, and fifty loops on the edge of the end cloth of the other set, the loops to be opposite one another. ⁶And make fifty gold clasps, and couple the cloths to one another with the clasps, so that the Tabernacle becomes one whole.

⁷You shall then make cloths of goats' hair for a tent over the Tabernacle; make the cloths eleven in number. ⁸The length of each cloth shall be thirty cubits, and the width of each cloth shall be four cubits, the eleven cloths to have the same measurements. ⁹Join five of the cloths by themselves, and the other six cloths by themselves; and fold over the sixth cloth at the front of the tent. ¹⁰Make fifty loops on the edge of the outermost cloth of the one set, and fifty loops on the edge of the cloth of the other set. ¹¹Make fifty copper clasps, and fit the clasps into the loops, and couple the tent together so that it becomes one whole. ¹²As for the overlapping excess of the cloths of the tent, the extra half-cloth shall overlap the back of the Tabernacle, ¹³while the extra cubit at either end of each length of tent cloth shall hang down to the bottom of the two sides of the Tabernacle and cover it. ¹⁴And make for the tent a covering of tanned ram skins, and a covering of dolphin skins above.

¹⁵You shall make the planks for the Tabernacle of acacia wood, upright. ¹⁶The length of each plank shall be ten cubits and the width of each plank a cubit and a half. ¹⁷Each plank shall have two tenons, parallel^b to each other; do the same with all the planks of the Tabernacle. ¹⁸Of the planks of the Tabernacle, make twenty planks on the south^c side: ¹⁹making forty silver sockets under the twenty planks, two sockets under the one plank for its two tenons and two sockets under each following plank for its two tenons; ²⁰and for the other side wall of the Tabernacle, on the north side, twenty planks, ²¹with their forty silver sockets, two

26.1–37: The Tabernacle structure. The Holy of Holies and the Holy Place will be housed in a structure of gold-overlaid wood roofed with four layers of material. 1–6: The Tabernacle (lit. “abode”): Here, apparently, this term means the lowest, innermost layer of the covers (cf. v. 6); it is so called because as the layer closest to the Ark it is the “abode” proper (Rashbam). It is to be made of the finest materials: fine twisted linen, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, with a design of cherubim worked into them, corresponding to the cherubs on the Ark cover. Because it is contiguous with the Holy of Holies and the Holy Place, the clasps holding its sections together are to be made of gold. 7–13: The tent over the Tabernacle, the second layer, is to be made of less precious material, goats' hair, and its clasps are to be made of copper (rather, bronze; v. 11). 14: The upper layer is to be made of the least expensive of the Tabernacle materials, tanned ram skins and “dolphin skins” (see 25.5 n.). These constitute two separate layers (39.34), making four in all. 15–30: The wooden structure, made of vertical planks of gold-overlaid acacia wood stabilized by silver sockets, or bases, and gold-overlaid wooden bars held in place by gold rings. The structure, with its opening facing east, was 30 cubits (15 m, 45 ft) long and 10 cubits (5 m, 15 ft) high and wide (see 25.10 n.). Silver is probably chosen for the sockets despite the fact that the planks are inside the Tabernacle because gold is not strong enough to support the planks. 30: See 25.9 n. 31–35: The curtain (“parokhet”) for the Holy of Holies, again made of the finest materials and decorated with cherubs because of its contiguity with the Holy of Holies (cf. vv. 1–6 n.). The same Heb term is now used for the curtain that covers the Holy Ark in synagogues. The blue, purple, and crimson yarns must have been woollen since only wool could be dyed successfully in ancient times. Hence the curtain, which also contained linen, consisted of a combination of

sockets under the one plank and two sockets under each following plank.²² And for the rear of the Tabernacle, to the west, make six planks;²³ and make two planks for the corners of the Tabernacle at the rear.²⁴ They shall match at the bottom, and terminate alike at the top inside one ring;²⁵ thus shall it be with both of them: they shall form the two corners.²⁵ Thus there shall be eight planks with their sockets of silver: sixteen sockets, two sockets under the first plank, and two sockets under each of the other planks.

³⁶You shall make a screen for the entrance of the Tent, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and fine twisted linen, done in embroidery.³⁷ Make five posts of acacia wood for the screen and overlay them with gold—their hooks being of gold—and cast for them five sockets of copper.

27 You shall make the altar of acacia wood, five cubits long and five cubits wide—the altar is to be fabrics that the laity are forbidden to wear (Lev. 19.19; Deut. 22.11) precisely because it is reserved for sacred use. See also 28.6, 15.

33: Under the clasps, the clasps holding together the two halves of the innermost cover (v. 6). Since this cover is 40 cubits (20 m, 60 ft) from front to back (including the part that hangs over the back of the structure), the clasps, and hence the curtain, are placed 20

cubits (10 m, 30 ft) from the entrance. Since the entire structure is 30 cubits (15 m, 45 ft) from front to back, the Holy Place occupies its eastern two-thirds and the Holy of Holies the westernmost third. The latter, then, is a perfect cube, 10 cubits (5 m, 15 ft) wide, long, and tall. 35: On the location of the table and the lampstand outside the curtain, see 25.23–30 n.; 25.31–40 n. 36–37: The screen for the entrance of the Tent (here Tent means the Tabernacle structure). It is made of the same fine materials as the “parokhet” but, since it is not contiguous with the Holy of Holies, it is not adorned with cherubs, its sockets are of a less valuable metal (copper [bronze] rather than silver), and it is done in embroidery—apparently a less sophisticated weave than that used for the “parokhet.”

27.1–19: The altar and the courtyard. Just as chs 25–26 first described the main contents of the Tabernacle and then the Tabernacle structure, the text now describes the most important object placed in the courtyard—the altar—and then the courtyard itself. Since all of this is outside the Tabernacle structure, it is mostly made of less precious materials: The altar, its utensils, and the posts and sockets supporting the courtyard wall are made of bronze and bronzed wood, and the hangings are made of fine twisted linen but without blue, purple, or crimson. 1–8: The altar: This is the main altar on which animal and grain offerings were burnt and wine offerings (libations) were poured. It is called “the altar of burnt offering” (30.28), after the type of offering made on it twice daily (29.38–43)—though in fact it is used for all types of offering (Lev. chs 1–7). It is also called “the copper [rather, bronze] altar” (38.30). Sacrifice is regarded as an expression of honor and gratitude and a means of purification and expiation, not a way of feeding God; God derives from it only the “pleasing odor” (29.18, 25, 41; Lev. 1.9 n.), an expression perhaps square—and three cubits high. ²Make its horns on the four corners, the horns to be of one piece with it; and overlay it with copper. ³Make the pails for removing its ashes, as well as its scrapers, basins, flesh hooks, and fire pans—make all its utensils of copper. ⁴Make for it a grating of meshwork in copper; and on the mesh make four copper rings at its four corners. ⁵Set the mesh below, under the ledge of the altar, so that it extends to the middle of the altar. ⁶And make poles for the altar, poles of acacia wood, and overlay them with copper. ⁷The poles shall be inserted into the rings, so that the poles remain on the two sides of the altar when it is carried. ⁸Make it hollow, of boards. As you were shown on the mountain, so shall they be made.

⁹You shall make the enclosure of the Tabernacle:

On the south side,^a a hundred cubits of hangings of fine twisted linen for the length of the enclosure on that side—¹⁰with its twenty posts and their twenty sockets of copper, the hooks and bands of the posts to be of silver.

¹¹Again a hundred cubits of hangings for its length along the north side—with its twenty posts and their twenty sockets of copper, the hooks and bands of the posts to be of silver.

¹⁷All the posts round the enclosure shall be banded with silver and their hooks shall be of silver; their sockets shall be of copper.

meant literally or perhaps to indicate God's pleasure at the worshipper's devotion. That the sacrificial altar is located outside the Tabernacle building, and that none of the sacrifices are ever taken inside where God's presence abides, nicely expresses the idea that the sacrifices are not His food (cf. 25.23–30 n., 31–40 n.; 30.9 n.).

2: Horns, horn-like projections pointing vertically at the upper corners of the altar (see also 30.2–3). Horned altars have been found by archeologists at several sites in Israel and elsewhere. They are an essential part of the altar: The blood of the "sin offering" is daubed on them (29.12; Lev. 4.29–30), and those seeking asylum at the altar (21.13–14 n.) would grasp them (1 Kings 1.50; 2.28). Their significance is not known, though Ps. 118.27 mentions tying sacrifices to them.

8: Hollow: Unlike the case of the incense altar (30.3), no top is mentioned here, indicating that there was an open space inside the four walls of this altar. It may, then, have resembled in a general way the pit altars used by the Samaritans. It would have been very difficult, however, for the priests to reach down over the sides (which were 3 cubits = 1.5 m, 4.5 ft high [v. 1]) to handle the sacrifice at the bottom of such an open space, and the heat of the sacrificial fire would probably have damaged the bronzed wooden structure. It is traditionally assumed that, in keeping with the requirement of 20.21, the empty space was filled with earth each time the Israelites encamped, producing an earthen altar on which the sacrifices would be burnt (Tg. Jon.; Rashi; Rashbam). 9–19: The enclosure of the Tabernacle (that is, its courtyard) will be 100 by 50 cubits (50 by 25 m, 150 by 75 ft) and five cubits (2.5 m, 7.5 ft) high—half as high as the Tabernacle itself (26.16).

13–16: The eastern wall will have a 20-cubit-wide opening (10 m, 30 ft), shielded by a screen of the same width, to serve as its entrance. The screen will be made of the same quality materials as the 27.20–30.38: The Tabernacle activities. After describing most of the fixed, permanent items of the sanctuary structure made of the materials listed in 25.3–5, the text turns to items made from the materials listed in 25.6–7. These items are described along with the activities (particularly the regular ["tamid"], daily priestly activities) performed with them: oil for the lamps (of 25.31–40) that are kindled regularly, the vestments worn by the priests when officiating (and hence also their ordination), culminating in the regular daily sacrifices (chs 28–29), the incense altar and the incense burned on it regularly (30.1–10, 34–38), the census (30.11–16), the laver where the priests would wash before officiating (30.17–21), and the sacred anointing oil (30.22–33). The shift in subject matter from sacred objects to activities is reflected in the fact that in Jewish liturgical practice a new weekly Torah portion ("Tetzaveh," "You shall . . . instruct") begins here.

27.20–21: Oil for the lamps.

20: Further instruct the Israelites to bring you clear oil: In addition to the original request (25.6), oil will have to be requested regularly since, unlike the materials used to construct the sanctuary (25.3–5), the oil supply is depletable. For kindling lamps (those of 25.31–40; see Lev. 24.4) regularly, every evening, to burn until morning (v. 21; Lev. 24.3–4; cf. 1 Sam. 3.3). In current Jewish practice this command is emulated by suspending a lamp from the ceiling in the synagogue above and in front of the Torah Ark. The lamp is called the "ner tamid," "eternal light," based on an alternative parsing of the Heb words for lamps regularly. This lamp identifies the synagogue as a "miniature sanctuary" (Ezek. 11.16) and serves as a symbol that the divine Presence accompanies the Jewish people (b. Shab. 22b). 21: Aaron and his sons, the priests (28.1). According to 30.8; Lev. 24.3; Num. 8.2–3, only Aaron was to kindle the lamps; his sons—if their mention is not a scribal error—may have assisted him with the preparations. Tent of Meeting, see 25.8 n.

Chs 28–29: The priests. Having mentioned the priests in 27.21, the

28.1–43: The priestly vestments. Bring forward: This is to take place after the sanctuary is constructed (29.4; Lev. 8.6). Aaron, with his sons, 6.23; 24.1. The priesthood will be hereditary (29.8). The Bible never explains why Aaron was granted the priesthood. Later Jewish tradition praises him as a lover of peace who encouraged reconciliation and who brought people near to Torah (Pirkei 'Avot 1.12). One midrash holds that he was granted the privilege of wearing the Urim and Thummim over his heart (v. 29) because instead of being jealous of Moses' greater stature he "rejoiced in his heart" (4.14, literal translation; Tanḥ., Shemot 27). Another credits his receipt of the high priesthood to his employing delaying tactics when the Israelites decided to make the golden calf (Exod. Rab. 37.2). 2: Aaron's sacral vestments . . . for dignity and adornment number seven in all, the six listed here plus a frontlet (vv. 36–38). An eighth item, breeches (vv. 42–43), is listed separately because they are neither visible nor sacral (contrast Lev. 16.4). These garments will be worn by the priests when officiating (Lev. 6.3; Ezek. 42.14; 44.17–19). No footwear is mentioned; 30.19 implies that they officiated barefoot (Nahūnanides; cf. 3.5; Josh. 5.14; Exod. Rab. 2, end), as their descendants still do nowadays when reciting the priestly benediction (Num. 6.24–26) in the synagogue. The four main vestments mentioned first are listed in order from the outermost to the innermost: the breastpiece, which was attached to the front of the ephod, the ephod itself, the robe, and the tunic (see 29.5; cf., with a slight difference, Lev. 8.7–8). 3: Skillful . . . skill: Artistic skills, no less than intellectual ones, are recognized as forms of wisdom. Gift, lit. "spirit." Extraordinary skills are gifts from God. For consecrating him to serve Me: Placing these vestments on Aaron (and his sons) will be a constitutive part of their ordination ments they are to make: a breastpiece, an ephod, a robe, a fringed^a tunic, a headdress, and a sash. They shall make those sacral vestments for your brother Aaron and his sons, for priestly service to Me;⁵ they, therefore, shall receive the gold, the blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and the fine linen.

⁶They shall make the ephod of gold, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and of fine twisted linen, worked into designs. ⁷It shall have two shoulder-pieces attached; they shall be attached at its two ends. ⁸And the decorated band that is upon it shall be made like it, of one piece with it: of gold, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and of fine twisted linen. ⁹Then take two lazuli stones and engrave on them the names of the sons of Israel: ¹⁰six of their names on the one stone, and the names of the remaining six on the other stone, in the order of their birth. ¹¹On the two stones you shall make seal engravings—the work of a lapidary—of the names of the sons of Israel. Having bordered them with frames of gold, ¹²attach the two stones to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, as stones for remembrance of the Israelite people, whose names Aaron shall carry upon his two shoulder-pieces for remembrance before the LORD.

ceremony (v. 41; 29:1–9; Lev. 8:7–9, 13; Num. 29:26, 28). 5: They, therefore, shall receive, those with artistic skill (v. 3). The finest materials called for in 25:3–4 shall be given to the artisans to make the priestly vestments. These will be made of the same materials as the most sacred parts of the sanctuary itself. 6–38: Aaron’s sacral vestments.

6–30: The ephod (vv. 6–12) and the breastpiece (vv. 15–30). The order of these two items is the reverse of that given in v. 4, but in essence the two constitute a unit both physically, since the breastpiece is attached to the ephod (vv. 22–28), and functionally, since both are involved in ascertaining the divine will. Elsewhere the term ephod (and cognates in other Semitic languages) refers to a garment of uncertain appearance (1 Sam. 2:18; 2 Sam. 6:14) and also to a device carried by priests and used to determine God’s will (1 Sam. 2:28; 14:3; 23:6, 9–12; 30:7–8). Here it is clearly a garment, and the divinatory device—the breastpiece containing the Urim and Thummim (vv. 15–30)—is attached to it. Using the Urim and Thummim to determine God’s will is one of the most important functions of the priest. Because of the importance of this function and Aaron’s access to the interior of the sanctuary, the ephod and the breastpiece are, like it, made of the most precious materials (vv. 6, 15) including the sacred mixture of wool and linen (26:31 n.); cf. 39:29. 9–12: The inscriptions on the epaulets of the ephod. 9: Lazuli, translation not certain. 10: In the order of their birth, see Gen. 29:32–30:24; 35:16–18.

11: Seal engravings—the work of a lapidary, cf. v. 21. The stones are to be inscribed by the technique used by lapidaries who engraved people’s names on gems and other stones to be used as seals. 12: For remembrance . . . before the LORD:

This phrase evokes the formula of ancient graffiti and votive inscriptions that pray that “so-and-so may be remembered (for good) before the deity.” The ancients sought by various means to make the gods mindful of them: by placing votive statues of themselves in an attitude of prayer in sanctuaries—a method forbidden in the Bible—by donating ritual objects inscribed with their names to sanctuaries, and by writing graffiti praying for remembrance by the deity. Most reminiscent of the present v. are seals inscribed with both the owner’s name and a prayer for divine blessing. Some of these are written in positive rather than mirror-writing and hence were not intended as functional seals; they were likely placed in sanctuaries to secure divine remembrance. Thus, each time Aaron entered the sanctuary wearing these inscriptions he not only represented the Israelites but carried before God an implicit prayer on their behalf. 15–30: The breastpiece of decision, a pouch, approx. 24 cm (9 in) square and attached to the ephod, containing the instrument of decision (v. 30). 17–20: The inscribed stones on the breastpiece function as do the inscribed epaulets (vv. 9–12). The translation nelian, chrysolite, and emerald; ¹⁸the second row: a turquoise, a sapphire, and an amethyst; ¹⁹the third row: a jacinth, an agate, and a crystal; ²⁰and the fourth row: a beryl, a lapis lazuli, and a jasper. They shall be framed with gold in their mountings. ²¹The stones shall correspond [in number] to the names of the sons of Israel: twelve, corresponding to their names. They shall be engraved like seals, each with its name, for the twelve tribes.

²²On the breastpiece make braided chains of corded work in pure gold. ²³Make two rings of gold on the breastpiece, and fasten the two rings at the two ends of the breastpiece, ²⁴attaching the two golden cords to the two rings at the ends of the breastpiece. ²⁵Then fasten the two ends of the cords to the two frames, which you shall attach to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, at the front. ²⁶Make two rings of gold and attach them to the two ends of the breastpiece, at its inner edge, which faces the ephod. ²⁷And make two other rings of gold and fasten them on the front of the ephod, low on the two shoulder-pieces, close to its seam above the decorated band. ²⁸The breastpiece shall be held in place by a cord of blue from its rings to the rings of the ephod, so that the breastpiece rests on the decorated band and does not come loose from the ephod. ²⁹Aaron shall carry the names of the sons of Israel on the breastpiece of decision over his heart, when he enters the sanctuary, for remembrance before the LORD at all times. ³⁰Inside the breastpiece of decision you shall place the Urim and Thummim,^a so that they are over Aaron's heart when he comes before the LORD. Thus Aaron shall carry the instrument of decision for the Israelites over his heart before the LORD at all times.

leaders (Num. 27.21; 1 Sam. 14.37–42 [see v. 41 translators' note a-a]; Ezra 2.63; cf. Exod. 22.8 n.; Josh. 7.14–18; Judg. 1.1–2; 20.18; 1 Sam. 10.20–22; 2 Sam. 2.1; 5.23–24). It apparently consisted of two or more lots (Prov. 16.33) which the priest drew out of the breast-piece and which signified a positive, negative, or noncommittal answer to a question or indicated a particular message (see esp. 1 Sam. 14.41 with translators' note a-a). Urim and Thummim may have been the names of the lots. Derivation of these terms from Heb "or," "light," and "tom," "completeness, perfection, integrity," is suggestive but far from certain. Thus Aaron shall carry the instrument of decision for the Israelites . . . before the LORD at all times: This may indicate that the Urim and Thummim were consulted only in the sanctuary.

31–35: The robe of the ephod indicates that it is part of the same unit as the ephod and the breastpiece of decision; they would all be worn together. Its shape seems to resemble an ankle-length sleeveless shirt, and its single color, with no gold or linen admixture, indicates its lesser importance than the two outer items. 33: The robe's most distinctive feature is its hemline with dyed wool pomegranate-shaped tassels and golden bells. Pomegranates—a well-known symbol of fertility—were a popular artistic motif in ancient Israel and adorned Solomon's Temple in several places (1 Kings 7.42; 2 Kings 25.17; Jer. 52.23; 2 Chron. 3.16; 4.13). A small ivory pomegranate, containing an inscription in Heb script of the First Temple period, came to light in Jerusalem in 1979; the inscription, plausibly restored, seems to say "Belonging to the Tem[ple of the Lor]d, holy to the priests." 35: The purpose of the bells is not clear. The ominous explanation that he may not die may indicate that the bells were apotropaic devices to protect the priest from demons that are widely believed to haunt thresholds (cf. Gen. 4.7; the rites mentioned in 1 Sam. 5.5 and Zeph. 1.9 may have originated in a similar of the names of the twelve stones is not certain. 21: Engraved like seals, see v. 11 n. 29: See v. 12 n. 30: Urim and Thummim . . . the instrument of decision: The Urim and Thummim was a device for obtaining God's decision on important questions on which human judgment was found inadequate, such as military actions, allocation of land, legal verdicts in the absence of evidence, and choice of officiating, so that the sound of it is heard when he comes into the sanctuary before the LORD and when he goes out—that he may not die.

³⁶You shall make a frontlet of pure gold and engrave on it the seal inscription: “Holy to the LORD.” ³⁷Suspend it on a cord of blue, so that it may remain on the headdress; it shall remain on the front of the headdress. ³⁸It shall be on Aaron’s forehead, that Aaron may take away any sin arising from the holy things that the Israelites consecrate, from any of their sacred donations; it shall be on his forehead at all times, to win acceptance for them before the LORD.

³⁹You shall make the fringed tunic of fine linen.

You shall make the headdress of fine linen.

You shall make the sash of embroidered work.

⁴⁰And for Aaron’s sons also you shall make tunics, and make sashes for them, and make turbans for them, for dignity and adornment. ⁴¹Put these on your brother Aaron and on his sons as well; anoint them, and ordain them^a and consecrate them to serve Me as priests.

⁴²You shall also make for them linen breeches to cover

belief); that is why the sound must be heard when the priest leaves the sanctuary as well as when he enters. If that was the original purpose it seems to have been abandoned by the Bible, which gives similar warnings with the requirements that the priests wear underpants and wash their hands and feet before ministering (v. 43; 30.20–21); this suggests that these items and actions are expressions of respect for God: One does not approach Him unannounced, unwashed, or immodestly dressed. In any case, all such warnings reflect the potential lethality of the sanctuary and its contents (19.21 n., 22 n.; see also 30.33, 37; Lev. 10.6, 9; 16.2, 13; Num. 4.15, 19–20; 17.28; 18.3, 22). 36–38: The frontlet (lit. “blossom, flower,” perhaps indicating its shape; it is called a “diadem” in 29.6 and both terms are used in 39.30 and Lev. 8.9) was attached to the front of Aaron’s headdress (v. 39). The frontlet functions in relation to sin that might occur in the sanctuary because of imperfections or impurities in the Israelites’ sacrifices. Aaron, by wearing the inscription “Holy to the Lord”—presumably meaning that he is sacrosanct and hence protected by God from harm (19.5b–6a n.)—will be able to expiate any such sin and eliminate it. Coming as it does after the bells (and pomegranates) on Aaron’s hem that may have originated as apotropaic devices, it is noteworthy that the frontlet is called “blossom, flower” and is worn on Aaron’s forehead, since in Mesopotamian iconography the most common apotropaic head-ornament (worn even by gods for their own protection) is the rosette, a blossom-shaped decoration worn on the forehead, and that it is held in place by a blue cord, since blue is frequently used in apotropaic devices. Here, however, the text says that Aaron—not the frontlet—[shall] take away . . . sin and that his wearing it is to win acceptance for Israel before the LORD—indicating that Aaron will take away sin because wearing the frontlet pleases God, not because it has any inherent apotropaic power. 39: In addition to the preceding vestments, Aaron was to wear a fringed tunic of fine linen (“of woven work” according to 39.27) under them, a headdress of unknown appearance, and an ornate sash which, like the ephod and the breastpiece, was made of the sacred mixture of wool and linen (39.29). Since the sash was an emblem of office (Isa. 22.21) and ornate in appearance, it was naturally to be worn over Aaron’s other vestments (29.5–9). 40: The other priests have three vestments, similar to the last three of Aaron’s vestments but simpler, reflecting their lower status: tunics (“of fine linen, of woven work,” 39.27), like Aaron’s, but not fringed; sashes, whether identical to Aaron’s or simpler depends on whether 39.29 refers only to Aaron’s sash or to those of all the priests; and turbans (translation uncertain, but presumably different in appearance from Aaron’s headdress), also made of fine linen (39.28) but lacking a frontlet. In contrast to Aaron’s vestments which are made of materials used in the interior of the sanctuary, those of the other priests, possibly excluding their sashes, match the material of the courtyard hangings, as befits their lesser sanctity (linen, 27.9). 41: That is: Robe the priests in their vestments and then anoint them and ordain them, thereby consecrating them as priests; see 29.1–37, introductory n. Anoint: Sacred anointing oil is to be poured on Aaron’s head and sprinkled on his sons (29.7, 21) to sanctify them for their duties (29.21; 30.22–33). Ordain: lit. “fill their hand,” an expression that probably originated in an induction ceremony in which a symbol of office was placed in the inductee’s hand. Conceivably it refers to the temporary placement of parts of the “ordination offering” in the priests’ hands (29.24; see Lev. 8.22–29 n.), but it may be no more than an idiom here. 42–43. The priests’ breeches, that is, underpants, are separated from the list of sacral vestments by v. 41 because they are not sacral their nakedness; they shall extend from the hips to the thighs. ⁴³They shall be worn by Aaron and his sons when they enter the Tent of Meeting or when they approach the altar to officiate in the sanctuary, so that they do not incur punishment and die. It shall be a law for all time for him and for his offspring to come.

29 This is what you shall do to them in consecrating them to serve Me as priests: Take a young bull of the herd and two rams without blemish; ²also unleavened bread, unleavened cakes with oil mixed in, and unleavened wafers spread with oil—make these of choice wheat flour. ³Place these in one basket and present them in the basket, along with the bull and the two rams. ⁴Lead Aaron and his sons up to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and wash them with water. ⁵Then take the vestments, and clothe Aaron with the tunic, the robe of the ephod, the ephod, and the breastpiece, and gird him with the decorated band of the ephod. ⁶Put the headdress on his head, and place the holy diadem upon the headdress. ⁷Take the anointing oil and pour it on his head and anoint him. ⁸Then bring his sons forward; clothe them with tunics ⁹and wind turbans upon them. And gird both Aaron and his sons with sashes. And so they shall have priesthood as their right for all time.

You shall then ordain Aaron and his sons. ¹⁰Lead the bull up to the front of the Tent of Meeting, and let Aaron and his sons lay their hands upon the head of the bull. ¹¹Slaughter the bull before the LORD, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, ¹²and take some of the bull's blood and put it on the horns of the altar with your finger; then pour out the rest of the blood at the base of the altar. ¹³Take all the fat that covers the entrails, the protuberance on the liver, and the two kidneys with the fat on them, and turn them into smoke upon the altar. ¹⁴The rest of the flesh of the bull, its hide, and its dung shall be put to the fire outside the camp; it is a sin offering.

¹⁵Next take the one ram, and let Aaron and his sons lay their hands upon the ram's head. ¹⁶Slaughter the ram, and take its blood and dash it against all sides of the altar. ¹⁷Cut up the ram into sections, wash its entrails and legs, vestments and hence not part of the ordination ceremony (cf. 29.5 n.); they are purely functional, to prevent exposure of the genitals. Evidently breeches were not regularly worn by men, hence the need to require them for priests. See 20.23 n. 43: To officiate, to offer sacrifices (Ezek. 44.15; 2 Chron. 29.11). And die, v. 35 n.

29.1–37: The consecration of the priests. This ceremony consists of six parts: washing, robing, and anointing the priests and three sacrifices. The three elements that are unique to priests (robing with the vestments, anointing with holy oil, and the ordination sacrifice [28.41]) constitute their consecration; the other parts (washing and the first two sacrifices) are preparatory. The performance of the ceremony is narrated in Lev. chs 8–9; cf. Exod. 40.12–16.

3: Present them, “before the LORD” (v. 23), probably before the altar (Deut. 26.4, 10). 4: Entrance of the Tent of Meeting, the courtyard in front of the Tent. Wash them with water, as part of the process of purification (Lev. chs 14–17). 5–6: For the vestments, see ch 28. Only those that have ceremonial significance are mentioned here; that the priests would put on their breeches (28.42–43) goes without saying. 7: Anointing oil, 30.22–33; anoint, 28.41 n. 9b–14: The purification offering (Heb “ḥata't”; for this translation, rather than “sin offering” [v. 14], see Lev. 4.3 n.) follows the procedure prescribed in Lev. ch 4; cf. Num. 15.22–31. On the purpose of this type of offering, see introductory notes to Lev. 4.1–5.26; 4.1–35; chs 12–25; 16.1–34; 15.31 n. Here the altar is purified (v. 12), either from impurities stemming from its builders and the donors of its materials or (since purification offerings normally purge impurities stemming from the individuals who bring them) from the priests. 10: Lay their hands upon the head of the bull: The meaning of the act is uncertain; it may identify Aaron and his sons as the ones on whose behalf the sacrifice is being made. For another view, see Lev. 1.4 n. 12: Take some of the bull's blood and put on the horns of the altar: The animal's blood serves as the purifying agent, the “detergent” in purification offerings. Applying the blood to the horns of the altar (27.2)—its vulnerable extremities representing all of the altar—purifies the altar (cf. Ezek. 43.20). Pour out the rest of the blood at the base of the altar, Lev. 4.4–11 n. 13: Lev. 3.3–4 n. 14: Lev. 4.11; 6.23 (see n.). Sin offering, better, “purification offering” (see Lev. 4.3 n.). 15–18: The burnt offering, following the procedure prescribed in and put them with its quarters and its head. ¹⁸Turn all of the ram into smoke upon the altar. It is a burnt offering to the LORD, a pleasing odor, an offering by fire to the LORD.

²⁶Then take the breast of Aaron's ram of ordination and offer it as an elevation offering before the LORD; it shall be your portion. ²⁷You shall consecrate the breast that was offered as an elevation offering and the thigh that was offered as a gift offering from the ram of ordination—from that which was Aaron's and from that which was his sons'—²⁸and those parts shall be a due for all time from a Or "lobe."

Lev. ch 1. See the comments there. 19–34: The ordination offering. This is the most elaborate offering, completing the priests' consecration by further anointment and then ordaining them. It follows the procedure for offering sheep as "sacrifices of well-being" (18.12 n.) prescribed in Lev. 3.6–11 and 7.11–34 with modifications specific to this occasion. 20: As in the case of applying blood to the horns of the altar (v. 12), vulnerable extremities of the priests, representing their entire bodies, are daubed with blood, apparently to purge them of impurity (cf. v. 33 and the similar rite in Lev. 14.14–20, 25–31). Dash the rest of the blood against every side of the altar, a standard procedure in sacrifices (see Lev. 1.5 n.). 21: The mixture of blood from the altar and anointing oil makes the priests and their garments holy; the anointing oil because that is its function (30.25–30) and the blood because being on the altar has made it holy (v. 37b) and capable of transmitting holiness to anything it touches (Hazzekuni; see Lev. 6.11 n.).

22: The fat parts of the sacrifice of well-being are burnt on the altar, as prescribed in Lev. 3.9–11. And the right thigh; for this is a ram of ordination: The right thigh of a sacrifice of well-being is normally given to the officiating priest (Lev. 7.32–33), but not in the case of an ordination offering. 23: Sacrifices of well-being commonly include grain offerings (Lev. 7.11–13; cf. Lev. ch 2; Exod. 12.8). These, too, are normally eaten by the officiating priest (Lev. ch 2; 6.7–11; 7.14), but when, as on the present occasion, the offering is on his own behalf, it is burnt on the altar (Lev. 6.12–16). Unleavened bread: As v. 2 indicates, all the items mentioned in this v. must be unleavened, as is the case with most grain offerings (12.8 n.; Lev. 2.11–12; 6.9–10). 24: Moses is to place these items in the priests' hands, to indicate that they are from them (Lev. 7.30; Num. 6.19–20) and then cause them to offer (lit. "elevate") them as an elevation offering; a gesture indicating that the offering is donated to God (Lev. 7.30 n.). 25: With the burnt offering, of vv. 15–18. The combination of burnt offerings and sacrifices of well-being is very common (10.25; 18.12; 20.21; 24.5; 32.6; Lev. 17.8; etc.). The former is given entirely to God, while parts of the latter are eaten by the donor, guests, and the priests. 26: Your portion: Since the priests' consecration is not yet complete and Moses is officiating in their stead, he is to receive the portion that will in the future go to them (vv. 27–28).

27–28: A parenthetical note indicating that the disposition of the ram is to be the precedent for all future sacrifices of well-being, with one exception: both the breast . . . and (unlike the present occasion, v. 22) the right thigh shall be given to the priests (Lev. 7.34–35; 10.15). 28: In addition to the fat parts, which are burnt (vv. 22, 25), the breast and right thigh of sacrifices of well-being are also donated by the people to God, who assigns them to the Israelites to Aaron and his descendants. For they are a gift; and so shall they be a gift from the Israelites, their gift to the LORD out of their sacrifices of well-being.

²⁹The sacral vestments of Aaron shall pass on to his sons after him, for them to be anointed and ordained in.

³⁰He among his sons who becomes priest in his stead, who enters the Tent of Meeting to officiate within the sanctuary, shall wear them seven days.

³⁵Thus you shall do to Aaron and his sons, just as I have commanded you. You shall ordain them through seven days, ³⁶and each day you shall prepare a bull as a sin offering for expiation; you shall purge the altar by performing purification upon it, and you shall anoint it to consecrate it. ³⁷Seven days you shall perform purification for the altar to consecrate it, and the altar shall become most holy; whatever touches the altar shall become consecrated.

consecration of the priests and the altar is to go on for a week. Cf. Ezek. 43.25–26; 2 Chron. 7.9. Shall become consecrated: Once the altar is sanctified, its holiness will become contagious. As in the case of other sanctuary furniture and parts of certain sacrifices, anything that touches it will likewise become holy and unfit for ordinary activity and will become the property of the sanctuary. See 30.29; Lev. 6.11 n., 20; Num. 17.1–4 (Ezek. 44.19; 46.20 holds that even people can become consecrated in this way).

29.38–42: The obligatory daily offering. Now that the altar and priests have been sanctified, the text again (as in vv. 27–30) turns to the future, describing the regular daily offering for which the priests are now fit (cf. Ezek. 43.18–27). This offering, made twice daily and known as the “tamid” (“regular” [sacrifice], Dan. 8.11), became the core of the sacrificial system (Num. 28.3–8). With this the text resumes the theme of regular (“tamid”) rites begun in 27.20–21. The “tamid” offering consists of the simple staples of the Israelites’ diet: the meat of lambs (the least expensive meat), wheat, oil, and wine. No attempt is made to provide delicacies or sumptuous quantities as would befit God’s greatness (contrast the royal diet in 1 Kings 5.2–3). This reflects the token nature of biblical sacrifice, expressive of the worshippers’ attitude, as distinct from actually feeding God (27.1–8 n.). 39: In the morning . . . at twilight: In the priestly calendar, the day began in the morning. 40: Cf. Lev. 6.12–16. A tenth of a measure, a tenth of an “efah” measure, about 2.3 liters (2.1 dry quarts); see 16.36 n. Hin, a liquid measure of uncertain size (possibly about a gallon, in which case a quarter of a “hin” would be a liter or a quart). Libation: Libations of wine often accompany burnt and well-being offerings (Lev. 23.13, 18, 27; Num. 15.1–12; Num. 28–29; 2 Kings 6.13, 15), though no independent libation is prescribed. 41: An offering by fire for a pleasing odor to the LORD: Lev.

the priests for their maintenance. 29–30: A second parenthetical note: The robing of the high priest and the seven-day duration of the ceremony (v. 35) shall be the precedent for the ordination of future high priests. 31–33: The consecration continues: The remainder of the ram is cooked and eaten, along with the remainder of the unleavened bread, by the priests in the courtyard. 31: The sacred precinct, lit. “in a holy place,” either anywhere in the court or in a specific part of it, perhaps the area between the altar and the Tent of Meeting (cf. Lev. 6.9, 19; 8.31). 33: They may not be eaten by a layman, for they are holy, a blanket rule concerning the sacrificial portions assigned to the priests (Lev. 22.10–16). Cf. 30.31–33. 34: This rule also applies to other sacrifices of well-being, namely the pesah and other festival offerings and the thanksgiving offering (12.10; 23.28; 34.25; Lev. 7.15; 22.30; contrast 7.16–17; 19.6). 35–37: The fering by fire for a pleasing odor to the LORD,⁴² a regular burnt offering throughout the generations, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting before the LORD.

For there I will meet with you, and there I will speak with you,⁴³ and there I will meet with the Israelites, and it shall be sanctified by My Presence.⁴⁴ I will sanctify the Tent of Meeting and the altar, and I will consecrate Aaron and his sons to serve Me as priests.⁴⁵ I will abide among the Israelites, and I will be their God.⁴⁶ And they shall know that I the LORD am their God, who brought them out from the land of Egypt that I might abide among them, I the LORD their God.

30 You shall make an altar for burning incense; make it of acacia wood.² It shall be a cubit long and a cubit wide—it shall be square—and two cubits high, its horns of one piece with it.³ Overlay it with pure gold: its top, its sides round about, and its horns; and make a gold

1.9 n. 42: At the entrance of the Tent of Meeting: i.e., at the altar in the courtyard.

29.42b–46: The divine Presence in the sanctuary. The sanctuary will be ready to serve its various functions as the site of divine-human communication, as a sanctuary, and as the locus of God's Presence among the Israelites. In this climactic passage, all these functions are alluded to by the verbs (each occurring at least twice) from which the three main terms for the sanctuary (25.8) are derived—thereby explaining these terms. God will meet ("iva'ed," "no'ad") there with Moses and Israel, echoing "Tent of Meeting" ("ohel mo'ed"), it will be sanctified ("nikdash," "kadesh," echoing "mikdash," "sanctuary"), and God will abide ("shakhan") there, echoing "abode" ("mishkan"). That these goals are mentioned after the regular daily sacrifice may reflect the idea that sacrificial worship is the means by which God is drawn to the sanctuary (20.21 n.). Notably, however, sacrifice is presented as a means, not as a goal in itself. The sanctuary is for the benefit of Israel, not God (see introductory note to 25.1–31.17).

42b–43: For there I will meet with you . . ., see 25.22. The threefold repetition of "there" emphasizes that it is the sanctuary that will become the regular place of communication between God and Israel.

43: The ordination ceremony will culminate in a theophany in which God's Presence will appear at the Tent of Meeting in the sight of the entire people (Lev. 9.4, 6, 23–24), thus sanctifying it by His Presence (cf. also 40.34). I will meet [Heb "no'adti"] with the Israelites: This statement is unexpected since elsewhere God meets only with Moses (Num. 17.19) (although the first "you" in v. 42 and the one in Num. 17.19 are in the plural, the Septuagint and Samaritan Pentateuch and some Heb manuscripts read the singular, consistent with the second "you"). One wonders, therefore, whether the text did not originally read "I shall make Myself known ("noda'ti") to the Israelites"; cf. Ezek. 20.5, 9; 36.23.

44: Perhaps this refers to God's sending fire to consume the offerings on the altar (Lev. 9.24), meaning that the fire sanctified the altar and the sanctuary, and hence the priests who made the offerings. But this v. and v. 43 seem redundant and inconsistent with vv. 21, 36–37 and 30.29–30 which state that it is Moses who will sanctify the sanctuary, the altar, and the priests by sacrifice and anointment. This has led to the suggestion that vv. 42b–46 are not from the Priestly source but stem from the "Holiness Collection" ("H") in which God regularly concludes His statements with "I, the LORD your/their God," and which holds that it is God who sanctifies the priests and the sanctuary (Lev. 21.15, 23; 2.16). If that is the case, the aim of the interpolation is apparently to override the message of vv. 21, 36–37; 30.29–30 by indicating that sacrifice and anointment are not efficacious by themselves; the real source of sanctification is God. 45–46: These concluding vv. echo the promises of 25.8 and 6.7, tying the exodus narrative and the Tabernacle instructions into one overarching structure of meaning: With the Tabernacle finished God will abide among the Israelites, as promised in 25.8, and fulfill His covenant with them by being their God, as promised in 6.7, and the Israelites will understand that these were the ultimate purpose of the exodus: that I might abide among them. Although reminiscent of 6.7b, this v. diverges from it by emphasizing the ultimate goal of the exodus: not only freedom from servitude but living in the presence of God. In this respect the goal of the exodus is already achieved even before reaching the promised land. This might explain why the Torah is complete without the depiction of the conquest in the book of Joshua—it is the indwelling of the divine Presence, rather than the conquest of the land that culminates the exodus. According to 15.17 (see also 6.8), however, the same goal will be achieved in the promised land when the Temple is built (15.17 n.).

30.1–31.17: Supplementary instructions concerning the sanctuary. This section begins with instructions for constructing the incense altar, taking a census, constructing the laver, and for compounding the anointing oil and sacred incense (ch 30). These five molding for it round about. ⁴And make two gold rings for it under its molding; make them on its two side walls, on opposite^a sides. They shall serve as holders for poles with which to carry it. ⁵Make the poles of acacia wood, and overlay them with gold.

⁶Place it in front of the curtain that is over the Ark of the Pact—in front of the cover that is over the Pact—where I will meet with you. ⁷On it Aaron shall burn aromatic incense: he shall burn it every morning when he tends the lamps, ⁸and Aaron shall burn it at twilight when he lights the lamps—a regular incense offering before the LORD throughout the ages. ⁹You shall not offer alien incense on it, or a burnt offering or a meal offering; neither shall you pour a libation on it. ¹⁰Once a year Aaron shall perform purification upon its horns with blood of the sin offering of purification; purification shall be performed upon it once a year throughout the ages. It is most holy to the LORD.

supplementary instructions are followed by the designation of the chief artisans for the entire construction project and a final injunction to suspend all construction and manufacture on the Sabbath (31.1–17). There are phraseological similarities among the five subsections of ch 30, and their order could be due to the fact that first three deal with items made, respectively, of gold, silver, and bronze (see 25.1–31.17 n.) and that items two through five employ materials acquired from special contributions, not those donated by the public at large or in response to the initial appeal (25.2–7; 35.4–9): silver from the census levy (v. 13), the bronze for the laver "from the mirrors of the women who performed tasks at the entrance of the Tent" (38.8), and the spices and oil from the chieftains (35.27–28). It is unclear, however, why all these items appear after 29.42b–46, which seems to conclude the manufacturing instructions. Why were the incense altar and the laver not mentioned earlier along with the other items in, respectively, the Holy Place (25.23–40; 26.35) and the courtyard (27.1–19) where they will stand, and why do the census, the anointing oil, and the incense appear here? In subsequent lists of the contents of the Tabernacle, the incense altar, the laver, the anointing oil, and the incense are listed in their proper physical or functional location (30.26–28; 31.7–11; 35.11–19; 39.33–40; 40.1–15, 18–33). Their location here indicates that the material was organized according to principles that elude us and, perhaps, that they were added to this text (though not necessarily composed) at a later date.

30.1–10: The incense altar. This altar would stand in the Holy Place and was, accordingly, overlaid with gold. Its importance is indicated by its location directly in front of the curtain of the Holy of Holies, flanked by the table and the lampstand (40.5, 22–26). The burning of incense on it was, like the activities performed on the table and lampstand, one of the regular ("tamid"), daily activities of the Tabernacle (27.20–30.38 n.; 27.20 n.). It was .5 m (1.5 ft) square and 1 m (3 ft) high. Numerous incense altars, some with horns as prescribed here, have been found among archeological remains from ancient Israel and elsewhere. Burning incense was common in ancient religions. Since here it is part of the complex of daily activities inside the Holy Place that includes kindling lamps (v. 7), it is perhaps regarded as a natural feature of a courtly residence, creating a pleasing aroma inside. Maimonides holds that it is to counteract the stench of the animals being slaughtered and sacrificed (Guide of the Perplexed 3.45). 9: Alien, unauthorized, compounded with a formula different from that prescribed in vv. 34–36. Or a burnt offering or a meal offering; neither shall you pour a libation on it: No food or drink offerings may be made inside the Tent. Only the "bread of display," which is eaten by the priests, is presented there. This shows again that the offerings are tokens but are not consumed by God. See 25.23–30 n.; 29.38–42 n. 10: Once a year, on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16.16; cf. 4.18; m. Yoma 5.5).

30.11–16: Census. Apparently this regulation is placed here because the census involves collecting silver that will be used for the construction of the Tabernacle (v. 16) and because the donations serve as "expiation" (vv. 15–16), thus creating a link with v. 10 where "purification" is expressed by the same Heb word ("kaper"/"kipurim"; see Lev. 4.3 n.). The juxtaposition of this law to the incense altar may also have been prompted by the apotropaic function (i.e., one that averts ill consequences) of the census donation in preventing a plague (v. 12), since incense sometimes has an apotropaic function (Num. 17.11–13). Censuses were being enrolled, that no plague may come upon them through their being enrolled. ¹³This is what everyone who is entered in the records shall pay: a half-shekel by the sanctuary weight—twenty gerahs to the shekel—a half-shekel as an offering to the LORD. ¹⁴Everyone who is entered in the records, from the age of twenty years up, shall give the LORD's offering; ¹⁵the rich shall not pay more and the poor shall not pay less than half a shekel when giving the LORD's offering as expiation for your persons. ¹⁶You shall take the expiation money from the Israelites and assign it to the service of the Tent of Meeting; it shall serve the Israelites as a reminder before the LORD, as expiation for your persons.

¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁸Make a laver of copper and a stand of copper for it, for washing; and place it between the Tent of Meeting and the altar. Put water in it, ¹⁹and let Aaron and his sons wash their hands and feet [in water drawn] from it. ²⁰When they enter the Tent of Meeting they shall wash with water, that they may not die; or when they approach the altar to serve, to turn into smoke an offering by fire to the LORD, ²¹they shall wash their hands and feet, that they may not die. It shall be a law for all time for them—for him and his offspring—throughout the ages.

normally taken for purposes of military (14 n.; Num. 1.2–3; 2 Sam. 24.9) or other forms of public service (Num. 4.2–3, 22–23, 29–30; 1 Chron. 23.24–32), land distribution (Num. 26.52) and redistribution, and taxation (known from ancient Mari). The link with expiation is evidently due to popular fear that counting people or listing their names might expose them to supernatural danger (Rashi; cf. 2 Sam. 24.1–15; 2 Chron. 21.1–14). Hence when a census was necessary, a payment would be made to “ransom” the lives of those counted and protect them from danger (cf. Num. 31.48–50). The same fear is known from many places in the world and evidently underlies the talmudic dictum not to count Israelites directly; where counting is necessary, objects representing each person, such as ostraca, are counted (b. Yoma 22b; Maimonides, Temidin 4.4). This practice survives in a Jewish custom for determining whether a prayer quorum (“minyan”) of ten is present: ten words of a biblical verse, rather than numbers, are applied to those being counted. Similarly, in the present case Rashi holds that it is the half-shekels, not the people, that are to be counted, which would explain why all must pay the same amount (v. 15); that would be the only way to infer the number of people from the total collected. Although this regulation applies only when a census is taken, in Second Temple times it became the basis of an annual impost for maintaining the Temple (possibly reflected in 2 Chron. 24.4–10 [cf. 2 Kings 12.12–25]). The details are spelled out in the talmudic tractate Shekalim. Since the payment was due in the month of Adar (early spring), in order to announce it the present law, called “the Section concerning Shekels” (Parashat Shekalim), was added to the weekly Torah reading on the Sabbath of, or preceding, the New Moon of Adar (m. Meg. 3.4), and the Sabbath is called “the Sabbath of Shekels” (Shabbat Shekalim). Nowadays half of the common currency (e.g., one half-dollar) is collected on Purim, which falls in Adar, and the proceeds are used for the support of synagogues and the poor. 12: Ransom, a payment made to escape death or physical punishment (21.30; Prov. 6.35). 13: Half-shekel, of silver (38.25–26). The shekel was the standard weight. By the sanctuary weight: There were different types of shekel, varying in weight: the standard shekel, weighing ca. 11.4 grams, or .4 oz and possibly the same as the “shekel at the going merchant’s weight” (Gen. 23.16), the “sanctuary shekels” (as here), and the “shekel by the royal weight” (2 Sam. 14.26). 14: From the age of twenty years up, i.e., of military age (Num. 1.3; etc.). The envisioned censuses would be for military purposes, since the Israelites were organized as an army (12.41 n.). 16: Assign it to the service of the Tent of Meeting, rather, “for the (construction) work on the Tent of Meeting.” See 35.21 n. and, for the use to which the silver would be put, 38.25–28. The items made with the silver will stand in the sanctuary as a reminder before the LORD, as expiation, that is, for favorable remembrance (28.12 n.) which, by expiating, will prevent a plague. Cf. Num. 31.50, 54.

30.17–21: The laver, a basin containing water for washing, is to be placed between the sacrificial altar and the Tent. Before entering the Tent or offering sacrifices (activities just mentioned in 29.38–42; 30.7–8) the priests must wash their hands and feet (28.4 n.), with which they touch the sacrifices, the sanctuary, and its ground. Talmudic sources describe this as “sanctifying” the hands and feet (m. Yoma 3.2). Ramban explains it as an act of respect for God. 18: Copper, rather, bronze, like the other items in the courtyard. For the

³¹And speak to the Israelite people, as follows: This shall be an anointing oil sacred to Me throughout the ages. ³²It must not be rubbed on any person's body, and you must not make anything like it in the same proportions; it is sacred, to be held sacred by you. ³³Whoever compounds its like, or puts any of it on a layman, shall be cut off from his kin.

31 The LORD spoke to Moses: ²See, I have singled out by name Bezalel son of Uri son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah. ³I have endowed him with a divine spirit of skill, ability, and knowledge in every kind of craft; ⁴to make designs for work in gold, silver, and copper, ⁵to cut stones for setting and to carve wood—to work in every kind of craft. ⁶Moreover, I have assigned to him Oholiab son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan; and I have also granted skill to all who are skillful, that they may make everything that I have commanded you: ⁷the Tent of Meeting, the Ark for the Pact and the cover upon it, and all the furnishings of the Tent; ⁸the table and its utensils,

30.22–33: The sacred anointing oil. The formula of the sacred anointing oil is now given, along with the instruction that it is to be used to sanctify the sanctuary and all its other furniture as well. It is to be a fragrant compound of olive oil and the finest spices, and because it is sacred to the LORD it may be used only for the stated purpose, not for everyday hygienic and cosmetic anointing; nor may it be duplicated or used by laymen. 29: Whatever touches them shall be consecrated, 29.35–37 n. 33: Cut off from his kin, 12.15 n.; 28.35 n.

30.34–38: The sacred incense, to be burned on the incense altar (vv. 1–10). Like the anointing oil, it is sacred to the LORD and may not be duplicated and used for any other purpose. 36: Put some before the Pact: See v. 6.

31.1–11: The master builders. Having completed all the instructions for the sanctuary, God designates two master builders to be in charge of executing His plans, Bezalel and his associate Oholiab from the tribes of Judah and Dan, respectively. The construction is supervised and executed by skilled people from all the tribes (v. 6b), not just priests and Levites. 2: Hur, possibly, but not necessarily, the Hur mentioned in 17.11 and 24.14. 3: Divine spirit, 28.3 n. 7: Ark for the Pact, 25.10–16 n.

Just as I have commanded you, they shall do.

¹²And the LORD said to Moses: ¹³Speak to the Israelite people and say: Nevertheless, you must keep My sabbaths, for this is a sign between Me and you throughout the ages, that you may know that I the LORD have consecrated you. ¹⁴You shall keep the sabbath, for it is holy for you. He who profanes it shall be put to death: whoever does work on it, that person shall be cut off from among his kin. ¹⁵Six days may work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be a sabbath of complete rest, holy to the LORD; whoever does work on the sabbath day shall be put to death. ¹⁶The Israelite people shall keep the sabbath, observing the sabbath throughout the ages as a covenant for all time: ¹⁷it shall be a sign for all time between Me and the people of Israel. For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day He ceased from work and was refreshed.

a Or "lampstand of pure gold." b Others "plaited."

11: Just as I have commanded you, they shall do: The design is entirely God's (25.9 n.), the artisans merely follow God's blueprint. This explains why they are designated only after the construction plans are given.

31.12–17: The Sabbath. The last of the seven divine commands about building the sanctuary concerns the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath (20.8–11; cf. 25.1–31.17 n.). Thus far, the instructions concerned a holy place; now the instructions emphasize the importance of a holy time. As God created a holy time after constructing the world, Israel must observe that holy time even while constructing the sanctuary. Suspending construction on the Sabbath indicates that holy time is more important than holy space.

13: Nevertheless, notwithstanding the instructions to construct the sanctuary. My sabbaths: Since the Sabbath belongs to God (20.10 n.), observing it serves as a sign between Me and you indicating to Israel that God has consecrated them, making them His people, dedicated to His service and sacrosanct to Him (19.5b–6a n.). The notion of a sign is key to Priestly thinking about the Sabbath—it is not merely a day of rest.

14: Because the Sabbath is God's and holy to Him (vv. 13, 15), it must also be holy to Israel (20.8 n.) like the sanctuary and its parts (30.29). Hence, profaning it—treating it as unholy, common—is no less a capital crime than encroaching on the sanctuary (28.35 n.) or Mount Sinai (19.12). Put to death, Num. 15.32–36. Work, 20.10 n. Cut off, 12.15 n.; 28.35 n.

15: Rest, 16.23 n. 16–17: The Sabbath serves as a sign of Israel's relationship with God because it commemorates God's own actions and, in observing it, Israel follows His example (Gen. 2.1–3; for emulating God, cf. Lev. 19.2); as such, in Priestly thinking, it is also a covenant for all time. And was refreshed, 25.11 n.

31.18–34.35: The violation and restoration of the covenant. See also Deut. 9.8–10.11 (where the order of the events differs); Ps. 106.19–23. Like chs 19–24, this pericope, with its inconsistencies, nonsequiturs, and redundancies, shows evidence of being based on multiple sources that differ about the course of the events. In 32.7, e.g., God renounces punishment, but in v. 35 He punishes the people, though Aaron is excepted despite his acknowledged complicity (vv. 21–24). Moses' request in 33.15 that God accompany Israel personally is redundant, since God already promised that in v. 14. God's promise to do wonders in 34.10 is not a direct answer to Moses' plea that He go in Israel's midst (v. 9). The description in 33.7–11 about what Moses regularly did with "the tent" interrupts his dialogue with God, and the surrounding narrative (32.30; 34.2, 4, 28–29) is oblivious to it. What is more, although the tent is here regularly in use, and is called the Tent of Meeting (v. 7), it is very different from the tent of the same name in chs 25–31, which is not erected until ch 40 (see 33.7–11 n.). It likely represents a non-Priestly variant tradition about the Tent and was placed here because its location outside the camp seemed compatible with God's alienation from the people in ch 32. It seems unlikely that its author, who writes that God and Moses spoke "face to face" (33.11), even if meant figuratively, was the same one who wrote that Moses may not see God's face (v. 20). God's words about making a covenant in 34.10, 27 give no indication that they refer to the restoration of a prior covenant, and 34.27–28 give confusing information about which document is the basis of the covenant—vv. 11–26 (a doublet, with contextually inexplicable variations, of 23.12–33) or the Decalogue. It is plausible to conjecture that ch 34 contains what was originally a parallel account of the original Sinai covenant, and

32 When the people saw that Moses was so long in coming down from the mountain, the people gathered against Aaron and said to him, “Come, make us a god who shall go before us, for that man Moses, who brought us from the land of Egypt—we do not know what has happened to him.” ² Aaron said to them, “Take off the gold rings that are on the ears of your wives, your sons, and your daughters, and bring them to me.” ³ And all the people took off the gold rings that were in their ears and brought them to Aaron. ⁴ This he took from them and “cast in a mold,”^a and made it into a molten calf. And they exclaimed, ^b“This is your god,”^b O Israel, who brought you that the redactor, confronted with both accounts, reinterpreted this account as describing the covenant’s renewal. This section clearly combines material from J, E, P, and perhaps other hands as well, but, as in the case of chs 19–24, there is wide disagreement about which passages belong to which source.

31.18–32.35: The golden calf episode. The location of the Tabernacle instructions prior to the golden calf episode is puzzling (see introductory comments to 25.1–31.17). The present order of the text, by giving precedence to the Tabernacle as the divinely authorized means of securing God’s Presence among the people, shows that the calf is a perverted, humanly devised means of doing the same thing (see 32.4 n.), already forbidden in 20.4–5, 20. The connection between the two is highlighted by a sequence of events that parallels God’s instructions for the Tabernacle and the people’s response: The people command Aaron to make them a god, Aaron responds with a public appeal for gold, all the people bring him the gold, he makes the calf with it, builds an altar and offers sacrifices, and the people celebrate (cf. chs 25–31; 35.4–9, 20–29; 36.8–38.20; Lev. chs 8–9). The people’s celebration of the calf also bears an ironic resemblance to the covenant ceremony in ch 24: An altar is built, burnt offerings and sacrifices of well-being are made, and the people eat and drink (cf. 24.4–5, 10–11). Their declaration that the calf is the God who brought them out of Egypt contrasts ironically with God’s declaration that it is through the Tabernacle that He will abide among the Israelites and they will know that He is their God who brought them out of Egypt (29.45–46). In fact, the calf leads to the annulment of the covenant (v. 19 n.) and to God’s refusal to abide among the people (33.3, 5), and threatens their very existence (32.10). The present arrangement conveys these messages and shows that the people’s generous and obedient response to the Tabernacle instructions (chs 35–39, especially 36.3–7; 39.42–43) is a sign of their repentance, while God’s Presence entering the Tabernacle (40.34–38) is a sign of His forgiveness. The narrative has similarities to the account of the golden calves that Jeroboam (the first king of the Northern Kingdom) erected in Bethel and Dan (1 Kings 12.25–33), and some scholars believe that the Exodus narrative is a pejorative recasting of a northern legend about the origin of Jeroboam’s calves. The original northern legend would have viewed the making of the calf positively, as a pedestal or mount for God (not as an idol; 32.4 n.), and would have invoked it to legitimize Jeroboam’s calves. The manufacture of golden calves was seen as idolatry, and the story about Aaron’s calf was revised to characterize the phenomenon as sinful from the outset and, at the same time, show the legitimacy of the Jerusalem Temple and the illegitimacy of the northern sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan. 31.18: The Masoretic paragraph system starts this episode here (unlike the medieval ch divisions, which start it at 32.1), highlighting the outrage of the people’s behavior: At the very moment that God was giving Moses the Tablets of the Pact, which forbids idolatry (20.4–5), the people were demanding just that (see also Deut. 9.8–13). In modern terms, “the ink was not yet dry” on the covenant when the people violated it. 32.1: With Moses now gone for forty days (24.18), the people (see v. 28 n.) fear that he has disappeared, and since he had been their sole conduit to God they ask Aaron to make them a “god” to lead them in his stead (Radak at 1 Kings 12.28). Although most commentators believe that they mean “god” literally, it is more likely that they mean it as a metonymy for something that would serve as a new means of securing God’s Presence. See v. 4 n. That man Moses: In the people’s view, Moses disappeared because he was a mortal; that is why they want a “god” to replace him. 3: Gold rings, 3.22; 11.2–3; 12.35–36. 4: Cast in a mold, rather, as Rashi notes, “tied them in a garment (or bag)” (2 Kings 5.23). And made it into a molten calf, from the melted earrings. And they exclaimed, “This is your God, O Israel, who brought you out of the land of Egypt”: As out of the land of Egypt!"⁵ When Aaron saw this, he built an altar before it; and Aaron announced: "Tomorrow shall be a festival of the LORD!"⁶ Early next day, the people offered up burnt offerings and brought sacrifices of well-being; they sat down to eat and drink, and then rose to dance.

⁷The LORD spoke to Moses, "Hurry down, for your people, whom you brought out of the land of Egypt, have acted basely.⁸ They have been quick to turn aside from the way that I enjoined upon them. They have made themselves a molten calf and bowed low to it and sacrificed to it, saying: 'This is your god, O Israel, who brought you out of the land of Egypt!' "

⁹The LORD further said to Moses, "I see that this is a stiffnecked people.¹⁰ Now, let Me be, that My anger may blaze forth against them and that I may destroy them, and make of you a great nation."¹¹ But Moses implored the LORD his God, saying, "Let not Your anger, O LORD, blaze forth against Your people, whom You delivered from the land of Egypt with great power and with a mighty hand.¹² Let not the Egyptians say, 'It was with evil intent that He delivered them, only to kill them off in the mountains and annihilate them from the face of the earth.' Turn from Your blazing anger, and renounce the plan to punish Your people.¹³ Remember Your servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, how You swore to them by Your Self and said to them: I will make your offspring as numerous as the stars

Rashbam notes, the people cannot be so foolish as to believe that the resultant image is the God who had brought them out of Egypt. They must view it either as an image that represents Him and will attract His Presence (20.20 n.) or as a pedestal on which He will stand invisibly (cf. the cherub throne, 25.17–22 n.). Images of calves and bulls in these roles have been found in archeological excavations in Israel and neighboring lands. The Heb reads lit. "These are your gods," and "brought" is also plural, as is the verb for "go" and "lead" in vv. 1 and 23. Since Heb "elohim," "god/God," is itself grammatically plural in form even when its meaning is singular, it is on occasion accompanied by a plural verb, as in Josh. 24.19; 2 Sam. 7.23. But since the plural verb is also found in Jeroboam's nearly identical words about the two calves he made (1 Kings 12.28), it seems possible that, in the putative northern legend underlying our account, the people's words were originally singular and that the plural form is part of the pejorative recasting of the legend, highlighting their similarity to Jeroboam's and characterizing the people's request as idolatrous and polytheistic from the outset. 5: A festival of the LORD: Since the image does not represent a different god, the people are not in violation of the Decalogue's prohibition against worshipping other gods but rather, as v. 8 indicates, the prohibition of making and worshipping idols (20.4–5). 6: Dance, cf. vv. 18–19, where singing and dancing are both mentioned. The people are honoring the calf as they had honored God in 15.20–21. 7: Your people, whom you brought out of the land of Egypt:

God normally refers to Israel as "My people" "whom I brought out of Egypt" (3.7; 29.46). Here He feels alienated from them and speaks of them as Moses' people, much as an exasperated parent may refer to a misbehaving child as the other spouse's child. Contrast Moses' language in vv. 11 and 33.13. 9: Stiffnecked, obstinate. The Heb idiom is close in meaning to English "headstrong." 10: Let Me be: God implies that Moses can restrain Him from destroying Israel. Midrashic commentaries understand this as a hint for Moses to do just that by praying on Israel's behalf and making the case for sparing them. Prophets frequently and appropriately play this intercessory role (1 Sam. 12.23; Jer. 18.20; Ezek. 22.30–31; Ps. 106.23; cf. Gen. 18.17–32). Make of you a great nation: God would fulfill His promise to the patriarchs to make their descendants a great nation through Moses and his descendants. 11–14: Moses mounts a multifaceted plea: Israel is God's own people on whose behalf He has invested much effort; destroying His own people will injure His reputation among other nations; and He has a sworn obligation to the Israelites' ancestors, who were His loyal servants. In Jewish practice this passage and 34.1–10 are read in the synagogue on the public fast days that commemorate national disasters or near-disasters. 11: Your people, whom You delivered from the land of Egypt: Here Moses counters God's disassociation of Himself from Israel in v. 7. All the effort that God has invested in Israel would be for naught if He were to destroy them. 12: Moses' most daring argument: annihilating Israel would damage God's reputation in the world. He would appear diabolical and lose the stature that He had gained from the exodus. This suggests that God cares about His reputation. 13: By destroying the Israelites God would, furthermore, violate His oath to the patriarchs to give them countless descendants and eternal possession of the promised land (Gen. 12.7; 13.15–16; 15.5; 17.7–8).

of heaven, and I will give to your offspring this whole land of which I spoke, to possess forever.”¹⁴ And the LORD renounced the punishment He had planned to bring upon His people.

¹⁵Thereupon Moses turned and went down from the mountain bearing the two tablets of the Pact, tablets inscribed on both their surfaces: they were inscribed on the one side and on the other. ¹⁶The tablets were God’s work, and the writing was God’s writing, incised upon the tablets. ¹⁷When Joshua heard the sound of the people in its boisterousness, he said to Moses, “There is a cry of war in the camp.” ¹⁸But he answered,

“It is not the sound of the tune of triumph,
Or the sound of the tune of defeat;
It is the sound of song that I hear!”

¹⁹As soon as Moses came near the camp and saw the calf and the dancing, he became enraged; and he hurled the tablets from his hands and shattered them at the foot of the mountain. ²⁰He took the calf that they had made and burned it; he ground it to powder and strewed it upon the water and so made the Israelites drink it.

²¹Moses said to Aaron, “What did this people do to you that you have brought such great sin upon them?” ²²Aaron said, “Let not my lord be enraged. You know that this people is bent on evil. ²³They said to me, ‘Make us a god to lead us; for that man Moses, who brought us from the land of Egypt—we do not know what has happened to him.’ ²⁴So I said to them, ‘Whoever has gold, take it off!’ They gave it to me and I hurled it into the fire and out came this calf!”

²⁵Moses saw that the people were out of control—since Aaron had let them get out of control—so that they were a menace^a to any who might oppose them. ²⁶Moses stood

Even Israel’s violation of the conditional covenant made at Sinai (19.5–6) would not justify destroying Israel, since the earlier covenant with the patriarchs was unconditional and irrevocable (Gen. 17.7; Deut. 4.31). Moses’ invocation of the patriarchs became the precedent for the postbiblical idea of the “merit of the ancestors” (“zekhut ’avot”) in Jewish prayers. Going beyond the idea that God rewards later generations for their ancestors’ merits (20.6), and the notion that the ancestral promise may never be broken, this concept holds that even when Israel lacks merit—as in the present case—its ancestors’ merits can sustain it and God may grant mercy for their sake. 14: God’s agreement not to destroy the people responds to Moses’ plea in v. 12, but not to the request to bring Israel to the promised land in v. 13 (see v. 34). In fact, full reconciliation will require several further pleas by Moses. See v. 34; 33.12–17; 34.9. 15: Bearing the two tablets of the Pact, which he has just received (31.18). 16: Incised

(Heb “ḥarut”) upon the tablets: In a verbal play, a midrash interprets the text as if it read “(there was) freedom (“ḥerut”) upon the tablets,” explaining that no one is free except one who studies the Torah (Pirkei ’Avot 6.2). Ironically, subjugation to law is viewed as bringing true freedom. 17–18: Joshua, waiting for Moses part-way up the mountain (24.13 n.), hears the people’s noise but misjudges its nature, but Moses discerns that it is singing. The Heb word for singing (“anot”) is the same one used for Miriam’s singing of God’s praises in 15.21, again suggesting that the people are honoring the calf as they had honored God (v. 6 n.).

19: Breaking the tablets expresses not only Moses’ rage but (as in Mesopotamian law) the annulment of the covenant, since its most fundamental condition has been violated. His action is the equivalent of tearing up a contract. 20: Rabbinic exegesis, followed by some modern scholars, takes the forced drinking as a kind of ordeal designed to identify the guilty, comparable to the “waters of bitterness” ritual for testing the suspected adulteress (Num. 5.11–31; b. A. Z. 44a). Ramban suggests that making the people drink the water with the powdered ashes of the calf would degrade the idol further by turning it into human waste. 21: Moses demands an accounting of Aaron because he had left him in charge (24.14). 24: Out came this calf!: Aaron denies responsibility for making the calf; it made itself. Some see here evidence for a version of the story in which the calf was created supernaturally (which supports the view that the story was originally an approving one), like midrashim that describe how the Tabernacle and Solomon’s Temple, respectively, erected and built themselves (e.g., Exod. Rab. 52.4) and a Ugaritic myth that tells how Baal’s palace was built by firing silver and gold for six days (D. Pardee in W. W. Hallo and K. L. Younger, eds., The Context of Scripture 1.261). 26: Whoever is for up in the gate of the camp and said, “Whoever is for the LORD, come here!” And all the Levites rallied to him. ²⁷ He said to them, “Thus says the LORD, the God of Israel: Each of you put sword on thigh, go back and forth from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay brother, neighbor, and kin.” ²⁸ The Levites did as Moses had bidden; and some three thousand of the people fell that day. ²⁹ And Moses said, “Dedicate yourselves^a to the LORD this day—for each of you has been against son and brother—that He may bestow a blessing upon you today.”

³⁰ The next day Moses said to the people, “You have been guilty of a great sin. Yet I will now go up to the LORD; perhaps I may win forgiveness for your sin.” ³¹ Moses went back to the LORD and said, “Alas, this people is guilty of a great sin in making for themselves a god of gold. ³² Now, if You will forgive their sin [well and good]; but if not, erase me from the record which You have written!” ³³ But the LORD said to Moses, “He who has sinned against Me, him only will I erase from My record. ³⁴ Go now, lead the people where I told you. See, My angel shall go before you. But when I make an accounting, I will bring them to account for their sins.”

the LORD: As far as Moses is concerned, whatever the intention of its worshippers, worshipping an image is tantamount to worshipping another god and must be opposed by those who are loyal to the LORD. The Levites, Moses’ fellow tribesmen, step forward. This story thus justifies the Levites’ later important cultic role (see v. 29 n.). 27: With Israel’s fate in the balance (v. 30), Moses orders the Levites, in God’s name, to summarily execute the guilty, not sparing even their own kin. 29: The Heb is difficult. Taking the verbs as past tense (thus LXX), the v. may mean that by their action the Levites have dedicated themselves to God’s service. In view of the idiom “fill the hand” (28.41 n.) the v. may mean, “Today you have ordained yourselves/been ordained for the service of the LORD . . . and so have brought a blessing upon yourselves (or: He has granted you a blessing) today.” This has been seen as referring to the Levites’ future role as sanctuary attendants (Num. 1.48–54; chs 3–4), but in P texts in the Torah only priests are ordained, and according to Deut. 10.8 it was at this time that God chose the Levites for their future priestly role. Deut. holds, contrary to P (Exod. 28.1), that all Levites, not only descendants of Aaron, may be priests (Deut. 18.1–8); the present non-P narrative may share that view. Having battled illegitimate worship, the Levites are made the ministers of legitimate worship. See also Deut. 33.8–10. 30: Perhaps

I may win forgiveness for your sin: From God’s incomplete response in v. 14 Moses realizes that He has not yet forgiven the people. Moses wants more than their survival. 32: Erase me from the record which You have written, i.e., “the book of life” (or, “the book of the living,” Ps. 69.29; cf. Isa. 4.3), a notion (based on Mesopotamian tablets of life and destiny written by the gods) developed in much detail in the postbiblical liturgy for Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. Moses demands that his own life be taken if God will not forgive Israel. According to Ramban, he means that if God will not forgive Israel, He should take Moses’ life in Israel’s place. In either case, Moses here goes beyond his earlier refusal to supplant Israel (v. 10 n.). 33–34: God declines both of Moses’ requests: He will not take Moses’ life or waive further punishment of the people. He does agree that the people may proceed to the promised land, but led only by an angel (23.20 n.), not Himself personally. 35: Punishment was not limited to those directly involved in worshipping the calf but, in keeping with the concept of collective responsibility, strikes “the people,” i.e., others as well (Num. 25.8–9; Josh. 7.1–5, 24–26).

33.1–6: The LORD’s further displeasure. 1–3: Explaining what He meant in 32.34, God’s reference to the people that you (Moses) have brought up from the land of Egypt indicates that He is still alienated from Israel. Despite the similarity of His words in v. 2 to His promise in 20.20–23, vv. 3b–5 make clear that here the promise of angelic guidance is punitive: God Himself will not accompany a rebellious people. The people’s misguided attempt to secure God’s Presence and guidance (32.1) has backfired, and God’s plan to abide among the people in the Tabernacle (25.8; 29.45–46) is implicitly withdrawn. All of Moses’ efforts in chs 33–34 are directed toward ending this alienation and restoring God’s direct Presence among the people, and he succeeds step by step; see the land of Egypt, to the land of which I swore to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, saying, ‘To your offspring will I give it’—²I will send an angel before you, and I will drive out the Canaanites, the Amorites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites—³a land flowing with milk and honey. But I will not go in your midst, since you are a stiffnecked people, lest I destroy you on the way.”

⁴When the people heard this harsh word, they went into mourning, and none put on his finery.

⁵The LORD said to Moses, “Say to the Israelite people, ‘You are a stiffnecked people. If I were to go in your midst for one moment, I would destroy you. Now, then, leave off your finery, and I will consider what to do to you.’”

⁶So the Israelites remained stripped of the finery from Mount Horeb on.

⁷Now Moses would take the Tent and pitch it outside the camp, at some distance from the camp. It was called the Tent of Meeting, and whoever sought the LORD would go out to the Tent of Meeting that was outside the camp.

¹¹The LORD would speak to Moses face to face, as one man speaks to another. And he would then return to the camp; but his attendant, Joshua son of Nun, a youth, would not stir out of the Tent.

¹²Moses said to the LORD, “See, You say to me, ‘Lead this people forward,’ but You have not made known to me whom You will send with me. Further, You have said, ‘I have singled you out by name, and you have, indeed, gained My favor.’ ¹³Now, if I have truly gained Your favor, pray let me know Your ways, that I may know You and continue in Your favor. Consider, too, that this nation is Your moves the site for communicating with Him outside the camp and (v. 12) resumes his dialogue with Him. Since this tent is also called “the Tent of Meeting,” scholars consider it part of a variant tradition (found also in Num. 11.16–30; 12.4–13; Deut. 31.14–15) which sees the “Tent of Meeting” not as a sanctuary or a place of sacrifice, as does P (chs 25–31, 35–40), but purely as an oracle-site. Kept outside the camp, it is tended by Joshua rather than priests, and anybody who wants to consult God may come to it. God does not abide in it but descends to it in a pillar of cloud to converse with Moses face to face, as one man speaks to another (v. 11), rather than by voice only from between the cherubs (25.27; Num. 7.89). The statement that Moses would . . . pitch [the Tent] outside the camp supports the theory that this passage was not originally part of the present context; it indicates that Moses would regularly pitch the Tent outside the camp, not inside the camp as P requires (Num. 2.2, 17); cf. Num. 11.26, 30; 12.4. 7: Tent of Meeting: The explanation that whoever sought the LORD would resort to the Tent is consistent with the etymology of the name (25.8 n.). 11: Face to face, cf. Num. 12.8; Deut. 34.10. Even if meant figuratively, this is incompatible with vv. 20–22, which is from a different source. Would not stir out of the Tent, cf. 1 Sam. 3.3, 15.

33.12–23: Moses pleads with God. 12: You have not made known to me whom You will send with me, perhaps alluding to the fact that the angel of God mentioned in v. 2 does not seem to have the same authority as the one promised in 23.21–22. 13: Let me know Your ways, Your ways in dealing with humankind, meaning—as indicated by God’s response in 34.6–7 and Ps. 103.7–13—the principles by which you deal with human sin. vv. 14, 17; 34.1, 10. In the present, redacted form of Exodus, with this narrative (from J and E) followed by chs 35–40 (P), Moses’ crowning success is the resumption of plans to build God’s abode among the people in chs 35–40. 2–3a: The

¹⁷ And the LORD said to Moses, “I will also do this thing that you have asked; for you have truly gained My favor and I have singled you out by name.”¹⁸ He said, “Oh, let me behold Your Presence!”¹⁹ And He answered, “I will make all My goodness pass before you, and I will proclaim before you the name LORD,^b and the grace that I grant and the compassion that I show.”^b ²⁰ But, He said, “you cannot see My face, for man may not see Me and live.”²¹ And the LORD said, “See, there is a place near Me. considering that Israel is Your own people? (32.7 n., 11 n.; cf. v. 16 below). 14: I will go in the lead and will lighten your burden: Rather: “I personally will go and will deliver you to safety.” “Deliver to a safe haven” is a common meaning of the second verb (Deut. 3.20; 25.19). This is essentially the role God had promised the angel would play in v. 2 and 23.20–23, and is therefore a further concession to Moses, though he has not yet agreed to go in Israel’s midst (34.9). 15: Unless You go in the lead: Rather, “unless you personally go,” as in v. 14. 16: A preferable translation would be: “For how shall it be known that I have gained Your favor—I and Your people—unless You go with us, so that we may be distinguished—I and Your people—from every people on the face of the earth?” Moses insists that Israel enjoy the same favor that he does and reiterates that it is God’s people. The proof of divine favor is to be led by God Himself, not by an intermediary. 18: Emboldened by God’s favorable reply, Moses supplements his request to know God’s ways (v. 13) with a request to behold God’s Presence (16.6–7 n.), that is, to know Him visually as well (see vv. 20–23). He seeks total familiarity with God.

19–23: God replies to both of Moses’ requests: He will let him know His ways (v. 19) and grant him a partial visual experience, but a full visual experience would be fatal (vv. 20–23). 19: Proclaim . . . the name LORD: God will disclose all the qualities embodied in His name, YHVH (3.14 n.; 6.2 n.); this is fulfilled in 34.6–7. According to rabbinic exegesis, the name YHVH (“LORD”) expresses God’s attribute of mercy while “God” (“’elohim”) expresses His attribute of strict justice, but as 34.6–7 shows, the name YHVH expresses both attributes (cf. 34.13). And the grace that I grant and the compassion that I show: Better, “but I shall grant grace to whom I will and shall be merciful to whom I will.” Notwithstanding His gracious qualities, God remains sovereign and decides whom or whether to forgive. Justice may not be viewed as automatic. 20: See 3.6 n.; cf. 24.10 n. According to Num. 12.8, Moses sees God’s “likeness” (Heb “temunah,” which appears in poetic parallelism with “face” in Ps. 17.15). This may represent a different tradition than the present v., or it may represent a later stage in Moses’ relationship with God. 21: On the rock, On the top of Mount Sinai. 22–23: My hand . . . My back . . . My face: As noted in the comment to 3.6, the Bible assumes that God has a human form; but that seeing Him would be too awesome for humans to survive.

34.1–35: Restoration of the covenant. Exod. 34.1–10, containing the list of God’s attributes and the phrase “Pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for Your own!” (v. 9), is part of the Torah reading on public fast days. 1: God now prepares to formally restore the covenant by replacing the broken tablets (32.19 n.). But whereas the first tablets were made by God (32.16), these would be man-made, though inscribed by God. Sforno infers from the difference that God did not forgive Israel completely. 3: As when the terms of the covenant were first proclaimed, access mountain; neither shall the flocks and the herds graze at the foot of this mountain.”

⁴So Moses carved two tablets of stone, like the first, and early in the morning he went up on Mount Sinai, as the LORD had commanded him, taking the two stone tablets with him. ⁵The LORD came down in a cloud; He stood with him there, and proclaimed the name LORD. ⁶The LORD passed before him ^aand proclaimed: “The LORD! the LORD!^a a God compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in kindness and faithfulness, ⁷extending kindness to the thousandth generation, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin; yet He does not remit all punishment, but visits the iniquity of parents upon children and children’s children, upon the third and fourth generations.”

⁸Moses hastened to bow low to the ground in homage, ⁹and said, “If I have gained Your favor, O Lord, pray, let the Lord go in our midst, even though this is a stiffnecked people. Pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for Your own!”

¹⁰He said: I hereby make a covenant. Before all your people I will work such wonders as have not been wrought on all the earth or in any nation; and all the people ^bwho are with you^b shall see how awesome are the LORD’s deeds which I will perform for you. ¹¹Mark well what I command you this day. I will drive out before you the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. ¹²Beware of making a cove-to the mountain is restricted (cf. 19.12, 21–24) in preparation for God’s descending to it (v. 5). 5–7: God grants both of Moses’ requests, passing His Presence before him (33.22) and proclaiming His ways (33.13). The name LORD [YHWH], that is, the attributes it represents. These attributes include both magnanimity (vv. 6–7a) and justice (v. 7b; cf. v. 14). Kindness and faithfulness, rather, “steadfast faithfulness” (Heb “hesed” [15.13 n.; 20.6 n.] and “emet”), extending Himself to those in covenant with Him; cf. Ps. 25.10 (rendered “steadfast love”). 7: Extending kindness . . . visits the iniquity . . ., 20.5–6 n. This v.

closely parallels the latter but it reverses the order, giving precedence to God’s magnanimous attributes in response to Moses’ plea for pardon. At the same time, its characterization of transgenerational reward and punishment is unconditional, unlike that in 20.5–6 which limits it to descendants who follow their ancestors’ ways. God’s sovereign right to dispense reward and punishment is not bound by the limits He imposes on human justice (Deut. 24.16). Yet He does not remit all punishment, Num. 14.19. God never entirely waives punishment, although it may be deferred, even to a later generation (see esp. 1 Kings 21.29). 8–9: Ignoring God’s punitive attributes, Moses invokes His magnanimous attributes and pleads that He cancel His refusal to go in Israel’s midst (vv. 3, 5) and forgive its sin. Take us for Your own, reestablish Israel as His own people. The Heb means “take us (back) as your inalienable hereditary property,” a metaphor frequently applied to Israel to express God’s attachment to them (Deut. 4.20; 9.29), “since a person’s personal property and his portion are dear to him” (Saadia Gaon, Book of Beliefs and Opinions, 2:11). Moses’ ignoring of God’s punitive qualities became a precedent in the Bible and in later Jewish practice, both of which frequently recite only God’s magnanimous attributes (e.g., Jonah 4.2; Joel 2.23; Ps. 86.15; and esp. Neh. 9.17–18, which refers to the golden calf episode; Ps. 25.4–11 is virtually a commentary on the magnanimous attributes), reflecting a firm belief that God is more magnanimous than punitive (Ezek. 18.23, 32). Jewish tradition reads the list of God’s magnanimous qualities as His “Thirteen Attributes.” It is recited as a prayer for forgiveness on various holidays, fast days, and other penitential occasions, especially the Days of Awe (the High Holidays). 10: God will (re)establish the covenant. He will lead Israel to the promised land with unprecedented miracles (cf. 9.13–10.29 n.). In return, Israel is to obey the following terms.

11–26: In view of the people’s recent religious sin, these terms restate their religious duties; they are a variant—in some details stricter—of the pertinent section of the Book of the Covenant (23.12–33; see comments there). In light of the people’s sin of idolatry, the order in the parallel section in ch 23 is reversed, presenting the laws against idolatry first and in greater detail (vv. 11–17 || 23.20–33) and then the religious calendar (vv. 18–26 || 23.12–19). 11: Cf. 23.23, 31b. 12–13: An expanded list (based on 23.32–33) of Canaanite cult objects that must be destroyed. Sacred posts, Heb nant with the inhabitants of the land against which you are advancing, lest they be a snare in your midst. ¹³No, you must tear down their altars, smash their pillars, and cut down their sacred posts; ¹⁴for you must not worship any other god, because the LORD, whose name is Impassioned, is an impassioned God. ¹⁵You must not make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, for they will lust after their gods and sacrifice to their gods and invite you, and you will eat of their sacrifices. ¹⁶And when you take wives from among their daughters for your sons, their daughters will lust after their gods and will cause your sons to lust after their gods.

¹⁷You shall not make molten gods for yourselves.

¹⁸You shall observe the Feast of Unleavened Bread—eating unleavened bread for seven days, as I have commanded you—at the set time of the month^a of Abib, for in the month of Abib you went forth from Egypt.

¹⁹Every first issue of the womb is Mine, from all your livestock that drop a male^b as firstling, whether cattle or sheep. ²⁰But the firstling of an ass you shall redeem with a sheep; if you do not redeem it, you must break its neck. And you must redeem every first-born among your sons.

None shall appear before Me empty-handed.

²¹Six days you shall work, but on the seventh day you shall cease from labor; you shall cease from labor even at plowing time and harvest time.

²⁵You shall not offer the blood of My sacrifice with anything leavened; and the sacrifice of the Feast of Passover shall not be left lying until morning.

²⁶The choice first fruits of your soil you shall bring to the house of the LORD your God.

You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk.

²⁷And the LORD said to Moses: Write down these com-

5, including the prohibition of worshipping any other god and the warning against provoking God's indignation (20.5 n.). This passage goes beyond 20.5 in stating that the LORD's very name is Impassioned, meaning that jealous indignation (20.5 n.) is another of the qualities embodied in His name or essence (33.19). This is possibly a play on the name YHWH , equating its root "h-v-h" with "h-w-y" used in Arabic with the meaning "passion." 15–16: This explains v. 12, warning that Canaanites remaining in the land would, especially through inter-marriage, seduce the Israelites into participating in their idolatry (cf. Num. 25.1–3). 17: You shall not make molten gods for yourselves, essentially a restatement of 20.4 in terms relevant to the present circumstances (32.4, 8). 18–26: Since in worshipping the calf the Israelites created an illicit religious festival (32.5), the calendar of legitimate festivals and related obligations is restated. 18: Cf. 23.14–15. 19–20a: A digression prompted by the connection of dedicating the first-born with the exodus; cf. 13.2, 11–15 and cf. 22.28–29. 20b: None shall appear before Me empty-handed, continuing v. 18; cf. 23.15b. 21: A further digression, prompted by the mention of the harvest in the next v. Even at plowing time and harvest time: The Sabbath (cf. 23.12) takes precedence even at the busiest time of the agricultural year, as it does when building the Tabernacle (31.12–17; 35.2–3). 22: Cf. 23.16. The Feast of Weeks is another name for the Feast of the Harvest. According to Lev. 23.15–16 and Deut. 16.9–10 it is observed seven weeks ("the weeks appointed for reaping," Jer. 5.24) after the Feast of Unleavened Bread. 23: Three times a year, on the three pilgrimage festivals (23.14–17 n.; Deut. 16.16). See 23.17. 24: The people need have no fear of an attack on their homes when they leave for the festivals (23.17 n.). Covet, rather, have designs on, scheme against (20.14). 25–26: See 12.6–11, 21–26; 23.18–19. 27: The commandments just received are to form the basis mandments, for in accordance with these commandments I make a covenant with you and with Israel.

²⁸ And he was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights; he ate no bread and drank no water; and he wrote down on the tablets the terms of the covenant, the Ten Commandments.

²⁹ So Moses came down from Mount Sinai. And as Moses came down from the mountain bearing the two tablets of the Pact, Moses was not aware that the skin of his face was radiant, since he had spoken with Him.

³⁰ Aaron and all the Israelites saw that the skin of Moses' face was radiant; and they shrank from coming near him.

³¹ But Moses called to them, and Aaron and all the chieftains in the assembly returned to him, and Moses spoke to them. ³² Afterward all the Israelites came near, and he instructed them concerning all that the LORD had imparted to him on Mount Sinai. ³³ And when Moses had finished speaking with them, he put a veil over his face.

35 Moses then convoked the whole Israelite community and said to them:

These are the things that the LORD has commanded you to do: ² On six days work may be done, but on the seventh day you shall have a sabbath of complete rest, holy to the of the restored covenant. 28: Forty days and forty nights, as when he received the first tablets (24.18). Ate no bread and drank no water: During his private, intimate encounter with God Moses was beyond human needs and concerns (contrast 24.9–11). He wrote down on the tablets the terms of the covenant, the Ten Commandments: In view of v. 1 and Deut. 10.4 this seems to mean that God wrote down the Decalogue, so that two covenant documents—vv. 11–26 and the Decalogue—resulted from this encounter, just as the terms of the earlier covenant included both the Decalogue and the Book of the Covenant (24.4, 7–8, 12; 31.18). But in the immediate context he wrote is most naturally construed as referring to Moses and the terms of the covenant as referring to the terms mentioned in vv. 11–26; this explains why some scholars call these verses the Cultic Decalogue. Their identification as the Decalogue—which God was to write on the tablets (v. 1)—is puzzling. The present text appears to combine two different traditions about what the terms of the covenant were. 29–35: Not only was Moses beyond human needs while with God (v. 27 n.), but his face came to radiate an awe-inspiring light. According to passages such as Ezek. 1.27–28; Hab. 3.4; Ps. 104.2, the divine Presence is surrounded by a radiant luminosity (a concept also found in Mesopotamian literature, where it is called “fearsome radiance”). Thus, from his lengthy and intense encounter with God, Moses' face came to reflect the divine radiance. In this way, the golden calf episode ends with the theme with which it began: Moses' role as Israel's conduit to God, which the people feared they had lost (32.1 n.), is reaffirmed and he is shown to be more than a common “man” (32.1). 29: Radiant, Heb “karan,” from “keren,” “horn,” in the sense of projection, emanation, as in Hab. 3.4 (“rays”). In the Vulgate, Jerome, in an overetymological translation, rendered “was horned,” although he knew from the Septuagint that the meaning was figurative. Nevertheless, his translation led to the image of Moses with horns in medieval and Renaissance art (see esp. Michelangelo's Moses), and eventually, coupled with the notion of Satan's horns, to the anti-Semitic belief that Jews have horns.

Chs 35–40: The construction of the Tabernacle and God's entrance into it. The people's change of heart following their rebellion is shown by their punctilious obedience to God's commands, highlighted by near verbatim correspondence between the instructions in chs 25–31 and their execution in 35–40, and by the recurring phrase “as the LORD had commanded Moses” in 38.32, 42, 43 and ch 39, and by their enthusiasm, indicated by recurrent references in ch 35 to their hearts and spirits moving them to give, to their freewill offerings (35.29; 36.3), and by their giving so much that they had to be stopped (36.3–7). In these chs the LXX has a slightly different order than the Hebrew.

35.1–3: The Sabbath reiterated. Moses begins with the Sabbath, the same subject with which God's instructions concluded in 31.12–17. It is an appropriate introduction to a section in which the word

LORD; whoever does any work on it shall be put to death.³ You shall kindle no fire throughout your settlements on the sabbath day.

This is what the LORD has commanded: ⁵Take from among you gifts to the LORD; everyone whose heart so moves him shall bring them—gifts for the LORD: gold, silver, and copper; ⁶blue, purple, and crimson yarns, fine linen, and goats' hair; ⁷tanned ram skins, dolphin skins, and acacia wood; ⁸oil for lighting, spices for the anointing oil and for the aromatic incense; ⁹lapis lazuli and other stones for setting, for the ephod and the breastpiece.

¹⁰And let all among you who are skilled come and make all that the LORD has commanded: ¹¹the Tabernacle, its tent and its covering, its clasps and its planks, its bars, its posts, and its sockets; ¹²the ark and its poles, the cover, and the curtain for the screen; ¹³the table, and its poles and all its utensils; and the bread of display; ¹⁴the lampstand for lighting, its furnishings and its lamps, and the oil for lighting; ¹⁵the altar of incense and its poles; the anointing oil and the aromatic incense; and the entrance screen for the entrance of the Tabernacle; ¹⁶the altar of burnt offering, its copper grating, its poles, and all its furnishings; the laver and its stand; ¹⁷the hangings of the enclosure, its posts and its sockets, and the screen for the gate of the court; ¹⁸the pegs for the Tabernacle, the pegs for the enclosure, and their cords; ¹⁹the service vestments for officiating in the sanctuary, the sacral vestments of Aaron the priest and the vestments of his sons for priestly service.

²⁰So the whole community of the Israelites left Moses' presence. ²¹And everyone who excelled in ability and everyone whose spirit moved him came, bringing to the LORD his offering for the work of the Tent of Meeting and for all its service and for the sacral vestments. ²²Men and women, all whose hearts moved them, all who would make an elevation offering of gold to the LORD, came bringing brooches, earrings, rings, and pendants^b—gold objects of all kinds. ²³And everyone who had in his possession blue, purple, and crimson yarns, fine linen, goats' hair, tanned ram skins, and dolphin skins, brought them; ²⁴everyone who would make gifts of silver or copper brought them as gifts for the LORD; and everyone who had in his possession acacia wood for any work of the service brought that. ²⁵And all the skilled women spun with their "work" (Heb "mela'khah") appears twenty-one more times.

3: You shall kindle no fire throughout your settlements on the sabbath day: Rabbinic exegesis holds that this prohibition does not forbid letting a previously kindled fire burn on the Sabbath, so long as it is not refueled on the Sabbath. The Karaite Jewish sect, however, took the law to prohibit the use even of a previously kindled fire and spent the Sabbath in darkness.

35.4–29: The call for donations and craftspeople and the people's response. 10–19: The contents of the Tabernacle are listed in more systematic order than in chs 25–31 (see introductory n. to 30.1–31.17). 21: For the work of the Tent of Meeting and for all its service, rather, "for the work on the Tent of Meeting, all the labor on it." The materials contributed were for the construction of the Tabernacle, not for the worship that would be conducted there afterwards. Heb "'avodah," translated "service" here and in 27.19; 30.16; 35.24; 36.1, 3, 5; 39.40, is better rendered "labor" (referring to construction). See esp. 36.1 where the "'avodah," performed by nonpriests, cannot refer to the worship service, which was conducted by the priests. 22: Elevation offering, 29.24 n. Gold objects of all kinds: The jewelry given by the Egyptians is now used to obey rather than violate God's commands (contrast 32.2–3). 25–26: And all the skilled women spun: Spinning was woman's work.

own hands, and brought what they had spun, in blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and in fine linen. ²⁶And all the women who excelled in that skill spun the goats' hair. ²⁷And the chieftains brought lapis lazuli and other stones for setting, for the ephod and for the breastpiece; ²⁸and spices and oil for lighting, for the anointing oil, and for the aromatic incense. ²⁹Thus the Israelites, all the men and women whose hearts moved them to bring anything for the work that the LORD, through Moses, had commanded to be done, brought it as a freewill offering to the LORD.

³⁰And Moses said to the Israelites: See, the LORD has singled out by name Bezalel, son of Uri son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah. ³¹He has endowed him with a divine spirit of skill, ability, and knowledge in every kind of craft ³²and "has inspired him" to make designs for work in gold, silver, and copper, ³³to cut stones for setting and to carve wood—to work in every kind of designer's craft—³⁴and to give directions. He and Oholiab son of Ahisamach of the tribe of Dan ³⁵have been endowed with the skill to do any work—of the carver, the designer, the embroiderer in blue, purple, crimson yarns, and in fine linen, 36 and of the weaver—as workers in all crafts and as makers of designs. ¹Let, then, Bezalel and Oholiab and all the skilled persons whom the LORD has endowed with skill and ability to perform expertly all the tasks connected with the service of the sanctuary carry out all that the LORD has commanded.

²Moses then called Bezalel and Oholiab, and every skilled person whom the LORD had endowed with skill, everyone who excelled in ability, to undertake the task and carry it out. ³They took over from Moses all the gifts that the Israelites had brought, to carry out the tasks connected with the service of the sanctuary. But when these continued to bring freewill offerings to him morning after morning, ⁴all the artisans who were engaged in the tasks of the sanctuary came, each from the task upon which he was engaged, ⁵and said to Moses, "The people are bringing more than is needed for the tasks entailed in the work that the LORD has commanded to be done." ⁶Moses thereupon had this proclamation made throughout the camp: "Let no man or woman make further effort toward gifts for the sanctuary!" So the people stopped bringing; ⁷their efforts had been more than enough for all the tasks to be done.

⁸Then all the skilled among those engaged in the work made the Tabernacle of ten strips of cloth, which they

35.30–36.1: The appointment of the master builders. The translation correctly ignores the ch break (a medieval innovation; there is none in the Heb text) since Moses' announcement continues through 36.1. 35.30: Moses informs the public of Bezalel and Oholiab's appointment. The Talmud, interpreting "see" as meaning "do you agree?" inferred that one must not appoint a public leader without first consulting the public (b. Ber. 54a with Rashi). 34: And to give directions, to instruct others in these skills.

36.2–7: The overabundance of donations. 3: Continued, even after the work began; see v. 4. The commencement of the work is related in v. 8.

36.8–38.20: The construction of the Tabernacle. As in 35.10–19, the contents are listed in a more systematic order than earlier.

made of fine twisted linen, blue, purple, and crimson yarns; into these they worked a design of cherubim. ⁹The length of each cloth was twenty-eight cubits, and the width of each cloth was four cubits, all cloths having the same measurements. ¹⁰They joined five of the cloths to one another, and they joined the other five cloths to one another. ¹¹They made loops of blue wool on the edge of the outermost cloth of the one set, and did the same on the edge of the outermost cloth of the other set: ¹²they made fifty loops on the one cloth, and they made fifty loops on the edge of the end cloth of the other set, the loops being opposite one another. ¹³And they made fifty gold clasps and coupled the units^a to one another with the clasps, so that the Tabernacle became one whole.

¹⁴They made cloths of goats' hair for a tent over the Tabernacle; they made the cloths eleven in number. ¹⁵The length of each cloth was thirty cubits, and the width of each cloth was four cubits, the eleven cloths having the same measurements. ¹⁶They joined five of the cloths by themselves, and the other six cloths by themselves. ¹⁷They made fifty loops on the edge of the outermost cloth of the one set, and they made fifty loops on the edge of the end cloth of the other set. ¹⁸They made fifty copper clasps to couple the Tent together so that it might become one whole. ¹⁹And they made a covering of tanned ram skins for the tent, and a covering of dolphin skins above.

²⁰They made the planks for the Tabernacle of acacia wood, upright. ²¹The length of each plank was ten cubits, the width of each plank a cubit and a half. ²²Each plank had two tenons, parallel^b to each other; they did the same with all the planks of the Tabernacle. ²³Of the planks of the Tabernacle, they made twenty planks for the south side,^c ²⁴making forty silver sockets under the twenty planks, two sockets under one plank for its two tenons and two sockets under each following plank for its two tenons; ²⁵and for the other side wall of the Tabernacle, the north side, twenty planks, ²⁶with their forty silver sockets, two sockets under one plank and two sockets under each following plank. ²⁷And for the rear of the Tabernacle, to the west, they made six planks; ²⁸and they made two planks for the corners of the Tabernacle at the rear. ²⁹^dThey matched at the bottom, but terminated as one at the top into one ring;^d they did so with both of them at the two corners. ³⁰Thus there were eight planks with their sockets of silver: sixteen sockets, two under each plank.

³⁷They made the screen for the entrance of the Tent, of blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and fine twisted linen, done in embroidery; ³⁸and five posts for it with their hooks. They overlaid their tops and their bands with gold; but the five sockets were of copper.

37 Bezalel made the ark of acacia wood, two and a half cubits long, a cubit and a half wide, and a cubit and a half high. ²He overlaid it with pure gold, inside and out; and he made a gold molding for it round about. ³He cast four gold rings for it, for its four feet: two rings on one of its side walls and two rings on the other. ⁴He made poles of acacia wood, overlaid them with gold, ⁵and inserted the poles into the rings on the side walls of the ark for carrying the ark.

⁶He made a cover of pure gold, two and a half cubits long and a cubit and a half wide. ⁷He made two cherubim of gold; he made them of hammered work, at the two ends of the cover: ⁸one cherub at one end and the other cherub at the other end; he made the cherubim of one piece with the cover, at its two ends. ⁹The cherubim had their wings spread out above, shielding the cover with their wings. They faced each other; the faces of the cherubim were turned toward the cover.

with gold. ¹⁶The utensils that were to be upon the table—its bowls, ladles, jugs, and jars with which to offer libations—he made of pure gold.

¹⁷He made the lampstand of pure gold. He made the lampstand—its base and its shaft—of hammered work; its cups, calyxes, and petals were of one piece with it. ¹⁸Six branches issued from its sides: three branches from one side of the lampstand, and three branches from the other side of the lampstand. ¹⁹There were three cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals, on one branch; and there were three cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals, on the next branch; so for all six branches issuing from the lampstand. ²⁰On the lampstand itself there were four cups shaped like almond-blossoms, each with calyx and petals: ²¹a calyx, of one piece with it, under a pair of branches; and a calyx, of one piece with it, under the second pair of branches; and a calyx, of one piece with it, under the last pair of branches; so for all six branches issuing from it. ²²Their calyxes and their stems were of one piece with it, the whole of it a single hammered piece of pure gold. ²³He made its seven lamps, its tongs, and its fire pans of pure gold. ²⁴He made it and all its furnishings out of a talent of pure gold.

²⁵He made the incense altar of acacia wood, a cubit long and a cubit wide—square—and two cubits high; its horns were of one piece with it. ²⁶He overlaid it with pure gold: its top, its sides round about, and its horns; and he made a gold molding for it round about. ²⁷He made two gold rings for it under its molding, on its two walls—on opposite sides—as holders for the poles with which to carry it. ²⁸He made the poles of acacia wood, and overlaid them with gold. ²⁹He prepared the sacred anointing oil and the pure aromatic incense, expertly blended.

38 He made the altar for burnt offering of acacia wood, five cubits long and five cubits wide—square—and three cubits high. ²He made horns for it on its four corners, the horns being of one piece with it; and he overlaid it with copper. ³He made all the utensils of the altar—the pails, the scrapers, the basins, the flesh hooks, and the fire pans; he made all these utensils of copper. ⁴He made for the altar a grating of meshwork in copper, extending below, under its ledge, to its middle. ⁵He cast four rings, at the four corners of the copper grating, as holders for the poles. ⁶He made the poles of acacia wood and overlaid them with copper; ⁷and he inserted the poles into the rings on the side walls of the altar, to carry it by them. He made it hollow, of boards.

37.29: The anointing oil and the incense. See 30.22–37. The incense is mentioned here because it would be burnt on the incense altar. The anointing oil is mentioned with it by association, since it too is a compound.

38.1–8: The altar of burnt offering and the laver. See 27.1–8; 30.17–21. These would stand in the courtyard. Note that they are not separated from each other as they were when first mentioned. 8: The laver is not made from the copper (bronze) donated by the general public (vv. 29–31) but from a separate gift from the women who performed tasks at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting: The same class of women is mentioned in 1 Sam. 2.22 but there is no indication of what they did. The Heb phrase translated performed tasks refers to the Levites performing physical labor in Num. 4.23; 8.24. This notice is doubly enigmatic since the Tent has not yet been erected. It indicates some role for women in connection with the Tabernacle (see 35.22).

⁹He made the enclosure:

On the south^b side, a hundred cubits of hangings of fine twisted linen for the enclosure—¹⁰with their twenty posts and their twenty sockets of copper, the hooks and bands of the posts being silver.

¹¹On the north side, a hundred cubits—with their twenty posts and their twenty sockets of copper, the hooks and bands of the posts being silver.

¹²On the west side, fifty cubits of hangings—with their ten posts and their ten sockets, the hooks and bands of the posts being silver.

¹³And on the front side, to the east, fifty cubits: ¹⁴fifteen cubits of hangings on the one flank, with their three posts and their three sockets, ¹⁵and fifteen cubits of hangings on the other flank—on each side of the gate of the enclosure^c—with their three posts and their three sockets.

38.21–31: The tally of materials.

A tally of donations was being made as they were given (cf. 36.3–7). (Egyptian art shows metal being weighed and recorded before being used by the artisans [ANEP no. 133].) The items are listed in descending order of value. The list is not balanced. It includes the total of all the gold donated by the general public and used throughout the sanctuary, but does not identify the specific items made with it. On the other hand, it tallies, and specifies the items made with, the silver acquired from the census (30.11–16), but not that given in the general donation (35.24; it is not known what was done with the latter, since the former was used for everything that is supposed to be made of silver [26.19–32; 27.10–11, 17]). In contrast to the silver, it tallies, and specifies articles made with, the copper/bronze given in the general donation (35.25), but not that obtained from the women's mirrors (38.8). For the fabrics in 39.1 (if they are part of this list), no quantities are given at all.

work of the sanctuary—the elevation offering of gold—came to 29 talents^a and 730 shekels by the sanctuary weight. ²⁵The silver of those of the community who were recorded came to 100 talents and 1,775 shekels by the sanctuary weight: ²⁶a half-shekel^b a head, half a shekel by the sanctuary weight, for each one who was entered in the records, from the age of twenty years up, 603,550 men. ²⁷The 100 talents of silver were for casting the sockets of the sanctuary and the sockets for the curtain, 100 sockets to the 100 talents, a talent a socket. ²⁸And of the 1,775 shekels he made hooks for the posts, overlay for their tops, and bands around them.

²⁹The copper from the elevation offering came to 70 talents and 2,400 shekels. ³⁰Of it he made the sockets for the entrance of the Tent of Meeting; the copper altar and its copper grating and all the utensils of the altar; ³¹the sockets of the enclosure round about and the sockets of the gate of the enclosure; and all the pegs of the Tabernacle and all the pegs of the enclosure round about.

²The ephod was made^d of gold, blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and fine twisted linen. ³They hammered out sheets of gold and cut threads to be worked into designs among the blue, the purple, and the crimson yarns, and the fine linen. ⁴They made for it attaching shoulder-pieces; they were attached at its two ends. ⁵The decorated band that was upon it was made like it, of one piece with it; of gold, blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and fine twisted linen—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

⁸The breastpiece was made in the style of the ephod: of gold, blue, purple, and crimson yarns, and fine twisted linen. ⁹It was square; they made the breastpiece doubled—a span in length and a span in width, doubled. ¹⁰They set in it four rows of stones. The first row was a ¹⁴The stones corresponded [in number] to the names of the sons of Israel: twelve, corresponding to their names; engraved like seals, each with its name, for the twelve tribes.

¹⁵On the breastpiece they made braided chains of corded work in pure gold. ¹⁶They made two frames of gold and two rings of gold, and fastened the two rings at the two ends of the breastpiece, ¹⁷attaching the two golden cords to the two rings at the ends of the breastpiece. ¹⁸They then fastened the two ends of the cords to the two frames, attaching them to the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, at the front. ¹⁹They made two rings of gold and attached them to the two ends of the breastpiece, at its inner edge, which faced the ephod. ²⁰They made two other rings of gold and fastened them on the front of the ephod, low on the two shoulder-pieces, close to its seam above the decorated band. ²¹The breastpiece was held in place by a cord of blue from its rings to the rings of the ephod, so that the breastpiece rested on the decorated band and did not come loose from the ephod—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

³²Thus was completed all the work of the Tabernacle of the Tent of Meeting. The Israelites did so; just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so they did.

³³Then they brought the Tabernacle to Moses, with the Tent and all its furnishings: its clasps, its planks, its bars, its posts, and its sockets; ³⁴the covering of tanned ram skins, the covering of dolphin skins, and the curtain for the screen; ³⁵the Ark of the Pact and its poles, and the cover; ³⁶the table and all its utensils, and the bread of display; ³⁷the pure lampstand,^a its lamps—lamps in due order—and all its fittings, and the oil for lighting; ³⁸the altar of gold, the oil for anointing, the aromatic incense, and the screen for the entrance of the Tent; ³⁹the copper altar with its copper grating, its poles and all its utensils, and the laver and its stand; ⁴⁰the hangings of the enclosure, its posts and its sockets, the screen for the gate of the enclosure, its cords and its pegs—all the furnishings for the service of the Tabernacle, the Tent of Meeting; ⁴¹the service vestments for officiating in the sanctuary, the sacral vestments of Aaron the priest, and the vestments of his sons for priestly service. ⁴²Just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so the Israelites had done all the work. ⁴³And when Moses saw that they had performed all the tasks—as the LORD had commanded, so they had done—Moses blessed them.

39.32–43: The completion and inspection of the Tabernacle's components. This section begins and ends by indicating that everything was made exactly as God had commanded. See chs 35–40 n. As in 35.10–19; 36.8–38.20, the contents of the Tabernacle are listed in a more systematic order than earlier. 32: Thus was completed all the work of the Tabernacle of the Tent of Meeting: The phraseology (see also 40.33 n.) alludes to the completion of the creation of the world in Gen.

2.1, 3, one of several echoes of the Priestly source's account of creation here in the Priestly account of the creation of the Tabernacle (see 25.1–31.17 n.). The leitmotif of this section, mentioned seven times, that each item was made exactly "as the LORD had commanded Moses" echoes the sevenfold repetition of the formula "and there/it was (so)" in Gen. ch 1, indicating that all happened as God commanded (see also vv. 17–33 with reference to setting up the Tabernacle). The section ends with Moses inspecting ("seeing") everything that was made and blessing the people (cf. Gen. 1.31; 2.3; see v. 43 n. regarding phraseology), and the Tabernacle is completed on New Year's day (40.17). See also 40.11 n. All of these allusions reflect the view that the sanctuary and the world mirror each other and that actions of the priests officiating in the sanctuary mirror God's actions in creating the world (note esp. the role of dividing/discriminating ["havdel"] in creation and in the priests' duties, Gen. 1.4, 6, 14; Lev. 10.10). The Tabernacle of the Tent of Meeting: This designation (see also v. 40) combines the two main terms for the sanctuary, expressing its two main functions. See 25.8 n. 34: And the curtain for the screen, the screen at the entrance to the Holy of Holies (26.31–33). The curtain, for the entrance to the Holy of Holies (26.31–33). 38: The altar of gold, the incense altar, overlaid with gold (31.1–9). 39: The copper altar, the main sacrificial altar (27.1–8). 43: And when Moses saw that they had performed all the tasks, lit. "And Moses saw all the work, and behold . . ." echoing Gen. 1.31, lit. "And God saw all that He had made, and behold . . ." "Work" (Heb "mela'khah") is the term used for God's work of creation in Gen. 2.2–3 (see also introductory note to 35.2–3). Moses blessed them, another echo of the Priestly creation account, though here it is Moses who blesses; cf. Gen. 1.22, 28; 2.3.

Only Moses can set up the components of the Tabernacle because only he has been shown visually how the Tabernacle is to look (25.9 n.). ⁹You shall take the anointing oil and anoint the Tabernacle and all that is in it to consecrate it and all its furnishings, so that it shall be holy. ¹⁰Then anoint the altar of burnt offering and all its utensils to consecrate the altar, so that the altar shall be most holy. ¹¹And anoint the laver and its stand to consecrate it.

¹²You shall bring Aaron and his sons forward to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and wash them with the water. ¹³Put the sacral vestments on Aaron, and anoint him and consecrate him, that he may serve Me as priest. ¹⁴Then bring his sons forward, put tunics on them, ¹⁵and anoint them as you have anointed their father, that they may serve Me as priests. This their anointing shall serve them for everlasting priesthood throughout the ages.

²⁸Then he put up the screen for the entrance of the Tabernacle. ²⁹At the entrance of the Tabernacle of the Tent of Meeting he placed the altar of burnt offering. On it he offered up the burnt offering and the meal offering—as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁰He placed the laver

40.9–16: Consecrating the Tabernacle and the priests. See 30.26–30; 29.4–9. 9: Consecrate it . . . so that it shall be holy, lit. “make it holy . . . so that it shall be holy.” This phrase in this context, with its allusions to the creation story (39.32 n.) reminds one of God’s consecrating the seventh day (“declared it holy” is the same Heb word) in Gen. 2.3. 16: This Moses did, referring to the instructions in vv. 1–15, which Moses carries out in two stages: He sets up the Tabernacle in vv. 17–33 and consecrates it and the priests in Lev. 8.1–13. Just as the LORD had commanded him, so he did: A slightly different form of this statement appears seven times in vv. 17–33.

40.17–33a: Setting up the Tabernacle. 27: There is no explicit command for Moses to burn the incense or offer the sacrifices (v. 29), but his doing so is consistent with God’s commands that he perform the other priestly duties of laying out the bread and lighting the lamps (vv. 4, 23, 25) prior to the priests’ consecration. The reference to Moses approaching the altar in vv. 31–32 must refer to the same pre-consecration period.

between the Tent of Meeting and the altar, and put water in it for washing. ³¹From it Moses and Aaron and his sons would wash their hands and feet; ³²they washed when they entered the Tent of Meeting and when they approached the altar—as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³³And he set up the enclosure around the Tabernacle and the altar, and put up the screen for the gate of the enclosure.

When Moses had finished the work, ³⁴the cloud covered the Tent of Meeting, and the Presence of the LORD filled the Tabernacle. ³⁵Moses could not enter the Tent of Meeting, because the cloud had settled upon it and the Presence of the LORD filled the Tabernacle. ³⁶When the cloud lifted from the Tabernacle, the Israelites would set out, on their various journeys; ³⁷but if the cloud did not lift, they would not set out until such time as it did lift. ³⁸For over the Tabernacle a cloud of the LORD rested by day, and fire would appear in it^a by night, in the view of all the house of Israel throughout their journeys.

40.33b–38: The divine Presence enters the Tabernacle: With the Tabernacle complete, God's Presence (16.6–7 n.) leaves Mount Sinai and takes up Its abode amidst the Israelites, fulfilling the promise of 29.43, 45 and signifying the complete repair of the rupture between God and Israel occasioned by the golden calf. From there God will communicate with Moses from now on (Lev. 1.1) and will accompany the Israelites on their journeys (24.16 n.; 25.1–31.17 n.).

33: When Moses had finished the work, another echo of creation; see Gen. 2.2. The cloud, in which God's Presence is manifest; see 13.21 n., 22 n.; 24.15. As it covered Mount Sinai, it now covers the Tabernacle, where it will remain to guide Israel. For the appearance of fire within it at night, see 13.21 n.

36–38: These vv. look ahead to Israel's future journeys accompanied by God (Num. 9.15–23; 10.11–28). The narrative will resume in Leviticus with God's call to Moses from the Tent (Lev. 1.1) and the consecration of the priests in Lev. chs 8–9. But at this point Exodus ends, allowing the reader to contemplate the phenomenon of God dwelling on earth with a symbol of His Presence in full view of the Israelites (cf. 1 Kings 8.27).

Leviticus

LEVITICUS, THE THIRD BOOK OF THE TORAH, is traditionally called vayikra (“and He [the LORD] called,” but see 1.1 n.), after the first word in the book. It was also called torat kohanim, “instruction of (or ‘for’) the priests” in rabbinic times, hence its Greek name Levitikon, “things pertaining to the Levites” (i.e., the priests, who are of the tribe of Levi), referring to the book’s main concern with commandments connected with the worship of God, for which the priests were responsible.

Context

LEVITICUS IS PART OF A LONG NARRATIVE, extending from Exodus ch 25 to Numbers ch 10, that may be called “When the Tabernacle Stood at Sinai.” It begins with God’s instructions to Moses to provide a portable residence (called a mishkan, “Tabernacle,” lit. “dwelling,” or mikdash, “holy place”) for the divine Presence (the LORD’s kavod) and to consecrate his brother Aaron and the latter’s sons as priests. The Tabernacle was also the place for God to meet regularly with Moses to impart His laws (Exod. 25.22); thus it is also called the ’ohel mo’ed, “Tent of Meeting.” The Tabernacle and all its appurtenances were manufactured at the foot of Mount Sinai; the divine Presence took up residence; the priests were consecrated and sacrificial worship commenced; the laws were conveyed; the priests, Levites, and remaining tribes were mustered and arranged and instructions for the journey to Canaan were given; and finally the Israelites departed from Sinai on their journey to Canaan.

The Tabernacle narrative stands at the center of the Torah, and although it takes up almost a third of the Torah, it covers a timespan of less than one year. This indicates its crucial importance. All the institutions that ultimately shaped Israel’s national and religious existence—the law, the priesthood, the forms of Temple worship and the tribal foundation of its society—are said to have been ordained and established during this brief period in Israel’s history.

According to the story that emerges from the Torah as a whole, the Tabernacle narrative is a stage in Israel’s sojourn at Sinai, interwoven with the theophany and proclamation of the Decalogue (Exod. chs 19–20), the giving of the laws and the covenant ceremony (Exod. chs 21–24), the giving of the two sets of tablets, and the incident of the golden calf (Exod. chs 32–34). However, according to the critical theory that separates the Torah into sources which were originally distinct and independent (see “Modern Study of the Bible,” pp. 2084–96), the literary source that contained the Tabernacle narrative called the Priestly document, or P, contained none of these other events. In P’s view, only the events recounted by the Tabernacle narrative took place. The centrality of the Tabernacle narrative is therefore far more pronounced in P than in the redacted Torah, since, in P, only in connection with the arrival of the divine Presence to dwell among the Israelites was a code of law given and the social structure established; no other theophany or covenant preceded it and no sin of collective apostasy followed.

Content and Structure

LEVITICUS IS THE DIRECT CONTINUATION of what precedes it at the end of Exodus, and the narrative at the end of Leviticus continues directly into Numbers. Ch 1 takes up the story from the time the divine Presence enters the Tabernacle, on the first day of Nisan (the first month, in the spring) in the year following the exodus (Exod. ch 40). From within, God calls to Moses and imparts to him, in a series of encounters (Lev. chs 1–27), His laws and commandments. Since Numbers begins on the first day of ‘Iyar (the second month) in the same year (Num. 1.1), it emerges that the entire book of Leviticus covers but one month.

The first group of laws, on sacrifice (chs 1–7), are given on the first day of the month, the day the Presence entered the Tabernacle (see 7.37–38). Then, interrupting the law-giving, is the consecration of the priesthood (ch 8), the dedication of the Tabernacle (ch 9), and the crime and immediate death of Aaron’s sons (10.1–7, 12–20). The law-giving resumes as Moses is given the commandments concerning permitted and forbidden foods (ch 11), the purification and atonement following physical defilement (chs 12–15), the annual “Day of Atonement” (ch 16), prohibitions of profane slaughter and blood (ch 17), sexual crimes (chs 18, 20), miscellaneous regulations assuring Israel’s holiness (ch 19), the sanctity of the priests (ch 21), the qualifications for sacrificial animals (ch 22), the weekly Sabbath and annual festivals (ch 23), the oil for the Tabernacle lamp (24.1–4), and the showbread (24.5–9). Again the law-giving is briefly interrupted, this time to recount the crime of the blasphemer and his execution (24.10–16, 23). It concludes with the laws of the sabbatical and jubilee years, including laws of slavery and property rights (25.1–26.2), a lengthy speech promising reward for compliance and punishment for failure to obey (26.3–45), and a summarizing caption (26.46). Then the laws of vows and tithes (ch 27) are appended and the caption is repeated (27.34).

The two narratives that interrupt the laws lead to brief legal sections. Thus following the crime of Nadab and Abihu, Moses clarifies for Aaron and his surviving sons the law regulating the proper disposal of sacrificial offerings (10.12–19); and while pronouncing sentence upon the blasphemer, God also imparts the laws of damages, governed by the eye-for-eye principle (24.17–22).

The complex interaction of narrative and law displayed in Leviticus is the defining literary feature of the Torah and of the Priestly document in particular. Both are narrative works, but the purpose of the narrative is to provide the literary framework, and thus the historical rationale and theological explanation, for the laws and commandments which are embedded within the narrative.

Composition

MODERN BIBLE SCHOLARS AGREE that all of Leviticus belongs to the Priestly source (P). If, however, the Torah is treated as a unified whole, the laws and narratives belonging to the Priestly source must be reconciled and harmonized with the non-Priestly material, so that they all interact and complement each other. This is done by traditional Jewish interpretation, and also by modern scholars who hold that the Priestly source was composed as a supplement to the non-Priestly sources. This commentary, however, believes that the Priestly work does not interact on any primary level with the non-Priestly material, so its main aim is to demonstrate the uniqueness of the Priestly tradition by pointing out the contrast between P and the other sources. The harmonistic approach will be illustrated only for the purpose of comparison and to explain the basis of traditional Jewish interpretations.

Date

THE BOOK OF LEVITICUS, like the other books of the Torah, came into existence as a defined literary entity no earlier than the time of the Babylonian exile in the 6th century. On the date of P there is much disagreement. This commentary will espouse the view that the Priestly source was the product of learned scribes of the Jerusalemite priesthood of the last centuries of the Judean kingdom and that it took shape in two phases, the Holiness Legislation (H) (chs 17–26) being added to the Priestly work in the final years before the exile.

Leviticus and Judaism

THE STUDY OF THE LAWS in Leviticus stood at the center of rabbinic learning, and the halakhic midrash on Leviticus was called simply Sifra, or “the Book.” It was customary for small children to begin their study of the Bible with Leviticus. The traditional explanation for this is that “the pure” (i.e., children) should be engaged in the study of purity (i.e., the laws of purification and atonement). A more likely reason is that Leviticus contains most of the laws which the Jew is commanded to observe on a regular basis, and it was only natural that the child’s program of study should begin with the practical knowledge required for the life of mitzvot (commandments).

Even after the destruction of the Temple and the cessation of sacrificial worship and Temple ritual, Leviticus remains at the foundation of Jewish life. Among the institutions still central to Judaism which have their biblical origins in Leviticus are most of the dietary laws (the permitted and forbidden animals, and the blood prohibition); many of the festival rituals; most of the laws regulating sex, marriage, and family purity; and the commandments governing the seventh year, still applicable in the land of Israel. Moreover, the religious life of the congregation, centered upon the synagogue and the daily prayers offered at fixed times and in precisely ordained ritual forms, is a direct outgrowth of, and according to rabbinic tradition a substitute for, the Temple ritual as envisioned in Leviticus.

Another aspect of the heritage of Leviticus that has become normative in Judaism is its unique theology of the performance of mitzvot. Leviticus teaches that the ritual commandments and the ethical or social ones (in rabbinic terms: mitzvot between a human being and God and mitzvot between fellow human beings) are equally important and equally valid. To be precise, there is really no such thing as a mitzvah pertaining solely to interpersonal relations; the love of one's neighbor is a divine command (see 19.18), and every offense against one's fellow human being desecrates the name of God. This idea, which has taken shape and developed over the centuries and has ultimately become a central pillar of Jewish religious thought, derives directly from the book of Leviticus, where it is summed up in a single verse: "You shall each revere his mother and his father, and keep My sabbaths: I the LORD am your God" (19.3).

Finally, nowhere outside of Leviticus is there a clearer articulation of the reason for the Jewish people's existence. God has entered into a relationship with the Israelites so that they might perpetually sanctify His name. Their role in the world, and in history, is to attest to His existence, to publicize His oneness, and to advertise His greatness. This they are commanded to do by worshipping Him and keeping His laws. When they fail to do so, His name is profaned, that is, His fame is diminished and His reputation tarnished; when they live up to this charge and duty, He and His name are sanctified. This statement, explicit in 22.31–33 and implicit throughout the book, has remained fundamental to Jewish belief and consciousness throughout all generations.

1 The LORD called to Moses and spoke to him from the Tent of Meeting, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people, and say to them:

When any of you presents an offering of cattle to the LORD, ^ahe shall choose his-^a offering from the herd or from the flock.

a-a Lit. "you shall offer your."

1.1–3.17: Gift offerings. Chs 1–3 are a single, uninterrupted divine speech. The theme is "gift offerings," expressed in the word "isheh," "food gift," used in each ch to characterize the offering prescribed (see 1.9 n.). Gift offerings, as distinct from expiatory sacrifices (treated in chs 4–5), express the worshipper's desire to present something to the LORD as a token of love and reverence. The Rabbis referred to them as "nedavah," "voluntary offerings," since they could be made at will—in fulfillment of vows, at private visits to the sanctuary, in supplication in times of distress, in gratitude for deliverance from danger or harm, or simply in a spontaneous urge to pay homage to God. Each of the subsections corresponds to one of the three types of gift offering: the burnt offering (ch 1), the cereal offering (ch 2), and the sacrifice of well-being (ch 3). While the burnt offering and cereal offering also figure prominently in the ordained public rituals performed by the priests on specified occasions, the sacrifice of well-being belongs almost entirely to the realm of individual piety.

1.1–17: Burnt offerings from the herd and flock. As with the other offerings in chs 1–3, only some of the procedures are detailed here. Some have already been given with the instructions for the consecration ceremonies (Exod. 29.15–18), and others are implicit in the instructions for other sacrifices. The text economizes, preferring not to repeat material found in other contexts. The defining feature of the burnt offering is that none of the meat is eaten; it is burned on the altar in its entirety. This makes it the gift-offering par excellence. The text does not specify the circumstances that might occasion a burnt offering, but Noah's sacrifices of thanksgiving or propitiation after the flood (Gen. 8.20), Abraham's near-sacrifice of Isaac (Gen. ch 22), Balaam's sacrifices entreating divine vision (Num. 23.15; etc.), Saul's sacrifices before battle (1 Sam. 13.12), and Job's sacrifices of atonement for his sons' hypothetical sins (Job 1.5), among many others, were burnt offerings. Since it also comprised the central component of the statutory public offerings, the altar in the Tabernacle court is called "the altar of the offering" (Exod. 30.28; etc.). 1: This is connected to the P narrative at the end of Exodus, so it should be translated "and it [the Presence of the LORD (Exod. 40.35)] called out to Moses." After it filled the Tabernacle, the Presence called to Moses from within. A distinction is made between the Presence, which called, and the LORD Himself, who spoke; this is similar to the first encounter with God experienced by the prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. 1.28–2.1ff.). Tent of Meeting, one of the names for the Tabernacle; see the intro. 2: The heading for chs 1–3. According to the Masoretic accents, the v. should be translated as two separate provisions. The first, "When any of you presents an offering, [it must be] to the LORD," is the basic postulate of all Israelite worship: Sacrifices are to be made to the LORD alone. The second goes on to stipulate: "He shall make his offering of livestock, that is, from the herd or from the flock." This preserves the original intent of the second half of the v.: Offerings must be of livestock. Later, when the laws allowing burnt offerings from fowl (vv. 14–17) and cereal offerings (2.1–16) were added, the v. was understood to mean that when one wished to sacrifice livestock, the choice was limited to domestic animals. Any of you: Heb "'adam," "human being," refers to male and female alike (see Gen. 1.27; 5.2, also P). In P opportunities for individual worship are identical for male and female; only the public ritual was confined to males, namely, the Aaronic priesthood. 3–13: The burnt offering. See also 6.1–6; 7.8. 3–9: Making a burnt offering from the herd. Instructions follow for a third type of burnt offering, made from fowl (vv. 14–17). The fowl offering, which does not fit the explicit provision "you shall choose your offering from the herd or from the flock" (v. 2), was apparently not part of the original text. The offerer is responsible for acquiring the proper animal (see 22.17–20), bringing it to the Tabernacle entrance, placing his hand upon its head as an act of presentation, slaughtering it, removing the hide and flaying the animal. The priest performs the remaining actions: presenting the blood, dashing some of it around the altar in the Tabernacle courtyard, placing the quarters, head, and suet on the altar fire, washing the entrails and legs and placing them too on the altar, and seeing that all the flesh is "turned into smoke," that is, consumed completely until nothing but ashes remain. 3: An offering, Heb "korban," a term expressing the notion of something presented (from Heb "k-r-b," "near") in homage. It does not mean "sacrifice" in the sense of "giving something up." Burnt offering, Heb "'olah," from the verb "'-l-h," "go up, ascend"; the distinguishing visible feature of all altar sacrifices was the smoke ascending heavenward. For acceptance in his behalf: Central to all gift-offerings is the worshipper's need to know that the deity has accepted his gift; this is consistently referred to as "ratzon," "acceptance" (see 22.17–20). 4: Lay his hand, to signify the transfer of ownership of the animal to the deity. Acceptable, correctly: "accepted"; see 7.18; 19.5–8; 22.17–30. In expiation for him, Heb "kipper," often translated "atone," has two meanings in P: "decontaminate [the sacred precincts] of sin or defilement" (see 4.1–5.26 n.) and "serve as ransom or payment [for one's life]" (see 17.11 n.). The latter seems to be intended here; that is why it is mentioned along with the hand-laying ritual: The moment ownership of the animal is transferred to the deity, it is accepted as payment, i.e., as a substitute for the worshipper himself. The lay person's private burnt offering would then be one way of symbolically offering oneself to God. The Rabbis ruled that the burnt offering be given in expiation for the failure to carry out performative commandments. 5: The bull shall be slaughtered, better, [the offerer] shall slaughter the bull. This is not strictly a part of the ritual in that no sacral significance was attached to the animal's death. Heb "sh-ḥ-t" implies that the slaughter is performed by slitting the throat, but since the Bible provides no details, rabbinic tradition held that the specifics were communicated orally by God to Moses. Offer the blood . . . against all sides of the altar: This is a symbolic method of offer-altar which is at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ⁶The burnt offering shall be flayed and cut up into sections. ⁷The sons of Aaron the priest shall put fire on the altar and lay out wood upon the fire; ⁸and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall lay out the sections, with the head and the suet, on the wood that is on the fire upon the altar. ⁹Its entrails and legs shall be washed with water, and the priest shall turn the whole into smoke on the altar as a burnt offering, an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD.

³If his offering is a burnt offering from the herd, he shall make his offering a male without blemish. He shall bring it to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, for acceptance in his behalf before the LORD. ⁴He shall lay his hand upon the head of the burnt offering, that it may be acceptable in his behalf, in expiation for him. ⁵The bull shall be slaughtered before the LORD; and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall offer the blood, dashing the blood against all sides of the

ing the blood to the LORD. 6: Shall be flayed by the offerer. The division of labor is clear. The offerer is responsible for the mundane tasks of transferring ownership of the animal and transforming it from a living animal into food fit for consumption; the priests are responsible for the sacred tasks of dashing the blood and offering the flesh as a gift to the LORD. 7: Fire here, as in many passages, probably means burning coals. The priests were required to maintain a constant altar fire on the altar (see 6.6). 9: An offering by fire: Heb "'ishēh" is not derived from "'esh," "fire," but from a root meaning "gift." Thus a better translation is "food gift," since the word denotes burnt offerings, cereal offerings, and sacrifices of well-being. It is not used for the purification and reparation offerings, as the latter are not gifts but rituals of expiation. Of pleasing odor to the LORD: P's unique anthro-pomorphism attributes to God the sensual, carnal pleasure derived from inhaling the fragrant odor of roasting meat while at the same time denying that He actually consumes it as food. Similarly, P portrays God's Presence as abiding within the Tabernacle, but offerings presented to Him are turned into smoke and ascend heavenward. The LORD's contrasting human and supernatural traits, as well as His opposite attributes of immanence and transcendence, exist in P side by side. 10–13: A burnt offering from the flock (sheep and goats) is like offerings from the herd (cattle). 14–17: Making a burnt offering from fowl, presumably for those who could not afford a sacrifice of livestock. The birds that qualify as offerings, turtledoves and pigeons, are the two types of domesticated fowl used for human consumption. The particulars of the procedure stem from the nature of fowl and its small size. The wingspread is left intact so that the carcass placed upon the altar will not appear ridiculously small. 16: The first part of the v. should be translated "He shall remove its feathers and its excrement." These are to be cast into the ash-heap alongside the altar.

2.1–16: The offering of grain. Instructions for the "minḥa" (see also 6.7–16). The word means tribute paid to a superior (e.g., Gen. 32.14, 22; etc.) or a ruler (e.g., Judg. 3.15ff.; 1 Sam. 10.27), and is used in non-Priestly texts to refer to sacrifices in general, e.g., Cain and Abel's offerings (Gen. 4.3–5) and the offerings at the Shiloh sanctuary (1 Sam. 2.17). This expresses the basic notion underlying the sacrificial system: that the Israelites, as a people and as individuals, are expected to offer to God regular tokens of His lordship over them. P uses the term in a specific sense of "offering made of grain." This ch interrupts the original sequence of burnt offering and well-being offering; it was introduced here to provide an opportunity for even the poorest Israelite

Aaron's sons, the priests. The priest shall scoop out of it a handful of its choice flour and oil, as well as all of its frankincense; and this token portion he shall turn into smoke on the altar, as an offering by fire, of pleasing odor to the LORD.³ And the remainder of the meal offering shall be for Aaron and his sons, a most holy portion from the LORD's offerings by fire.

⁴When you present an offering of meal baked in the oven, [it shall be of] choice flour: unleavened cakes with oil mixed in, or unleavened wafers spread with oil.

⁵If your offering is a meal offering on a griddle, it shall be of choice flour with oil mixed in, unleavened. ⁶Break it into bits and pour oil on it; it is a meal offering.

⁷If your offering is a meal offering in a pan, it shall be made of choice flour in oil.

⁸When you present to the LORD a meal offering that is made in any of these ways, it shall be brought to the priest who shall take it up to the altar. ⁹The priest shall remove the token portion from the meal offering and turn it into smoke on the altar as an offering by fire, of pleasing odor to the LORD. ¹⁰And the remainder of the meal offering shall be for Aaron and his sons, a most holy portion from the LORD's offerings by fire.

¹¹No meal offering that you offer to the LORD shall be made with leaven, for no leaven or honey may be turned into smoke as an offering by fire to the LORD. ¹²You may bring them to the LORD as an offering of choice products;^a to make a freewill offering, from grain. The "minḥa" also figures prominently among the statutory public offerings, accompanying the burnt offerings made each morning and evening. The public "minḥa" (see Exod. 29.40; 40.29; Num. 28.5; etc.), especially that which was a part of the daily evening sacrifice, eventually gave its name to the afternoon prayer, known since rabbinic times as the "minḥa" prayer. 1–8: Types of grain offering. The two essential ingredients are semolina of wheat and [olive] oil; these give it its character of a food gift (the oil was also necessary to facilitate the burning). Several variations exist. The uncooked mixture (v. 1) requires the addition of frankincense, so it is the most costly. The remaining types, requiring no frankincense, involve some preparation of unleavened cakes: oven-baked (as loaves or wafers, v. 4), griddle-toasted (and crumbled, vv. 5–6), and pan-fried (v. 7); see also 7.9–10. The grain offering is prepared by the worshipper and presented in its entirety to the priest. Unlike the burnt offering, however, only an "azkara," a "reminder" or token portion, is placed on the altar; the remainder is eaten by the priest (see 6.11; 7.9); God thus gives the priests the "leftover" portions of his own food gift (see 6.10). The "azkara" of the uncooked "minḥa" includes the frankincense, all of which belongs to the deity. 2: Offering by fire, see 1.9 n. Of pleasing odor, see 1.9 n. As v. 9 confirms, this is not simply the result of the frankincense. In P, the "minḥa" itself, like the flesh of animals, is by definition a pleasing odor, whereas in non-Priestly texts it is assumed that the addition of fragrant spice renders the offering pleasing (see Isa. 1.13; 43.23; Jer. 6.20; 17.26; 41.5; Ps. 141.2). 3: A most holy portion, Heb "kodesh kodashim" (see also v. 10), a term applied to the purification offering and the reparation offering as well, but not to the burnt offering. Gradation of sanctity or holiness (see 6.11), thought of as an effusion of the divine Presence varying in degree, is an essential aspect of the Tabernacle and its worship. The most holy among the food gifts are those of which a portion is eaten by the priests but not by the worshippers. 8–10: The procedure for the prepared "minḥa." The three types in vv. 4–7 are offered in the same manner as the uncooked type. 8–9: Take it up to the altar: Before the token portion is removed, the entire offering is symbolically presented to the deity. This gives ritual expression to the fact that the cakes, loaves, or wafers were prepared for God and not simply brought from the supply of foods kept at home for common consumption. 11–12: The prohibition of leaven. In the Heb v. 11a is a general prohibition of "ḥametz," leavened cakes or loaves, while v. 11b gives the details: In order to prevent fermentation, neither "se'or," the leavening agent (sour-dough) nor "devash," honey, may be used in any of the LORD's food gifts (see 1.9 n.) Though both date-honey and the honey of bees are leavening agents, in the Bible "devash" is almost always the honey of fruits (see Gen. 43.11; Deut. 8.8; 2 Chron. 31.5; etc.). There is nothing intrinsically unacceptable about leaven and honey; they may be offered (v. 12) but not placed on the altar. Rather it is the fermentation of the grain offering specifically that is prohibited, most likely for practical reasons, so that the preparation, offering, and eating of food gifts would all take place within a short period of time and in proximity to the altar. The preparation of leavened cakes but they shall not be offered up on the altar for a pleasing odor. ¹³You shall season your every offering of meal with salt; you shall not omit from your meal offering the salt of your covenant with God; with all your offerings you must offer salt.

¹⁴If you bring a meal offering of first fruits to the LORD, you shall bring new ears parched with fire, grits of the fresh grain, as your meal offering of first fruits. ¹⁵You shall add oil to it and lay frankincense on it; it is a meal offering. ¹⁶And the priest shall turn a token portion of it into smoke: some of the grits and oil, with all of the frankincense, as an offering by fire to the LORD.

3 If his offering is a sacrifice of well-being^a— If he offers of the herd, whether a male or a female, he shall bring before the LORD one without blemish. ²He shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering and slaughter it at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting; and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall dash the blood against all sides of the altar. ³He shall then present from the sacrifice of well-being, as an offering by fire to the LORD, the fat would take much longer. The presentation of ready-made loaves of bread is known outside of P (1 Sam. 10.3; 21.5; 22.13). 13: The requirement to salt the grain offering is a corollary of this: Salt is an anti-fermentation agent and would impede natural leavening. The salt of your covenant: Heb "berit," covenant, is used here in the sense of imposed obligation, and simply means that the salting of offerings is to be observed perpetually. With all your offerings . . . offer salt: Characteristically, the Rabbis took this summary to mean that animal offerings as well, and not only the "minḥa," required salting; this eventually became normative. In commemoration of this, Jewish custom requires salt on the table. 14–16: A final type of "minḥa" is described, a meal offering of first fruits. This gift offering of grain, before it has fully matured and before flour can be produced from it, is prepared and offered in the same way as the uncooked offering, and provides a means for approaching God the moment one's grain begins to ripen, when the natural impulse to make an offering is strongest.

3.1–17: The sacrifice of well-being. V. 1a introduces the possibility of offering a third type of gift offering, namely, the sacrifice of well-being; vv. 1b–5 lay out the procedure for making such an offering if the animal is taken from the herd; vv. 6–16 lay out the procedure if the animal is from the flock (v. 6a)—either a sheep (vv. 7–11) or a goat (vv. 12–16). This follows the basic outline of ch 1. The prohibition of suet and blood (v. 17) ends the ch. 1: A sacrifice of well-being: Heb consists of two components: "zevah" denotes a sacrifice of a slaughtered animal of which the offerer partakes in a festive meal; in P this is the only way in which the eating of meat is permitted (see 17.3–7). Several interpretations have been suggested for the word "shelamim." The translation "sacrifice of well-being" reflects the fact that in P a "zevah" offered by the individual is an expression of joy, gladness, gratitude, or relief; see 7.11–17 n.

Additional regulations concerning the "shelamim" sacrifice are given in 7.11–38; 19.5–8; 22.21–30. The distinctive feature is that only the blood and token fatty portions of the animal are placed on the altar, and only certain prescribed portions of the meat are eaten by the priests; most of the animal is eaten by the offerer and invited guests as a festive meal "in the LORD's presence." Well-being offerings are thus the natural expression of gladness, the worshipper celebrating by feasting in the presence of God in acknowledgment of His loving-kindness. The feast is a sacrifice because ownership of the animal is first transferred to God, after which the portions eaten by the priest and the worshipper are considered to have been given to them by God—much as a king is sustained by the tribute provided by his subjects, yet the subjects are nevertheless honored to be invited to dine at the royal table.

1b–5: The procedure for a "shelamim" sacrifice from the herd. The animal may be male or female. The tasks of the worshipper are similar to those for a burnt offering (1.3–9). No mention is made of the distribution of the remainder of the animal (see 7.11ff.) since the sole interest of this ch is the manner in which the food-gift is presented to the deity. 2: Shall dash the blood against . . . the altar, as an offering; see 1.5 n. 3–4: The LORD's portion of the sacrifice. Fatty portions of slaughtered animals were considered to be the richest, tastiest morsels. Best of all are the layers of suet (Heb "helev," translated as "fat"), the hard, subcutaneous fatty tissue surrounding the internal organs; therefore these portions would be assigned to God. That which is "too good" for mortals might logically be assumed to be a proper repast for a deity. Burning suet also provides a dense smoke of sweet, meaty fragrance, suggesting that pleasure is derived from it by a transcendent divine being. Biblical tradition is thus unanimous that the suet of sacrificial flesh is offered to the deity (below, v. 16; see also that covers the entrails and all the fat that is about the entrails; ⁴the two kidneys and the fat that is on them, that is at the loins; and the protuberance on the liver, which he shall remove with the kidneys. ⁵Aaron's sons shall turn these into smoke on the altar, with the burnt offering which is upon the wood that is on the fire, as an offering by fire, of pleasing odor to the LORD.

⁶And if his offering for a sacrifice of well-being to the LORD is from the flock, whether a male or a female, he shall offer one without blemish. ⁷If he presents a sheep as his offering, he shall bring it before the LORD ⁸and lay his hand upon the head of his offering. It shall be slaughtered before the Tent of Meeting, and Aaron's sons shall dash its blood against all sides of the altar. ⁹He shall then present, as an offering by fire to the LORD, the fat from the sacrifice of well-being: the whole broad tail, which shall be removed close to the backbone; the fat that covers the entrails and all the fat that is about the entrails; ¹⁰the two kidneys and the fat that is on them, that is at the loins; and the protuberance on the liver, which he shall remove with the kidneys. ¹¹The priest shall turn these into smoke on the altar as food, an offering by fire to the LORD.

¹²And if his offering is a goat, he shall bring it before the LORD ¹³and lay his hand upon its head. It shall be slaughtered before the Tent of Meeting, and Aaron's sons shall dash its blood against all sides of the altar. ¹⁴He shall then present as his offering from it, as an offering by fire to the LORD, the fat that covers the entrails and all the fat that is about the entrails; ¹⁵the two kidneys and the fat that is on them, that is at the loins; and the protuberance on the liver, which he shall remove with the kidneys. ¹⁶The priest shall turn these into smoke on the altar as food, an offering by fire, of pleasing odor.

All fat is the LORD's. ¹⁷It is a law for all time throughout the ages, in all your settlements: you must not eat any fat or any blood.

4 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people thus:

When a person unwittingly incurs guilt in regard to any of the LORD's commandments about things not to be done, and does one of them—

1 Sam. 2.15-16; Deut. 32.38; Isa. 1.11; 34.6; 43.24; Ezek. 44.7, 15). In addition to the suet, two organs—the kidneys and the protuberance on the liver (the caudate lobe)—are offered to God; these are surrounded by so much fatty tissue that they are considered as suet. 3: Entrails, i.e., intestines. 4: Loins (Heb "kesalim"), better, "sinews."

5: With the burnt offering . . . on the fire: The public burnt offering is made each morning and evening; the assumption is that it is either being burned, or at least its remains are smouldering, on the altar fire at all times. For the wood, see 6.1ff. Pleasing odor, see 1.9 n. 6-16: The procedure for a "shelamim" sacrifice from the flock. Sheep and goats are treated separately because only sheep possess the heavy fat-tail which, like suet, needs to be removed and added to the portions placed upon the altar. 16: All fat, better, "all suet," as explained above. However, the words all fat [is] are evidently a scribal error, copied unintentionally from the next v. (where they are translated "any fat"); v. 16 should conclude "of pleasing odor to the LORD" just like vv. 5 and 11. 17: What belongs to the LORD is not to be eaten by humans, thus, all blood and suet are prohibited. The details of the blood prohibition are given in 17.10-16; for elaboration on the prohibition of suet, see 7.22-27. This prohibition is appropriately placed here, since, according to P, the "shelamim" offering is the one occasion on which lay people would have eaten the flesh of domestic livestock.

4.1-5.26: The purification and reparation offerings. Chs 4-5 present three speeches of God to Moses (4.1-5.13; 5.14-19; 5.20-26). The first contains the laws concerning the "ḥata't" or purification offering; the second and third give regulations governing the "asham" or reparation offering. This completes instructions for the five types of occasional sacrifice. The sacrifices in these two chs do not reflect the individual's voluntary resolve to serve God, but are occasioned by specific violations or wrongdoing. The Rabbis therefore called these sacrifices "ḥova": debts, penalties incurred. Such sacrificial rituals are said to "atone" (Heb "kipper"), traditionally understood as amends for wrongdoing. Atonement, in this view, is a sort of payment made to propitiate an angry deity and be reconciled with him. However, Heb "kipper," actually means "wipe clean," and

³If it is the anointed priest who has incurred guilt, so that blame falls upon the people, he shall offer for the sin of which he is guilty a bull of the herd without blemish as a sin offering^a to the LORD. ⁴He shall bring the bull to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, before the LORD, and lay

the atoning act consists of the application of the blood of the animal to the sanctuary as a whole and to the objects within it. This is strikingly reminiscent of Mesopotamian ritual texts where the root "k-p-r" is used to refer to the ritual cleansing of temples. It follows that "atonement" in P is actually a type of expiation by which the divine abode is ritually purged of contamination that has accumulated there. According to P, this contamination comes from the Israelites' bodily impurities (see chs 12-15) and from certain acts of wrongdoing that they commit. It defiles the sanctuary and, if allowed to collect there, threatens the community's collective existence. "Atonement," which is really Temple purification, is thus of critical importance (see 15.31 n.). Chs 4-5 provide basic instructions for sacrificial atonement initiated by, and performed on behalf of, individual offending parties as the need arises; these are the basis for regulations regarding public rituals of atonement and atonement for bodily impurities in later chs. The order of chs 1-5 is also significant. In Israel's cultic system, the natural impulse to petition and to worship (chs 1-3) is primary, while the obligation to expiate (chs 4-5), i.e., to purge the sacred of impurities, is the result of circumstance.

4.1-35: The purification offering.

If an Israelite has inadvertently transgressed a prohibition (v. 2), a "ḥata't" or purification offering (see below, v. 3) must be made (vv. 3-35). The details differ according to the identity of the guilty party, the main distinction pertaining to the objects to which the blood is applied. Since the more severe the contamination, the more deeply it penetrates the sacred sphere, the instructions regarding where the blood is to be applied are an exact indication of the severity of the impurity or sin for which atonement is being made. This determines the division of the ch into two main sections. The first section (vv. 3-21) speaks of offenses that have brought guilt upon the community. The transgression may be committed by the high priest (vv. 3-12) or by "the whole community of Israel" (vv. 13-21); in both cases the purgation of the interior of the Tabernacle is required and a bull, the largest sacrificial animal, is slaughtered. The second section (vv. 22-35) pertains to offenses that have not resulted in communal guilt; these require only the purgation of the outer sphere, by applying blood to the altar in the Tabernacle court. The type of animal used varies according to the social status of the individual. Ch 16 completes this picture: Deliberate sins penetrate to the inner sanctum; see 16.11-17. Additional regulations concerning the "ḥata't" are given in 6.17-23; see also 10.16-20. A variant tradition is found in Num. 15.22-31. 2: A person, Heb "nefesh," "a living being" (see 17.10 n.), male or female. Unwittingly incurs guilt, better, "sins inadvertently." "Sin" (Heb "ḥata'") basically means to err, to miss the mark, and the qualifier "bishgagah," "in error," makes it clear that the offender did not know the act was prohibited. A basic postulate of Israelite thought is that inadvertent acts are just as harmful as deliberate ones, the need to atone for them just as real, and the desire to do so, once they are realized, greater. Any of the LORD's commandments: Since in P

the overwhelming majority of commandments belong to the category of prohibited acts, "commandment" in P is essentially defined as a prohibition, and "sin" is primarily an act of commission, not of omission. 3-12: The purification offering of the high priest. In P the high priest is not a public official, a teacher or a leader (contrast the role of Joshua in Zech. 3.3-7), but rather a divinely designated, sacred representative of the Israelite people. His entire function is ceremonial. In his person, dressed in the priestly vestments, he represents the body politic (see esp. Exod. 28.9-12), serving within God's earthly abode, paying uninterrupted homage to the enthroned deity on behalf of the Israelite tribes, and calling attention to their needs in the twice-daily regimen of worship. He is also the sole officiant in the annual Day of Atonement ceremonies (ch 16), which means he is the only person ever to enter the inner sanctum. 3: The anointed priest: He alone has the sacred anointing oil poured on his head at his investiture (Exod. 29.7; Lev. 8.12; 21.10). He is also called "the high priest" (Heb "ha-kohen ha-gadol" [Num. 35.25, 28; Josh. 20.6]), short for "the highest priest among his brothers" (Lev. 21.10), which parallels the Ugaritic "rb khnm," and "[ha-]kohen ha-rosh," "the head priest" (e.g., 2 Kings 25.18). Incurred guilt, better, "sinned"; see above, v. 2. So that blame falls upon the people: Corporate guilt for the crimes of leaders is assumed elsewhere in the Bible. In this case, because the high priest is the representative of the people, his sins of commission are accounted to the people as a whole, and since he serves on their behalf in the innermost sphere of sanctity, his misdeeds contaminate the Tabernacle interior by his very presence there. For the sin of which he is guilty, better, "for the sin which he committed." A sin offering: This is the usual translation of "ḥata't," associating it with "ḥet'"; "sin, misdeed" and "ḥata'"; "to sin, err" (see above). The noun his hand upon the head of the bull. The bull shall be slaughtered before the LORD,⁵ and the anointed priest shall take some of the bull's blood and bring it into the Tent of Meeting.⁶ The priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the LORD, in front of the curtain of the Shrine.⁷ The priest shall put some of the blood on the horns of the altar of aromatic incense, which is in the Tent of Meeting, before the LORD; and all the rest of the bull's blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar of burnt offering, which is at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting.⁸ He shall remove all the fat from the bull of sin offering: the fat that covers the entrails and all the fat that is about the entrails;⁹ the two kidneys and the fat that is on them, that is at the loins; and the protuberance on the liver, which he shall remove with the kidneys—¹⁰just as it is removed from the ox of the sacrifice of well-being. The priest shall turn them into smoke on the altar of burnt offering.¹¹ But the hide of the bull, and all its flesh, as well as its head and legs, its entrails and its dung—¹²all the rest of the bull—he shall carry to a clean place outside the camp, to the ash heap, and burn it up in a wood fire; it shall be burned on the ash heap.

¹³If it is the whole community of Israel that has erred and the matter escapes the notice of the congregation, so that they do any of the things which by the LORD's commandments ought not to be done, and they realize their guilt—¹⁴when the sin through which they incurred guilt is actually derived, however, from the verb "hite'," "purge, decontaminate" (8.15; 9.15; 14.49, 52; Num. 8.21; 19.12, 13, 20; 31.19–20, 23; Ezek. 43.22–23; 45.18; Ps. 51.9) which is virtually synonymous with "kipper," "atone" (see also Exod. 29.36; Ezek. 43.20), and so the preferred translation is "purification offering"; note also the "hata't"-water (Num. 8.7), which means "water of purification." 4–12: The procedure. The high priest is both the offerer and the officiant. The requirement to lay his hand upon the head of the bull here too symbolically transfers ownership of the animal to the deity. Having slaughtered the bull before the LORD, i.e., "in the LORD's presence," at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, the priest begins the sprinkling of blood in order to cleanse the areas that have become contaminated. Here and in the next subsection (see vv. 17–18a), the priest is to bring some of the blood into the Tabernacle's outer sanctum. The sevenfold sprinkling of blood toward the curtain (see Exod. 26.31–33) and the application of blood on the horns (rounded protuberances) of the incense altar (see Exod. 30.1–10) serve to purify the entire outer sanctum. The remaining blood is poured out at the base of the sacrificial altar in the court, that is, drained onto the ground since it is not a sacrifice, but kept within the sacred precincts since it has been consecrated. After this, the fatty portions of the bull are turned into smoke upon the altar just as is done with sacrifices of well-being (see 3.3–4). Significantly, though the LORD's portion of the sacrificial animal is presented to Him in the customary way, it is not called a "gift" nor is it said to be of pleasing odor (but see v. 31). Further, the remaining meat of the animal is not eaten by anyone; it is rather incinerated along with the refuse, outside the camp upon the ash-heap. On this total disposal of the animal's flesh, see 6.23 and 10.16–20. 13–21: The community's purification offering. The ritual is the same as the one preceding, except for the fact that since the offense has been committed by the community as a whole, the offerer is the congregation, represented by the elders of the community who perform the hand-laying gesture on behalf of the people. Rabbinic tradition found the notion that the whole community might sin spontaneously to be farfetched, and also rejected the idea that if only some, even a majority, of the population sinned the entire community was obligated to atone. They therefore interpreted the case as one in which the High Court errs in instructing the community how to behave and the latter commits the resulting offense. 13: The whole community of Israel that has erred and the matter escapes the notice of the congregation: The entire community has somehow performed an act thought at the time to be innocuous but subsequently determined to have been in violation of a prohibition, for instance, laboring on a day which they were unaware had been proclaimed sacred. And they realize their guilt: This may result from the reinvestigation of past actions spurred by pangs of conscience, or even from some form of suffering suspected to be a divine punishment or warning (see also vv. 22 and 27; the phrase is implicit in the previous section). 14: When the sin . . . becomes known, better, "or the sin they committed becomes known"; (similarly the opening clauses of vv. 23 and 28). Alternatively, the offense may come to one's attention as a result of information learned from others. Atonement in P is possible only when the realization of wrongdoing and the feeling of guilt move the offender to remorse and to an active desire to rid the sanctuary of the result-becomes known, the congregation shall offer a bull of the herd as a sin offering, and bring it before the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁵The elders of the community shall lay their hands upon the head of the bull before the LORD, and the bull shall be slaughtered before the LORD. ¹⁶The anointed priest shall bring some of the blood of the bull into the Tent of Meeting, ¹⁷and the priest shall dip his finger in the blood and sprinkle of it seven times before the LORD, in front of the curtain. ¹⁸Some of the blood he shall put on the horns of the altar which is before the LORD in the Tent of Meeting, and all the rest of the blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar of burnt offering, which is at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁹He shall remove all its fat from it and turn it into smoke on the altar. ²⁰He shall do with this bull just as is done with the [priest's] bull of sin offering; he shall do the same with it. Thus the priest shall make expiation for them, and they shall be forgiven. ²¹He shall carry the bull outside the camp and burn it as he burned the first bull; it is the sin offering of the congregation.

²²In case it is a chieftain who incurs guilt by doing unwittingly any of the things which by the commandment of the LORD his God ought not to be done, and he realizes his guilt—²³or the sin of which he is guilty is brought to his knowledge—he shall bring as his offering a male goat without blemish. ²⁴He shall lay his hand upon the goat's head, and it shall be slaughtered at the spot where the burnt offering is slaughtered^a before the LORD; it is a sin offering. ²⁵The priest shall take with his finger some of the blood of the sin offering and put it on the horns of the altar of burnt offering; and the rest of its blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar of burnt offering. ²⁶All its fat he shall turn into smoke on the altar, like the fat of the sacrifice of well-being. Thus the priest shall make expiation on his behalf for his sin, and he shall be forgiven.

²⁷If any person from among the populace^b unwittingly incurs guilt by doing any of the things which by the LORD's commandments ought not to be done, and he realizes his guilt—²⁸or the sin of which he is guilty is brought to his knowledge—he shall bring a female goat without blemish as his offering for the sin of which he is guilty. ²⁹He shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin offering, and the sin offering shall be slaughtered at the place of the burnt offering. ³⁰The priest shall take with his finger some of its blood and put it on the horns of the altar of burnt offering; and all the rest of its blood he shall pour out at the

ing contamination. 20: Thus the priest shall make expiation for them, and they shall be forgiven: Though this summary result clause (cf. vv. 26, 31, 35) is absent from the first section, it must be understood there too. In P, forgiveness is not a grace to be hoped for; it is rather the promised result of the completed atonement process. When, following the realization and remorse, the sacred sphere has been rid of the contamination one's act has caused, one is assured that no further consequences will result. 21: As he burned the first bull, i.e., the bull described in the previous subsection; the two rituals would not necessarily be performed on the same occasion. 22-35: The remaining purification offerings. The misdeeds of individual commoners and even of tribal chieftains are their own. Their severity is less than that of the sins of the high priest or the community, their contaminating force penetrates less deeply, and so the blood of the animal is applied to the horns of the sacrificial altar that stood in the Tabernacle court. The instructions regarding the disposal of the meat in these three subsections is spelled out in 6.19, 22-23, and its rationale is provided in 10.17. 22-23: And he realizes his guilt—or the sin . . . is brought to his knowledge: The translation here and in vv. 27-28 reflects more accurately the two possible ways in which the offending party is eventually moved to atone; see vv. 13-14. 31: For a pleasing odor to the LORD: This phrase appears nowhere else in reference to the atoning sacrifices and is indeed out of place; many scholars believe it to be a scribal error. 35: Over the LORD's offering by fire, better, "on top of (or along with) the LORD's food gifts" (see 1.9); i.e., together with the other offerings smoldering on the altar. This proves that the purification offering itself is not a food gift; see chs 4-5 n.

base of the altar. ³¹He shall remove all its fat, just as the fat is removed from the sacrifice of well-being; and the priest shall turn it into smoke on the altar, for a pleasing odor to the LORD. Thus the priest shall make expiation for him, and he shall be forgiven.

³²If the offering he brings as a sin offering is a sheep, he shall bring a female without blemish. ³³He shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin offering, and it shall be slaughtered as a sin offering at the spot where the burnt offering is slaughtered. ³⁴The priest shall take with his finger some of the blood of the sin offering and put it on the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and all the rest of its blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar. ³⁵And all its fat he shall remove just as the fat of the sheep of the sacrifice of well-being is removed; and this the priest shall turn into smoke on the altar, over the LORD's offering by fire. Thus the priest shall make expiation on his behalf for the sin of which he is guilty, and he shall be forgiven.

5 If a person incurs guilt—
When he has heard a public imprecation^a and—although able to testify as one who has either seen or learned of the matter—he does not give information, so that he is subject to punishment;

²Or when a person touches any unclean thing—be it the carcass of an unclean beast or the carcass of unclean cattle or the carcass of an unclean creeping thing—and the fact has escaped him, and then, being unclean, he realizes his guilt;

³Or when he touches human uncleanness—any such uncleanness whereby one becomes unclean—and, though he has known it, the fact has escaped him, but later he realizes his guilt;

⁴Or when a person utters^b an oath to bad or good purpose—whatever a man may utter in an oath—and, though he has known it, the fact has escaped him, but later he realizes his guilt in any of these matters—

⁵when he realizes his guilt in any of these matters, he shall confess that wherein he has sinned. ⁶And he shall bring as his penalty to the LORD, for the sin of which he is

5.1–13: Further instructions on the purification offering. Next comes a specific list of wrongs that require atonement by means of the "ḥata't" sacrifice. No instructions for performing the sacrifice are given; the listener is to rely on the previous ch. The rest of the section provides for the sacrifice of two fowl by a person who cannot afford an animal from the flock (vv. 7–10) and for a "ḥata't" of a grain offering by the person of even more limited means. These adjustments gave the sacrifice its rabbinic name of "korban 'ole veyored," "graduated offering"—but see below (vv. 7–13 n.). 1–4: The cases. The situations requiring sacrifice are: (a) A person has refrained from coming forward with testimony about some matter to which he was an eyewitness or about which he has indirect knowledge, even though a public imprecation, solemnly adjuring all that have knowledge about the matter to speak up, has been heard (v. 1); (b) a person has neglected to cleanse himself of a secondary impurity within the prescribed time period (see 11.4–8, 24–40), or (c) of corpse-contamination (see Num. 19.10a–22) of which he was originally aware but subsequently forgot, only later realizing his negligence (vv. 2–3); (d) a person has sworn verbally to perform some action but subsequently forgot to do so, only to realize his negligence at some later date. This list differs greatly from the general stipulation in ch 4. The cases aim to counter the notion that duties weaken with time and eventually cease to exist ("forget it and it will simply go away"). In P's view, the opposite is the case: Severity of negligence, whether of physical impurity or of moral or legal obligation, intensifies the longer it lasts. 1: Incurs guilt, rather, "sins"; see 4.2. So that he is subject to punishment, actually, "and he bears his sin." Protracted negligence is an objective guilt that continues to weigh upon the sinner until the appropriate measures are taken to be rid of it; see 7.18. 2: The carcass of an unclean beast or . . . cattle, correctly "of an unclean animal"; see 7.21; 11.40. And then, being unclean, he realizes his guilt, correctly: "though he had been unclean, and then he realizes his guilt." An emendation yields the more logical: "the fact escaped him, though he had known it, and then he realizes his guilt." 5–6: The procedure. Unique to these four cases is the requirement that the guilty party supplement his realization and remorse with verbal confession. P's idea is thus that verbalizing what guilty, a female from the flock, sheep or goat, as a sin offering; and the priest shall make expiation on his behalf for his sin.

⁷But if his means do not suffice for a sheep, he shall bring to the LORD, as his penalty for that of which he is guilty, two turtledoves or two pigeons, one for a sin offering and the other for a burnt offering. ⁸He shall bring them to the priest, who shall offer first the one for the sin offering, pinching its head at the nape without severing it. ⁹He shall sprinkle some of the blood of the sin offering on the side of the altar, and what remains of the blood shall be drained out at the base of the altar; it is a sin offering. ¹⁰And the second he shall prepare as a burnt offering, according to regulation. Thus the priest shall make expiation on his behalf for the sin of which he is guilty, and he shall be forgiven.

¹¹And if his means do not suffice for two turtledoves or two pigeons, he shall bring as his offering for that of which he is guilty a tenth of an ephah of choice flour for a sin offering; he shall not add oil to it or lay frankincense on it, for it is a sin offering. ¹²He shall bring it to the priest, and the priest shall scoop out of it a handful as a token portion of it and turn it into smoke on the altar, with the LORD's offerings by fire; it is a sin offering. ¹³Thus the priest shall make expiation on his behalf for whichever of these sins he is guilty, and he shall be forgiven. It shall belong to the priest, like the meal offering.

¹⁴And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying:

¹⁵When a person commits a trespass, being unwittingly remiss about any of the LORD's sacred things, he shall one ought to have done but failed to do is part of expiation. In later Jewish tradition, verbal confession of all sin, whether communal or individual, became an essential requirement for atonement.

7-13: Unlike the allowances made in 1.14-17 and 2.1-16, which serve to alleviate the poor person's sense of being excluded, the reason for the concessions here is that the sacred precincts must be decontaminated and sin must be eradicated from Israel's midst. It is not clear why the necessity to provide a means for the poor Israelite to atone for sin should be restricted to the four cases enumerated here. Perhaps these vv. are a subscript to the entire "hata't" section, applying equally to 4.27-35. 7-10: If the offender cannot afford a sheep or goat, he is to bring two birds. One serves as the "hata't" itself, supplying the blood to cleanse the altar; the other is presented as a burnt offering. The burnt offering does not atone; rather it provides for the altar a respectable amount of flesh (in place of the fatty portions of the "hata't") which would otherwise be negligible. See also 12.8; 14.22-31. 10: According to regulation, according to the procedure outlined in 1.14-17. 11-13: The possibility of substituting a cereal offering for an animal is remarkable here, since the essential step in the "hata't" procedure is the application of blood to the altar.

Perhaps the use of flour in some Mesopotamian purification ceremonies has cleared the way for its admission to Israel's cult, at least in this one case.

5.14-26: The reparation offering. Two concluding sections (vv. 14-19 and 20-26) convey the regulations concerning the other atonement offering, the "asham," required when trespass against the sacred sphere, deliberate or unintentional, has taken place. The first section prescribes the sacrifice in cases of trespass against sacred objects and the sacred domain (vv. 14-16) and in cases of undisclosed violations (vv. 17-19). In the second section the obligation is extended to instances of false oath in property offenses. Since the verb "sh-m" often means "to be guilty" or "realize one's guilt" (see 4.13 n.; 5.17, 23, 24 n.), the "asham" sacrifice is generally translated "guilt offering." Its literal meaning, however, is "to incur liability," and "asham" as a noun denotes the payment of damages (Num. 5.7-8; 1 Sam. 6.3-4, 8; see also Lev. 5.6). This fact, along with the importance attached by P, as well as in the Mesopotamian cultic texts, to the need to guard against misuse of the sacred and to make reparations when this has occurred, make it preferable to translate "reparation offering." Further cases requiring the reparation offering are found in 14.10-14; 19.21-22; Num. 6.12. Additional regulations appear in 7.1-7. 15: Trespass, or "sacrilege"; Heb "ma'al." The Tabernacle and its furnishings and appurtenances, as well as offerings and gifts that have been presented to it, are sacrosanct; their misuse or misappropriation is a crime against the deity Himself. See also 22.14. Convertible . . . by the sanctuary weight: According to this translation, the animal need not be sacrificed; it may be converted into its monetary equivalent. Another possibility is that the ram, which is to be offered in every case, must be one whose value is symbolically commensurate with that of the misap-bring as his penalty to the LORD a ram without blemish from the flock, convertible into payment in silver by the sanctuary weight, as a guilt offering.¹⁶ He shall make restitution for that wherein he was remiss about the sacred things, and he shall add a fifth part to it and give it to the priest. The priest shall make expiation on his behalf with the ram of the guilt offering, and he shall be forgiven.

¹⁷ And when a person, without knowing it, sins in regard to any of the LORD's commandments about things not to be done, and then realizes his guilt, he shall be subject to punishment. ¹⁸ He shall bring to the priest a ram without blemish from the flock, or the equivalent,^a as a guilt offering. The priest shall make expiation on his behalf for the error that he committed unwittingly, and he shall be forgiven. ¹⁹ It is a guilt offering; he has incurred guilt before the LORD.

²⁰ The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²¹ When a person sins and commits a trespass against the LORD by dealing deceitfully with his fellow in the matter of a deposit or a pledge,^b or through robbery, or by defrauding his fellow, ²² or by finding something lost and lying about it; if he swears falsely regarding any one of the various things that one may do and sin thereby—²³ when one has thus sinned and, realizing his guilt, would restore that which he got through robbery or fraud, or the deposit that was entrusted to him, or the lost thing that he found, ²⁴ or anything else about which he swore falsely, he shall repay the principal amount and add a fifth part to it. He shall pay it to its owner when he realizes his guilt. ²⁵ Then he shall bring to the priest, as his penalty to the LORD, a ram without blemish from the flock, or the equivalent,^c as a guilt offering. ²⁶ The priest shall make expiation on his behalf before the LORD, and he shall be forgiven for whatever he may have done to draw blame thereby.

6 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ² Command Aaron and his sons thus:

This is the ritual of the burnt offering: The burnt offer-propriated sacred property. This would also account for the name of the offering. 16: Restitution . . . add a fifth part: The payment of damages in addition to restitution is common to biblical and Near Eastern law. The priest shall make expiation on his behalf: It may be presumed that this is accomplished through the blood application as performed with the "hata't," but this is not certain.

17–19: The case is unclear. The circumstances are almost identical to those requiring the "hata't" in ch 4, the only difference being the words "without knowing it" in v. 17, repeated in v. 18. Perhaps the offender, though he feels guilty of something, never becomes fully aware of what he has done; the "unknown sin" is a common motif in ancient religion. The Rabbis suggest that if the offender eventually becomes aware of his offense, he will be obligated to bring a hata't as well. But why make a reparation offering if no sacrilege has taken place? There is no persuasive solution to the text in its given form. 17: He shall be subject to punishment, correct to "and bears his sin"; see 5.1; 7.18. 18: Or the equivalent, see v. 15. 20–26: The "asham" for fraud. Defrauding one's fellow over property disputes is an act of sacrilege when a false oath using God's name has been sworn. The misuse of the divine name is probably the most common form of desecration of the sacred, since every Israelite has immediate access to it at all times (see 24.10–13). The restitution and fine are paid to the injured party, while the sacrificial expiation is made as above. This law is supplemented by Num. 5.5–8. 25: Or the equivalent, see v. 15.

Chs 6–7. These chs complete the sacrificial instructions conveyed to Moses on the first of Nisan. They are transmitted in five speeches (6.1–11; 6.12–16; 6.17–7.21; 7.22–27; 7.28–36) and followed by a typical P caption summing up the whole of chs 1–7 (7.37–38). Each of the five types of sacrifice prescribed in chs 1–5 is taken up again, with added regulations. Each new topic is introduced by the phrase "this is the 'torah' of . . ." i.e., "these are the instructions regarding . . ." (6.2; 6.7; 6.18; 7.1; 7.11). Some suggest that while chs 1–5 are addressed to the lay Israelite, chs 6–7 are addressed to the priests. More accurately, in contrast to chs 1–5, which outline who offers what sort of sacrifice and how this is done, the primary purpose of chs 6–7 is ing itself shall remain where it is burned upon the altar all night until morning, while the fire on the altar is kept going on it. ³The priest shall dress in linen raiment, with linen breeches next to his body; and he shall take up the ashes to which the fire has reduced the burnt offering on the altar and place them beside the altar. ⁴He shall then take off his vestments and put on other vestments, and carry the ashes outside the camp to a clean place. ⁵The fire on the altar shall be kept burning, not to go out: every morning the priest shall feed wood to it, lay out the burnt offering on it, and turn into smoke the fat parts of the offerings of well-being. ⁶A perpetual fire shall be kept burning on the altar, not to go out.

⁷And this is the ritual of the meal offering: Aaron's sons shall present it before the LORD, in front of the altar. ⁸A handful of the choice flour and oil of the meal offering shall be taken from it, with all the frankincense that is on the meal offering, and this token portion shall be turned into smoke on the altar as a pleasing odor to the LORD. ⁹What is left of it shall be eaten by Aaron and his sons; it shall be eaten as unleavened cakes, in the sacred precinct; they shall eat it in the enclosure of the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁰It shall not be baked with leaven; I have given it as their portion from My offerings by fire; it is most holy, like the sin offering and the guilt offering. ¹¹Only the males among Aaron's descendants may eat of it, as their due for all time throughout the ages from the LORD's offerings by fire. Anything that touches these shall become holy.

to spell out precisely how the sacrifice is to be apportioned and disposed of following the altar ritual (see 7.35-36 n.). The three passages addressed specifically to the priesthood (6.1, 12, 17) are a logical subcategory.

6.1-6: The burnt offering. This refers to the burnt offering of the individual, discussed in 1.3-13, and not the "tamid" or daily burnt offering (Exod. 29.38 and elsewhere). Two regulations are added here: the stipulation that the flesh may burn throughout the night but by morning the ash should be removed (v. 2) and the instructions for the ash removal by the priest (vv. 3-4). A corollary follows: The fire on the altar must be kept burning at all times (vv. 5-6). Since none of the flesh is eaten, these two regulations are the counterpart of the corresponding instructions for distribution and consumption given below for the remaining types of sacrifice.

2: Command Aaron and his sons because handling the flesh of the burnt offering is their task. This is the ritual of, better, "these are the instructions concerning"; Heb "torah" means "body of instruction pertaining to." 3: The priest, not necessarily the high priest. In linen raiment, with linen breeches next to his body, see Exod. 28.39-43. Since collecting the ashes involves contact with the high degree of sanctity attached to the altar, linen vestments are required. In order to exit the sphere of the sacred, however, nonsacred vestments must be worn. 4: A clean place: Since the ashes derive from a sacred offering, they must be disposed of in a ritually pure spot. 5-6: The altar fire, once ignited (see 9.24), must never be allowed to die out; it serves as a perpetual sign that the enshrined deity is being worshipped constantly. Later tradition derived from this v. the obligation to supply a regular "wood offering" to keep the altar aflame; see Neh. 10.35; 13.31.

6.7-11: The grain offering. Further instructions concerning the "minḥah" of the individual, prescribed in 2.1-13. They include (vv. 7-9a) a restatement of 2.2-3 and 2.9-10, along with the precise regulations regarding the priests' preparation and consumption of the "minḥah" and the consequences of the sacred portions of the offering coming into contact with the laity. 7: Ritual, see v. 2, above. 9b-10a: The prohibition of leaven (see 2.11) is here extended specifically to the priests' portion of the "minḥah." In the sacred precinct . . . of the Tent of Meeting, within the Tabernacle courtyard. Offerings of the highest degree of sanctity could not leave the sacred precincts. 10-11: The priests' portion of the sacrifice is not a gift from the person who presents the offering. Rather, the entire sacrifice is a gift to the LORD, who graciously "shares" it with the priests for their service (see 2.1-10; 7.34). 10, 11: Offerings by fire, see 1.9. It is most holy, see 2.3. 11: Only the males, more precisely, "any male." The priests' portions of most holy offerings may be eaten only by priests qualified to offer them; namely, males. Female members of the priestly families are permitted to eat the meat of the well-being sacrifices. Anything that touches these shall become holy: Direct contact with any of the most holy food-gifts of the LORD communicates holiness, conceived of as a contagious, dynamic effervescence of the deity's Presence which renders whatever comes into contact with it holy. See also v. 20; Exod. 29.37; 30.29; Num. 17.1-4.

ing that Aaron and his sons shall offer to the LORD on the occasion of his^a anointment: a tenth of an ephah of choice flour as a regular meal offering, half of it in the morning and half of it in the evening,¹⁴ shall be prepared with oil on a griddle. You shall bring it well soaked, and offer it as a meal offering of baked slices,^b of pleasing odor to the LORD.¹⁵ And so shall the priest, anointed from among his sons to succeed him, prepare it; it is the LORD's—a law for all time—to be turned entirely into smoke.¹⁶ So, too, every meal offering of a priest shall be a whole offering; it shall not be eaten.

¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁸Speak to Aaron and his sons thus: This is the ritual of the sin offering: the sin offering shall be slaughtered before the LORD, at the spot^c where the burnt offering is slaughtered: it is most holy.¹⁹ The priest who offers it as a sin offering shall eat of it; it shall be eaten in the sacred precinct, in the enclosure of the Tent of Meeting.²⁰ Anything that touches its flesh shall become holy; and if any of its blood is spattered upon a garment, you shall wash the bespattered part in the sacred precinct.²¹ An earthen vessel in which it was boiled shall be broken; if it was boiled in a copper vessel, [the vessel] shall be scoured and rinsed with water.²² Only the males in the priestly line may eat of it: it is most holy.²³ But no sin offering may be eaten from which any blood is brought into the Tent of Meeting for expiation in the sanctuary; any such shall be consumed in fire.

6.12–16: The grain offering of the priest. The "minḥah" of the high priest, half to be offered each morning and the other half each evening (v. 13), is incumbent upon the high priest's successors for all time (v. 15). These regulations are appended here as an exception to the preceding lay grain offering, since the priestly offering is turned into smoke in its entirety. The priest does not receive a share of his own gift. 13: Aaron and his sons, i.e., the first high priest and his successors; see v. 15. On the occa- sion of his anointment, most likely "from the time of his anointment [onward]." A regular meal offering, better: "as a grain offering, perpetually." 16: Like the high priest, lesser priests too receive no share of a "minḥah" they offer on their own behalf. Shall be a whole offering, more precisely: "shall be turned completely into smoke."

6.17–23: Further instructions concerning the purification offering ("ḥata't"). For the types and procedure see 4.1–5.13. The paragraph stipulates where the "ḥata't" is to be slaughtered, defines its degree of sanctity, prescribes who may eat of its flesh and where (vv. 18–19, 22), and sets forth the ramifications of contact with the sacrificial flesh (vv. 20–21). It concludes by spelling out the crucial distinction between the eaten "ḥata't" and the burned one (v. 23); see 10.16–20 n. 18: Ritual, see v. 2 n. At the spot, see 1.11. Sin offering, see 4.3 n. 19, 22: These vv. refer to the eaten "ḥata't" (see v. 23 n.), and seem to contradict each other. The simplest resolution is that the flesh must be eaten and the officiating priest is entitled to it (see also 7.7, 14); he may, however, share it with other male members of the priesthood (see v. 11 n.). A single priest could hardly eat all of it, likely consumed within the space of a single day (see 10.19; cf. 7.15).

20b–21: These vv. confirm that the purification offering removes impurity by absorbing it. As a result, whatever flesh and blood have not been disposed of by consumption or burning communicate impurity to objects with which they come in contact, requiring them to be cleansed. 23: As explained in ch 4 n., there are two types of purification offering: those whose blood purges the interior of the Tabernacle and those whose blood decontaminates the courtyard. Here the implications are spelled out. The flesh of the "ḥata't" for severe offenses may not be eaten; it must be burned. That of the "ḥata't" for less severe offenses and impurities must be eaten; thus the impurity is disposed of and the purification process made complete (see 10.16–20).

7.1–10: Further instructions concerning the reparation offering ("asham") and priestly share. See 5.14–26. 1: Ritual, see 6.2. Guilt offering, see 5.14–26 n. It is most holy, see 2.3. 2: See 1.11. 2b–5a: These details are not mentioned in connection with the "asham" in 5.14–26, though they are included in the ritual prescribed for other sacrifices in chs 1–5 (e.g., 3.2b–5; shall be dashed on all sides of the altar. ³All its fat shall be offered: the broad tail; the fat that covers the entrails; ⁴the two kidneys and the fat that is on them at the loins; and the protuberance on the liver, which shall be removed with the kidneys. ⁵The priest shall turn them into smoke on the altar as an offering by fire to the LORD; it is a guilt offering. ⁶Only the males in the priestly line may eat of it; it shall be eaten in the sacred precinct: it is most holy.

⁷The guilt offering is like the sin offering. The same rule applies to both: it shall belong to the priest who makes expiation thereby. ⁸So, too, the priest who offers a man's burnt offering shall keep the skin of the burnt offering that he offered. ⁹Further, any meal offering that is baked in an oven, and any that is prepared in a pan or on a griddle, shall belong to the priest who offers it. ¹⁰But every other meal offering, with oil mixed in or dry, shall go to the sons of Aaron all alike.

4.7–10; etc.). 3: The broad tail, included since the animal prescribed for the "asham" offering is a ram (5.15, 18, 25); see 3.6–16 n. 5: Offering by fire, see 1.9 n. This is the only time this term is used of expiatory sacrifices; probably it refers to the portions given to the LORD and not to the sacrifice as a whole. 6–7: As is the case with the "hata't" (6.19ff.), only male priests are eligible to eat the meat of the "asham." The officiating priest receives the meat and may share it with other male priests. 8–10: The discussion of most holy sacrifices is concluded, with remaining details regarding the distribution of the priestly portions; v. 8 supplements 1.3–13 and 6.1–6, and vv. 9–10 supplement 2.1–13 and 6.7–11. 10: Dry, the cereal "hata't" of 5.11 and the "minhah" of the suspected adulteress (Num. 5.15).

11–21: As explained in 3.1 n., the meat of the well-being offering is eaten primarily by the offerer and his guests in a sacred meal. There are three types of well-being offerings; the distinctions are reflected also in 19.5–8 and 22.29–30. 11: Ritual, see 6.2. 12–15: The first type, the "todah" or sacrifice of thanksgiving, is offered according to Ps. 107 (and rabbinic law) by one who has recovered from illness, been rescued from danger, or returned safely from a journey. It is accompanied by prayers of thanksgiving, proclaiming to all present the beneficence of God enjoyed by the offerer. Mandated by happy circumstance, it is more of an obligation than a voluntary offering. It is accompanied by leavened cakes and wafers; one of each type is presented to the officiating priest. The meat is to be consumed by the following morning. 16–18: The second and third types, here lumped together but distinguished in 22.21–23, are the "neder" or votive offering, obligatory in that it is made in fulfillment of a vow, though the vow itself was undertaken freely, and the "nedavah" or freewill offering, entirely an act of spontaneous devotion. No loaves are required and two days are allowed for the consumption of the meat. The burning of uneaten meat prescribed in v. 17 applies to the thanksgiving offering as well but would take place on the second day. 18: Violating the time restriction invalidates the sacrifice retroactively. It shall not be acceptable, more precisely: "it shall not be accepted." See 1.3, 4; 19.5–8; 22.17–30. An offensive thing, Heb "pigul," meaning uncertain; perhaps "foul" or "desecrated." Shall bear his guilt, lit. "shall bear his sin"; see 5.1. P uses this phrase to mean that the act of wrongdoing remains with the individual until he has cleansed himself of it or, if this is impossible (as with particularly heinous misdeeds) or he fails it shall not be acceptable; it shall not count for him who offered it. It is an offensive thing, and the person who eats of it shall bear his guilt.

²²And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²³Speak to the Israelite people thus: You shall eat no fat^b of ox or sheep or goat. ²⁴Fat from animals that died or were torn by beasts may be put to any use, but you must not eat it. ²⁵If anyone eats the fat of animals from which offerings by fire may be made to the LORD, the person who eats it shall be cut off from his kin. ²⁶And you must not consume any blood, either of bird or of animal, in any of your settlements. ²⁷Anyone who eats blood shall be cut off from his kin.

²⁸And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²⁹Speak to the Israelite people thus: The offering to the LORD from a sacrifice of well-being must be presented by him who offers his sacrifice of well-being to the LORD: ³⁰his own hands shall present the LORD's offerings by fire. He shall present the fat with the breast, the breast to be elevated as an elevation offering before the LORD; ³¹the priest shall turn the fat into smoke on the altar, and the breast shall go to Aaron and his sons. ³²And the right thigh from your sacrifices of well-being you shall present to the priest as a gift; ³³he from among Aaron's sons who offers the blood and the fat of the offering of well-being shall get the right thigh as his portion. ³⁴For I have taken the breast of eleva-

to do so, until he has suffered its consequences. 19–21: Sacred meat that comes into contact with a source of impurity may not be eaten. Further, if an impure individual, or one who has contracted impurity by means of direct contact, eats of the sacrificial meat, he is subject to the penalty of extirpation. 20, 21: Shall be cut off from his kin: This threat recurs throughout the Priestly writings and is applied to many crimes committed against the sacred. Traditional commentators correctly understood that it implies a penalty inflicted by God and not a form of ostracism or excommunication. They often saw it as death by divine agency or the denial of eternal bliss in the next world, but it is more probable that "cutting off" is extirpation, i.e., the eventual total extinction of one's line, by whatever means God sees fit. 21: Any unclean creature, referring only to the carcasses of impure animals; for the question this poses, see 5.2; 11.40. 22–27: Elaborating on the brief stipulation of 3.17; the fat mentioned here is suet (see 3.3–4 and translators' note b). Eating the suet of permitted animals, whether sacrificed or not, just as ingesting their blood (v. 26; see also 17.10–16), is prohibited. The Israelite is commanded to abstain from the "food" of the LORD even when no sacrifice is made.

24: Animals, i.e., domestic animals, named in the previous v., that have not been slaughtered as sacrifice but rather have been killed by beasts or died of themselves. Their meat, according to P, may be eaten (see 11.40 n.; 17.15–16 n.; 22.8 n.), but since no sacrificial ritual has taken place, no sanctity attaches to the meat, so household use of the suet is permissible. Torn by beasts, Heb "terefah," which in postbiblical phraseology became a term for all prohibited foods. 25: Offerings by fire, see 1.9 n. 26–27: The blood prohibition of 3.17 is also repeated in this context; see 17.10–16.

28–34: The distribution of the well-being sacrifice. The altar portions are presented by the worshipper to be turned by the priest into smoke (see 3.3–5a). The priests' share of the well-being sacrifice is treated last. As elsewhere, the priests' portion is perceived as a gift from God (see v. 34), not from the offerer, as remuneration for their service and in compensation for their having been given no land (see also Num. 18.8–24). 30: Elevation offering, Heb "tenu-fah." The ritualized transfer of ownership from the offerer to the deity. The Rabbis understood the presentation ritual as waving the offering back and forth, but the translation "elevation," also known from ancient times as well as from the depiction of the rite in an ancient Egyptian relief, is more accurate. Offerings by fire, see 1.9 n. 34: Breast of elevation offering and tion offering and the thigh of gift offering from the Israelites, from their sacrifices of well-being, and given them to Aaron the priest and to his sons as their due from the Israelites for all time.

³⁵Those shall be the perquisites^a of Aaron and the perquisites of his sons from the LORD's offerings by fire, once they have been inducted^b to serve the LORD as priests; ³⁶these the LORD commanded to be given them, once they had been anointed, as a due from the Israelites for all time throughout the ages.

³⁷Such are the rituals of the burnt offering, the meal offering, the sin offering, the guilt offering, the offering of ordination, and the sacrifice of well-being, ³⁸with which the LORD charged Moses on Mount Sinai, when He commanded that the Israelites present their offerings to the LORD, in the wilderness of Sinai.

8 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Take Aaron along with his sons, and the vestments, the anointing oil, the bull of sin offering, the two rams, and the basket of unleavened bread; ³and assemble the whole community at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ⁴Moses did as the LORD commanded him. And when the community was assembled at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, ⁵Moses said to the community, "This is what the LORD has commanded to be done."

⁶Then Moses brought Aaron and his sons forward and washed them with water. ⁷He put the tunic on him, the thigh of gift offering: Deut. 18.3, which assigns to the priests "the shoulder, cheeks and the stomach," has a different view of the priests' portions. Rabbinic law reconciled the two passages by interpreting Deut. ch 18 as referring to nonsacrificial meat slaughtered for food.

7.35–36: Summary. A summary of chs 6–7 in their entirety: The two chs refer primarily to the apportionment of the sacrificial offerings in general, and in particular to the priests' share. 35: Perquisites, Heb "mishḥah," a rare word (see also Num. 18.8, there vocalized as "moshḥah"), meaning the priests' due, their assigned portion. 35: Offerings by fire, see 1.9 n.;

7.37–38: Overall summary. A summary of chs 1–7, closing the account of what was communicated to Moses on the first day of Nisan. 37: Offering of ordination: These rituals were included in the instructions given to Moses before the building of the Tabernacle (Exod. ch 29) and will be introduced in ch 8 (see 8.22–29). Their inclusion in the caption is puzzling. 38: When, on 1 Nisan. On Mount Sinai: As is clear from in the wilderness of Sinai at the end of the v., this phrase means "[in the Tabernacle which stood] at [the foot of] Mount Sinai"; see also 25.1; 26.46; 27.34.

8.1–36: The consecration of Aaron and his sons. Aaron and his sons are consecrated to the priesthood. According to P, God, many months earlier, had informed Moses that Aaron and his sons were to become His priests (Exod. ch 28), and outlined the details of this ceremony (Exod. ch 29). Now the consecration is to take place. Most of the ch (vv. 6–30) thus consists of a past-tense repetition of Exod. ch 29 with minor differences and the added refrain "as the LORD had commanded Moses." The ceremony of induction into the priesthood consists of five elements. (1) Investiture: The priests are clothed for the first time in the garments required to perform their service (vv. 7–9, 13). (2) Invocation: The priests present a burnt offering (vv. 18–21). (3) Consecration: The blood of a ram of offering is smeared on the priests' bodies (vv. 22–24a). (4) "Filling the hands": The priests receive for the first time their allotted share of the sacrifices; they offer a portion to the LORD (vv. 26–29) and eat the remaining meat and loaves (v. 31). (5) Anointment: The priests are anointed with the sacred oil, infusing them with holiness (vv. 12, 30). Afterwards the priests remain within the Tabernacle for seven full days, completing their consecration (vv. 31–36). Three preparatory rituals are also performed, each at the appropriate moment. Before their investiture the priests must be bathed (v. 6); before the first sacrifices to be offered in the divine abode are made, the Tabernacle and its furnishings must be anointed (vv. 10–11); before being used, the altar must be purified (vv. 15–17). The latter two rituals sanctify the Tabernacle itself; its consecration thus takes place simultaneously with that of the priests. 2: The vestments, see Exod. chs 28, 39. The anointing oil, see Exod. 30.22–33; 37.29. The bull of sin offering (see 4.3), the two rams, and the basket of unleavened bread, as already prescribed in Exod. 29.1–2. 7–9: The outer "garments" of the high priest are marks of "dignity and adornment" (Exod. 28.2) and girded him with the sash, clothed him with the robe, and put the ephod on him, girding him with the decorated band with which he tied it to him.⁸ He put the breastpiece on him, and put into the breastpiece the Urim and Thummim.⁹ And he set the headdress on his head; and on the headdress, in front, he put the gold frontlet, the holy diadem—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

¹⁰ Moses took the anointing oil and anointed the Tabernacle and all that was in it, thus consecrating them. ¹¹ He sprinkled some of it on the altar seven times, anointing the altar, all its utensils, and the laver with its stand, to consecrate them. ¹² He poured some of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head and anointed him, to consecrate him. ¹³ Moses then brought Aaron's sons forward, clothed them in tunics, girded them with sashes, and wound turbans upon them, as the LORD had commanded Moses.

¹⁶ Moses then took all the fat that was about the entrails, and the protuberance of the liver, and the two kidneys and their fat, and turned them into smoke on the altar. ¹⁷ The rest of the bull, its hide, its flesh, and its dung, he put to the fire outside the camp—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

¹⁸ Then he brought forward the ram of burnt offering. Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the ram's head,¹⁹ and it was slaughtered. Moses dashed the blood against all sides of the altar. ²⁰ The ram was cut up into sections and Moses turned the head, the sections, and the suet into smoke on the altar; ²¹ Moses washed the entrails and the legs with water and turned all of the ram into smoke. That was a burnt offering for a pleasing odor, an offering by fire to the LORD—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

appurtenances of the daily regimen of perpetual worship, each one having a specific ritual function as enumerated in Exod. 28.12, 30, 35, 38. 8: Urim and Thummim, see Exod. 28.30. 10–13: In P, the anointing of persons and objects infuses them with holiness (see 6.11). Anointing Aaron and his sons (v. 30) transforms them into God's personal servants; they belong permanently to the sphere of the divine. All contact with the nonsacred is restricted and any contact with the impure is potentially fatal and must be avoided (see 21.1–15). 12: Upon Aaron's head, see 4.3. 13: The tunics, sashes, and turbans of Aaron's sons are for "dignity and adornment" (Exod. 28.40); they (and probably Aaron as well) also wore breeches for modesty (Exod. 28.42).

14–17: The purification offering of the high priest, a bull, is offered and its parts are disposed of (see 4.3–12). This decontaminates the sacred sphere, in particular the altar, of the impurities that have collected there prior to the induction of the priests and the inauguration of worship. Sin offering, purification offering; see 4.3. 15: Thus . . . to make expiation upon it, better, "and made expiation upon it."

18–21: The first "food gift" to be presented is a burnt offering (see 1.3–9); it invokes the deity and summons His presence. Prior to the consummation of the induction ceremony, Aaron is the individual offerer, while Moses assumes the role of priest. 19: And it was slaughtered, by Aaron; see 1.5. 22–29: The central feature of the induction ceremony, translated here as ordination, is in Heb "milu'im," "filling," an ellipsis for "filling the hand" (see v. 33; 16.32; 21.10; also Exod. 28.41; 29.3ff.; 32.29; Judg. 17.5, 12; etc.). This phrase, also attested in Akkadian, expresses the priests' entitlement to their allotted portions of the sacrifices. Along with the "filling" comes the added consecration ritual of daubing some of the ram's blood upon Aaron and his sons and on the altar. 23: Ear . . . thumb . . . big toe, probably the extremities the big toes of their right feet; and the rest of the blood Moses dashed against every side of the altar. ²⁵He took the fat—the broad tail, all the fat about the entrails, the protuberance of the liver, and the two kidneys and their fat—and the right thigh. ²⁶From the basket of unleavened bread that was before the LORD, he took one cake of unleavened bread, one cake of oil bread, and one wafer, and placed them on the fat parts and on the right thigh. ²⁷He placed all these on the palms of Aaron and on the palms of his sons, and elevated them as an elevation offering before the LORD. ²⁸Then Moses took them from their hands and turned them into smoke on the altar with the burnt offering. This was an ordination offering for a pleasing odor; it was an offering by fire to the LORD. ²⁹Moses took the breast and elevated it as an elevation offering before the LORD; it was Moses' portion of the ram of ordination—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

³⁰And Moses took some of the anointing oil and some of the blood that was on the altar and sprinkled it upon Aaron and upon his vestments, and also upon his sons and upon their vestments. Thus he consecrated Aaron and his vestments, and also his sons and their vestments.

³¹Moses said to Aaron and his sons: Boil the flesh at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and eat it there with the bread that is in the basket of ordination—as I commanded:^a Aaron and his sons shall eat it; ³²and what is left over of the flesh and the bread you shall consume in fire. ³³You shall not go outside the entrance of the Tent of Meeting for seven days, until the day that your period of ordination is completed. For your ordination will require seven days. ³⁴Everything done today, the LORD has commanded to be done [seven days], to make expiation for you. ³⁵You shall remain at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting day and night for seven days, keeping the LORD's charge—that you may not die—for so I have been commanded.

³⁶And Aaron and his sons did all the things that the LORD had commanded through Moses.

9 On the eighth day Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel. ²He said to Aaron: "Take a calf of the herd for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, without blemish, and bring them before the LORD. ³And speak to the Israelites, saying: Take a he-goat for a sin offering; a calf and a lamb, yearlings without blemish, of the body represent the whole. 25–29: One of each of the loaves and cakes, along with the right thigh, is symbolically placed in the hands of the ordinands. They in turn present them to the LORD by elevating them (see 7.30) and then have them turned into smoke on the altar; priests do not receive a portion of their own offerings (see 6.12–15; 6.16). However, one of the priestly portions, the breast, is treated differently. As Moses serves on this occasion in the role of priest, he performs the elevation and receives the breast as his "priest's share" of the sacrificial meat. 30: The sanctifying oil, previously poured on Aaron's head (v. 12), is now applied to the person of Aaron and his sons. It is mixed with blood from the altar and is sprinkled, rather than smeared, on them, completing his consecration and accomplishing theirs. 31–36: The newly ordained priests may now eat of the sacred meat and bread, making sure to consume it all and to observe the time restriction (see Exod. 29.34). They then remain within the Tabernacle for seven days of "milu'im." Exod. 29.30 also ordains that the "milu'im" ritual be repeated when a new high priest is installed. 33: Your ordination will require seven days, lit. "he [Moses] will fill your hands for seven days"; i.e., the ceremony of vv. 22–29 will be repeated on each of the next six days (see Exod. 29.35–37). 34: Everything done today, all of the purification and ordination rituals. Make expiation for you, specifically, purge the altar of impurities that accrue there during the seven-day period that you are in such close proximity to it. 35: If the priests fail to keep the LORD's charge and exit the Tabernacle during the critical first seven days of their priesthood, the contact between their heightened state of sanctity and the realm of the nonsacred will be fatal.

9.1–10.20: The Day of Revelation and the transgression of Aaron's sons. Chs 9 and 10 comprise one unit recounting the events of the

for a burnt offering; ⁴and an ox and a ram for an offering of well-being to sacrifice before the LORD; and a meal offering with oil mixed in. For today the LORD will appear to you.”

⁵They brought to the front of the Tent of Meeting the things that Moses had commanded, and the whole community came forward and stood before the LORD. ⁶Moses said: “This is what the LORD has commanded that you do, that the Presence of the LORD may appear to you.” ⁷Then Moses said to Aaron: “Come forward to the altar and sacrifice your sin offering and your burnt offering, making expiation for yourself and for the people; and sacrifice the people’s offering and make expiation for them, as the LORD has commanded.”

⁸Aaron came forward to the altar and slaughtered his calf of sin offering. ⁹Aaron’s sons brought the blood to him; he dipped his finger in the blood and put it on the horns of the altar; and he poured out the rest of the blood at the base of the altar. ¹⁰The fat, the kidneys, and the protuberance of the liver from the sin offering he turned into eighth day. In the Heb text no new division occurs at 10.1. After Aaron and his sons have been ordained, Moses orders them to perform their first sacrificial service in preparation for the appearance of the divine Presence (9.1–6). This consists of a number of offerings, including a well-being offering made on behalf of the entire people in celebration of the great event (9.7–23a). When the deity’s Presence manifests itself in the sight of the people, signaling that He is pleased with their worship and has agreed to abide in the shrine they have built for Him, the people burst into rejoicing (9.23b–24). At the very moment that the inauguration of Israel’s cult seems to have reached its auspicious climax, however, two of Aaron’s sons commit a blatant act of sacrilege, overstepping the strictly prescribed bounds of acceptable worship (10.1). The LORD sanctifies His name by striking them down on the spot (10.2–3), and the surviving members of the priestly family are forbidden to mourn their demise (10.4–7). They are reminded of their sacred charge—to keep the sacred separate from the nonsacred (10.8–11)—and told to continue the day’s ceremonies (10.12–15). When Moses discovers that they have deviated from the normal manner of disposing of the “ḥata’t” meat, he is incensed (10.16–18); it takes some convincing before he agrees that their act was justified (10.19–20). 1–6: After their seven-day seclusion, Aaron and his sons are told to emerge from the Tabernacle and to begin preparations for the Revelation Day ritual. Moses has them prepare the offerings they will make and tells Aaron to order the people, represented by the elders (see 4.15), to prepare the sacrifices that will be offered on their behalf. Thus the high priest takes up, for the first time, his crucial role of informing the Israelite people of their cultic duties. 1: The eighth day, beginning with the first day of the seven-day ordination. 2: Sin offering, purification offering; see 4.3. Here too the purification of the Tabernacle is necessary before acts of worship can begin. Burnt offering: The first gift the priests offer the LORD is a sublime act of devotion and serves also as an act of attraction, invoking the deity’s presence. 3: The people too are to offer a purification offering, confirming that in P all are responsible for eradicating impurities from the divine abode; see ch 4. 4: One of the few occasions on which a well-being offering (“shelamim”; see ch 3) is made by the public (see also 23.19). Since all will be present for the manifestation of the divine Presence shortly to occur, all will celebrate the joyous event in the appropriate manner, partaking of a sacred repast in God’s presence. Meal offering, “minḥah” or grain offering; see ch. 2. One of each of the three types of gift offerings (see 1.1–3.17 n.) is to be made by the people, inaugurating the perpetual regimen of worship. For today the LORD will appear to you: This is echoed in v. 6 by “[in order] that the Presence of the LORD may appear to you,” confirming Rashi’s view that the purpose of these rituals is to bring about the theophany, i.e., to induce the divine Presence to make its appearance. 5: And the whole community came forward, i.e., after having collected the prescribed materials, presumably so instructed by the elders. 6: Moses said: “This is what the LORD has commanded,” see also v. 7, “as the LORD has commanded.” But nowhere is it recounted that God issued these commands, so most commentators assume that the text economizes for the sake of brevity. Rabbinic tradition acknowledges that Moses often commanded in the name of the LORD actions about which he had received no prior orders (e.g., Exod. 19.15; 32.27; elsewhere in P this occurs in Num. 30.2), implying that Moses’ prophetic intuition was tantamount to explicit divine authority. Note that v. 21 says that the offerings were made “as Moses had commanded.” 7: And for the people: This apparently refers to the second purification offering, subsequently to be made on behalf of the people (see vv. 3, 15–16). The Septuagint here reads “and for your house” (i.e., Aaron’s family). 8–14: The priests’ purification and burnt offerings are made in accordance with their prescribed rituals.

smoke on the altar—as the LORD had commanded Moses; ¹¹and the flesh and the skin were consumed in fire outside the camp. ¹²Then he slaughtered the burnt offering. Aaron's sons passed the blood to him, and he dashed it against all sides of the altar. ¹³They passed the burnt offering to him in sections, as well as the head, and he turned it into smoke on the altar. ¹⁴He washed the entrails and the legs, and turned them into smoke on the altar with the burnt offering.

¹⁵Next he brought forward the people's offering. He took the goat for the people's sin offering, and slaughtered it, and presented it as a sin offering like the previous one. ¹⁶He brought forward the burnt offering and sacrificed it according to regulation. ¹⁷He then brought forward the meal offering and, taking a handful of it, he turned it into smoke on the altar—in addition to the burnt offering of the morning.^a ¹⁸He slaughtered the ox and the ram, the people's sacrifice of well-being. Aaron's sons passed the blood to him—which he dashed against every side of the altar—¹⁹and the fat parts of the ox and the ram: the broad tail, the covering [fat], the kidneys, and the protuberances of the livers. ²⁰They laid these fat parts over the breasts; and Aaron^b turned the fat parts into smoke on the altar, ²¹and elevated the breasts and the right thighs as an elevation offering before the LORD—as Moses had commanded.

²²Aaron lifted his hands toward the people and blessed them; and he stepped down after offering the sin offering, the burnt offering, and the offering of well-being. ²³Moses and Aaron then went inside the Tent of Meeting. When they came out, they blessed the people; and the Presence of the LORD appeared to all the people. ²⁴Fire came forth from before the LORD and consumed the burnt offering and the fat parts on the altar. And all the people saw, and shouted, and fell on their faces.

a See Exod. 29.38–46. b This word moved up from v. 21 for clarity.

15–21: The people's sacrifices are offered, again following the logical sequence: purification, then the burnt offering and grain offering (since it too is in the "most-holy" category; see 6.10), and finally the well-being offering which is to constitute the sacred feast of celebration. 15: Like the previous one: The text does not state specifically (as it did above regarding the priests' "hata't") what was done with the meat; this omission prepares us for what is to follow (10.16–20). 17: Unlike the "minhah" of the individual (2.3, etc.; 6.9–11), this public one is offered in its entirety (as is the priest's; 6.16). The burnt offering of the morning, apparently the daily burnt offering prescribed in Exod. 29.38–39 (= Num. 28.3–4), indicating that its regular practice has already commenced (see Exod. 40.29). 18–21: Though the ritual of the "shelamim" is performed meticulously, the celebration to follow will be aborted.

22–24: Some rabbinic commentators suggest that Aaron's initial blessing was a plea for God to appear, consisting of the priestly blessing prescribed in Num. 6.22–27 (which includes the words "May the LORD shine His face upon you" and "May the LORD lift up His face toward you"). When this was not answered, Aaron realized he had been found wanting, either in his priestly abilities, in which case he needed to enter the Tabernacle for instruction, or in his personal merits, in which case he needed Moses to pray on his behalf. After Moses accompanied him into the Tabernacle and the situation was rectified, the subsequent blessing pronounced by two of them (consisting of the words of Ps. 90.17) was answered and the LORD appeared. This interpretation is fanciful. Taken in context, the vv. indicate two separate acts. In Aaron's first blessing he asks the LORD to deal favorably with the people; he and Moses then enter the Tabernacle and invite the deity to emerge, after which they bless the people again—this time praying on their behalf that God favor them all with His manifest Presence—to which the LORD then responds by making His long-awaited appearance. 22: Lifted his hands toward the people, to convey to them the blessings he has solicited on their behalf from God. Stepped down: The author anachronistically assumes the later Temple with which he is familiar, in which the altar would have been raised high above the ground; the Tabernacle altar was a portable one and was but three cubits (1.5 m, about 4.5 ft) high (Exod. 27.1). 23–24: The Presence appears in the entrance of the Tabernacle and divine fire emerges from within, igniting the altar fire and consuming the sacrificial portions arrayed there. At this the people cry out, an expression of joy, and fall prostrate, a mark of obeisance. The non-Priestly narratives too tell of a theophany at Sinai/Horeb (Exod. chs 19–20;

10 Now Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu each took his fire pan, put fire in it, and laid incense on it; and they offered before the LORD alien fire, which He had not enjoined upon them. ²And fire came forth from the LORD and consumed them; thus they died ^aat the instance of ^athe LORD. ³Then Moses said to Aaron, "This is what the LORD meant when He said:

Through those near to Me I show Myself holy,
And gain glory before all the people."

And Aaron was silent.

⁴Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, sons of Uzziel the uncle of Aaron, and said to them, "Come forward and carry your kinsmen away from the front of the sanctuary to a place outside the camp." ⁵They came forward and carried them out of the camp by their tunics, as Moses had ordered. ⁶And Moses said to Aaron and to his sons Eleazar and Ithamar, "Do not ^bbare your heads^b and do not rend your clothes, lest you die and anger strike the whole community. But your kinsmen, all the house of Israel, shall bewail the burning that the LORD has wrought. ⁷And so do not go outside the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, lest you die, for the LORD's anointing oil is upon you." And they did as Moses had bidden.

24.1–15a). The Priestly counterpart of these accounts relates nothing of a thunderous voice booming out from heaven and proclaiming the Decalogue or of a fiery descent of the LORD in the sight of all the people on the mountain. For P the theophany began with the arrival of the divine Presence at Sinai (Exod. 24.15–18a) where it lingered until the Israelites finished building the Tabernacle. It continued with the entrance of the divine Presence to dwell in its abode (Exod. 40.34–35), and reaches its culmination here. 10.1–3: The sin and death of Nadab and Abihu follow directly (see 9.1–10.20 n.). 1: Fire pan, a metal utensil with a handle used for offering smoking incense. Fire, Heb "esh" here means kindling material; see also Num. 17.2, 11. The brothers placed unlit coals (or wood for kindling) in the pans, in order to attract the divine fire to light them (see 1 Kings 18.38). Offered, i.e., presented, "brought near"; alien fire, unauthorized coals. They thus prepared an incense offering upon kindling of their own. Which He had not enjoined upon them: No offering of incense had been ordered; the only legitimate incense offerings are those made daily, by the high priest, upon the sacred altar (see Exod. 30.7–8). In public worship, only what is prescribed is legitimate; what is not is sacrilege. The Rabbis and medieval commentators thought otherwise, incredulous at the idea that God had struck down two young priests for a "mere" ritual offense, especially since it seemed to stem from a sincere, though perhaps overenthusiastic, desire to serve the LORD. They therefore suggested other reasons for the severe fate suffered by the two (such as drunkenness, celibacy, arrogant impatience for Moses and Aaron to die, or neglect of their sacred obligations). In biblical thought, however, ritual crimes are dire. Further, the sin of the two brothers was not simply that they went too far in their misguided super-piety. Rather, they acted in utter disregard for the deity. God intended that the manifestation of His Presence would ignite the altar fire, marking His acceptance of His people's devotion. Their intent was for the divine fire to ignite their own pans; that is, they were attempting to arrogate control of the deity to themselves. 2: Fire came forth from the LORD, from the Holy of Holies; similarly 9.24. The sacrilege of Nadab and Abihu evokes a spontaneous response: Crimes of trespass upon the sacred are automatically fatal. 3: This is what the LORD meant: The reference may be to Exod. 29.42; otherwise one must assume that the statement was made at an earlier point but recorded only here. Those near to Me, perhaps more simply, "those who come too near to Me." Show Myself holy . . . gain glory: Frequently in biblical thought, God's holiness is displayed, and His glory made manifest, in the swift and unrelenting punishment of those who offend His majesty. 4–5: The corpses must be removed immediately; to allow such a potent source of contamination to remain in contact with the most sacred sphere would be particularly dangerous. 5: By their tunics: Direct physical contact with the bodies is also avoided. 6–7: Mourning rituals, as well as contact with the dead, are forbidden to priests (21.1–6, 10–12). The surviving priests are warned that if they compound the offense of Nadab and Abihu with further ritual infraction their fate will be no less severe, and the community too will be placed in jeopardy; see 4.3. Their first concern must be to prevent the holy from being defiled and the service of the deity from being disrupted. Bare your heads, correctly "dishevel your heads [i.e., your hair]"; a bared head was not a sign of mourning. Shall bewail the burning that the LORD has wrought: The death of Aaron's sons is all the more tragic for the fact that it was deserved. Although the officiating priests are forbidden to display any outward

⁸ And the LORD spoke to Aaron, saying: ⁹ Drink no wine or other intoxicant, you or your sons, when you enter the Tent of Meeting, that you may not die. This is a law for all time throughout the ages, ¹⁰ for you must distinguish between the sacred and the profane, and between the unclean and the clean; ¹¹ and you must teach the Israelites all the laws which the LORD has imparted to them through Moses.

¹⁶ Then Moses inquired about the goat of sin offering, and it had already been burned! He was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's remaining sons, and said, ¹⁷ "Why did you not eat the sin offering in the sacred area? For it is most holy, and He has given it to you to remove the guilt of the community and to make expiation for them before the LORD. ¹⁸ Since its blood was not brought inside the sanctuary,^a you should certainly have eaten it in the sanctuary, as I commanded." ¹⁹ And Aaron spoke to Moses, "See, this day they brought their sin offering and their burnt offering before the LORD, and such things have befallen me! Had I eaten sin offering today, would the LORD have approved?" ²⁰ And when Moses heard this, he approved.

11 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying to them: ² Speak to the Israelite people thus:

These are the creatures that you may eat from among all the land animals: ³ any animal that has true hoofs, with clefts through the hoofs, and that chews^b the cud—such manifestations of grief, the people at large are under no such restriction (but see 19.27–28).

8–10: Priests need to maintain sobriety in order to discharge their sacred tasks, not only their ritual duties but also priestly instruction, which require the ability to make precise distinctions and rulings. This parenthetical passage, which seems out of place here, could well serve as the introduction to the remainder of Leviticus, in which the priestly tasks of distinguishing between the sacred and the profane, and between the unclean and the clean are described. 12–16: Internal feelings notwithstanding, Aaron, Elazar, and Ithamar are to continue as though nothing has occurred. The priests' portions of the well-being offerings are given to them; they, and their families, may eat the meat later in the day and perhaps the next day as well (see 7.15–16). The festive repast to be held by the people (see 9.18–21) following the day's ceremonies was probably canceled. 16–20: Diligently keeping track that each of the day's offerings has been handled properly, Moses finally arrives at the people's "ḥata't" (9.15). Since this, though public, was performed for preventive purification, its blood, unlike that for a communal offense (4.13–21), was not brought into the Tabernacle interior. Yet, Moses discovers, Aaron and his surviving sons, instead of eating the meat, have had it burned, in apparent violation of 6.23. Aaron's response means that what has occurred is a one-time exception in light of the tragic circumstances; no ritual reform has been attempted nor is there any dispute as to the proper procedure. Thus is Moses' apprehension put to rest.

11.1–47: Laws regulating the consumption of flesh. Communication of laws to Moses now resumes. The Priestly doctrine of prohibited and permitted food-stuffs derives from the belief that human beings, having dominion over the world and all it contains, are permitted, since the flood, to eat all vegetation and all (nonhu-

you may eat. ⁴The following, however, of those that either chew the cud or have true hoofs, you shall not eat: the camel—although it chews the cud, it has no true hoofs: it is unclean for you; ⁵the daman—although it chews the cud, it has no true hoofs: it is unclean for you; ⁶the hare—although it chews the cud, it has no true hoofs: it is unclean for you; ⁷and the swine—although it has true hoofs, with the hoofs cleft through, it does not chew the cud: it is unclean for you. ⁸You shall not eat of their flesh or touch their carcasses; they are unclean for you.

⁹These you may eat of all that live in water: anything in water, whether in the seas or in the streams, that has fins and scales—these you may eat. ¹⁰But anything in the seas or in the streams that has no fins and scales, among all the man) meat. There is but one stipulation: Humans must not consume an animal's blood along with its flesh. All this, P believes, has been known since the time of Noah (Gen. 9.1–4). Now, however, Moses is informed that the Israelite people are to be subject to a host of additional restrictions. These extend to all five categories of the animal kingdom: (a) large land animals (vv. 2–8), (b) beings that dwell in the water (vv. 9–12), (c) fowl (vv. 13–19), (d) flying insects (vv. 20–23), and (e) small land animals (vv. 41–42). Each category is subdivided into those animals that Israelites may eat and those that they may not. The criteria of division are present in nature itself: The distinction between forbidden and permitted meat, while incumbent upon Israelites alone, is a part of creation as reflected in Gen. 1.1–2.4. This is similar to the Sabbath: Though it was sanctified at creation, its observance was obligatory only for the Israelites. By maintaining a set of dietary restrictions corresponding to the distinctions held to be present in the natural world, the Israelites, in Priestly thought, are kept holy, that is, separate from the remainder of humanity (vv. 44–45; see also 20.25–26) and within the inner circle of proximity to the divine. In both categories of land animals (a and e), an additional dimension exists: Contact with the carcasses of the prohibited animals also communicates impurity. Though this is mentioned briefly in (a) (vv. 4, 7, 8), its ramifications are detailed in the vv. preceding (e) (vv. 24–40). This ch anticipates the next four (chs 12–15), in which the issue of impurity and the need to eradicate it will be taken up in full. The laws of permitted and forbidden meat (also in briefer form in Deut. 14.3–20) constitute only a portion of the biblical dietary laws. Elsewhere in P are prohibitions of blood and suet (3.16–17; 7.22–27; 17.10–14; see also 19.26); outside of P too blood is prohibited (Deut. 12.16, 23–24). The non-Priestly laws also forbid Israelites to eat carrion (Exod. 22.30; Deut. 14.21), which P does not accept (see vv. 39–40 n.), and prohibit cooking a kid in its mother's milk (Exod. 23.19; 34.26; Deut. 14.21), which P does not mention. Together with the law of slaughter, traditionally believed to have been communicated to Moses orally (see 1.5 n.), these laws provide the biblical basis for the laws of "kashrut" practiced to this day. 1: These laws are communicated to Aaron along with Moses, in view of the priests' responsibility for scrupulously maintaining the prescribed distinctions; see 10.10–11. 2–8: Category (a): large land animals. It is assumed that domestic livestock (cattle, sheep, and goats) may be eaten; since these animals are fit for sacrifice, they are obviously permitted. In

Priestly law, however, domestic livestock may only be eaten as sacrificial meat (see 17.3–8). Therefore the text here must be dealing with nondomestic animals, as is the case throughout the ch. These vv. establish that Israelites may eat the meat of other large land animals only if they resemble domestic livestock, i.e., if they possess the latter's characteristics. They are listed in Deut. 14.5: the deer, the gazelle, the roebuck, the wild goat, the ibex, the antelope, the mountain sheep. There, however, they are equated with the domestic ones, since Deuteronomical law disagrees with P, permitting the nonsacrificial slaughter of cattle, sheep, and goats as well. 3: Has true hoofs . . . chews the cud: These characteristics have no intrinsic or symbolic significance; they are simply the distinguishing features of cattle, sheep, and goats and therefore serve as a simple means for identifying other permitted animals. 4–7: The three illustrations—the camel, the daman, and the swine—serve as further indication that nondomestic animals are intended. Their inclusion shows that one characteristic is not enough; only animals that both ruminate and have cloven hooves are permitted. Swine are not singled out here. Unclean: In addition to being forbidden as food, the meat of these animals communicates impurity. This is elaborated upon below (see vv. 24–28). 8: You shall not eat of their flesh or touch their carcasses, probably equivalent to the parallel v. 11 "you shall not eat of their flesh [and you shall avoid] (see v. 10 n.) their carcasses." Throughout P contact with sources of impurity is not forbidden; it is to be avoided when possible, and when it has occurred purification is mandatory but no misdeed has been committed (see chs 12–15). As is clear from vv. 24ff., this applies here as well. 9–12: Category (b): water creatures. The Israelites may eat the flesh of beings that populate the waters only if they have the characteristics peculiar to fish. 9–10: Fins and scales: The water creatures divide into two swarming things of the water and among all the other living creatures that are in the water—they are an abomination for you ¹¹ and an abomination for you they shall remain: you shall not eat of their flesh and you shall abominate their carcasses. ¹² Everything in water that has no fins and scales shall be an abomination for you.

²⁴ And the following shall make you unclean—whoever touches their carcasses shall be unclean until evening, ²⁵ and whoever carries the carcasses of any of them shall wash his clothes and be unclean until evening—²⁶ every animal that has true hoofs but without clefts through the hoofs, or that does not chew the cud. They are unclean for you; whoever touches them shall be unclean. ²⁷ Also all animals that walk on paws, among those that walk on fours, are unclean for you; whoever touches their carcasses shall be unclean until evening. ²⁸ And anyone who carries their carcasses shall wash his clothes and remain unclean until evening. They are unclean for you.

groups: fish, thought of as the “proper” or normal form of maritime life, and all others, all the swarming things of the water. Those in the former group are easily identified by the two features characteristic of fish; those in the latter are forbidden. 10–12: Abomination (Heb “sheketz”), abominate (Heb “sh-k-tz”), in this ch refer specifically to forbidden animals. Perhaps you shall abominate and an abomination for you mean that although there is nothing intrinsically loathsome about these animals, the Israelite is to abhor them simply because they are prohibited. But abominate may be too strong and in P may mean “avoid.” Unlike forbidden land creatures, forbidden water creatures and flying creatures do not communicate impurity. 13–19: Category (c): fowl. This section does not provide a set of distinguishing markings to identify the permitted species; it simply enumerates the prohibited ones, implying that all others are allowed. Rabbinic tradition attempted to supply the missing key, suggesting that the prohibited fowl are all birds of prey; the permitted fowl are nonpredators. This category may be analogous to (a): It is taken for granted that the turtle dove and the pigeon are permitted since they are fit for the altar; the list of forbidden fowl would then be an enumeration of all known fowl that are dissimilar in their appearance and habits to the fowl used in sacrifice. The eagle, the vulture, . . .: Some of the translations are uncertain. 20–23: Category (d): flying insects, winged swarming things. Those with jointed legs above their feet for leaping on the ground are permissible. These are named; all others, as stressed by the repetition in v. 23, are forbidden. Unlike the previous categories, here the basic category itself is forbidden; only insects that diverge from the characteristics of the category and resemble birds more than insects may be eaten. 24–40: These parenthetical vv. interrupt the flow, introducing a series of laws pertaining to impurities generated or communicated by the flesh of creatures mentioned in (a) and (e). This is anticipated by, and elaborates on, what has preceded, but since v. 41 is the direct continuation of v. 23, it seems most likely that these vv. are secondary. Perhaps they were inserted here, instead of after (e) which would have been more natural, in order for v. 43 to follow vv. 41–42 directly. 24–25: The superscription and its explanation: The carcasses of the following creatures communicate impurity by direct contact and carrying. The impurity is minor; only a brief time, until sunset, followed by laundering (and, presumably, bathing) is needed for it to dissipate. 26–28: Elaborating on (a). The first to be mentioned (v. 26) whose impurity was noted above (vv. 3–8); to these, such animals such as bears, dogs and cats, which would not be eaten in any ²⁹The following^a shall be unclean for you from among the things that swarm on the earth: the mole, the mouse, and great lizards of every variety; ³⁰the gecko, the land crocodile, the lizard, the sand lizard, and the chameleon. ³¹Those are for you the unclean among all the swarming things; whoever touches them when they are dead shall be unclean until evening. ³²And anything on which one of them falls when dead shall be unclean: be it any article of wood, or a cloth, or a skin, or a sack—any such article that can be put to use shall be dipped in water, and it shall remain unclean until evening; then it shall be clean. ³³And if any of those falls into an earthen vessel, everything inside it shall be unclean and [the vessel] itself you shall break. ³⁴As to any food that may be eaten, it shall become unclean if it came in contact with water;^b as to any liquid that may be drunk, it shall become unclean if it was inside any vessel.^c ³⁵Everything on which the carcass of any of them falls shall be unclean: an oven or stove shall be smashed. They are unclean and unclean they shall remain for you. ³⁶However, a spring or cistern in which water is collected shall be clean, but whoever touches such a carcass in it shall be unclean. ³⁷If such a carcass falls upon seed grain that is to be sown, it is clean; ³⁸but if water is put on the seed and any part of a carcass falls upon it, it shall be unclean for you.

³⁹If an animal that you may eat has died, anyone who touches its carcass shall be unclean until evening; ⁴⁰anyone who eats of its carcass shall wash his clothes and remain unclean until evening; and anyone who carries its carcass shall wash his clothes and remain unclean until evening.

⁴¹All the things that swarm upon the earth are an abomination; they shall not be eaten. ⁴²You shall not eat, case and are therefore omitted above, are added (v. 27). The opening statement is then repeated (v. 28). 29–38: Anticipating (e) (vv. 41–42). The realities of life are such that the carcasses of small land animals are not only likely to come into direct contact with humans, thus communicating impurity directly; they are especially likely to come into contact with foodstuffs, vessels and utensils, seeds, and water supply.

31–35: Like humans who have contracted this impurity and are governed by the rule in vv. 24–25 (see v. 31), articles of wood and leather require washing and the lapse of one day in order for the impurity to dissipate (v. 32). Earthen vessels that have absorbed impurity cannot be cleansed (v. 33). Liquid in vessels becomes impure if the unclean animal has fallen in (v. 34b), but sources of fresh water, while not cleansing the unclean animal, remain pure and do not communicate impurity, since they are constantly washing it away (v. 36). Dry foodstuffs are not susceptible to impurity, but are if they have been moistened by water (v. 34a). 34: If it came in contact with water: This translation is misleading; the water does not render it unclean. Rather, it becomes capable of contracting impurity if, prior to coming in contact with the unclean object, it is moistened at any time by water; see v. 38. 35: An oven or stove shall be smashed: These too are of earthenware; earthenware, being porous, thoroughly absorbs impurity and cannot be cleansed. 37–38: Seed and grain, like foodstuffs, are not susceptible to impurity until they come into contact with water; thenceforth contact with an unclean animal renders them unclean. 39–40: These vv. confirm that according to P “nevelah,” the meat of an animal that has died by itself rather than being slaughtered, is permitted as long as the animal is one that may be eaten. Impurity results and must be remedied, but no sin has been committed. Elsewhere in P this is extended to “terefah,” the meat of an animal that has been “torn,” i.e., killed by another beast; see 17.15–16. In P, only priests are commanded to abstain from “nevelah” and “terefah”; see 17.15–16 and 22.8. 39: An animal that you may eat: Above, and in 5.2 and 7.21, it is only the meat of unclean animals that communicates impurity. Here, and in 17.15–16 (see also 7.23) the meat of permitted animals does so as well. It may be possible to reconcile this conflict; perhaps the carcass and flesh of an unclean animal (which may not be eaten) communicates impurity no matter how the animal has died, whereas that of permitted animals does so only if the animal has died on its own or been killed by a beast (though it may be eaten, see above); if it has been slaughtered, no impurity results. 41–42: Category (e): small land animals. Like (d), the category per se is prohibited, but here there are no ex-among all things that swarm upon the earth, anything that crawls on its belly, or anything that walks on fours, or anything that has many legs; for they are an abomination. ⁴³You shall not draw abomination upon yourselves through anything that swarms; you shall not make yourselves unclean therewith and thus become unclean. ⁴⁴For I the LORD am your God: you shall sanctify yourselves and be holy, for I am holy. You shall not make yourselves unclean through any swarming thing that moves upon the earth. ⁴⁵For I the LORD am He who brought you up from the land of Egypt to be your God: you shall be holy, for I am holy.

⁴⁶These are the instructions concerning animals, birds, all living creatures that move in water, and all creatures that swarm on earth, ⁴⁷for distinguishing between the unclean and the clean, between the living things that may be eaten and the living things that may not be eaten.

ceptions. The only permitted land animals are thus domestic livestock and fowl and those which resemble them, and a few exceptions to the general rule prohibiting all others, namely the explicitly named types of flying insects.

43–45: The conclusion of the instructions stresses the aim of the food restrictions. By restricting consumption of meat to clean animals, the Israelites sanctify themselves and become holy; for the idea expressed by these terms see 11.1–47 n. 43: Draw abomination upon yourselves: Heb actually means "make your throats loathsome," a straightforward way of saying "eat that which is loathsome." 45: Who brought you up from the land of Egypt to be your God, see 26.13 n. You shall be holy, for I am holy, see 19.2. 46–47: This typically Priestly caption, like 7.37–38, summarizes what precedes it.

Chs 12–15: Disposal of impurity. The next four chs prescribe how to dispose of the types of impurity identified by the Priestly tradition. "Impurity" (Heb "tum'ah") is often translated as contamination, defilement, pollution, or uncleanness. In P "tum'ah" is like an atmospheric layer or coating, enveloping the impure person or object. Though invisible, it is believed to be quite real; though amorphous it is substantive. Its causes are four: human corpses, carcasses of animals, fluxes of life fluids, and a specific condition known as "tzara'at" (see chs 13–14). The common denominator is that all these are manifestations of death, or more precisely, of the escape of the forces of life. Thus the corpse and the carcass, out of which life may be thought to "leak," defile; similarly semen, menstrual fluid, the blood lost in childbirth, and other genital discharge (though not human waste, which has nothing to do with the escape of life, and not blood, apparently because it is the purifying agent) defile as well. The disease or condition known as "tzara'at" too is thought of as a form of gradually escaping life (see Num. 12.12). Impurity is distinct from its causes: Corpses, carcasses, fluids, and "tzara'at" are not the defilement itself; rather, they produce the defilement, by process of spontaneous generation. We may compare "tum'ah" to a miasma, an aura of invisible vapors, expanding to fill available space and polluting all that it touches, contagiously contaminating persons and objects with which they come into contact and communicating to them various degrees of indirect (secondary or tertiary) impurity, which in turn needs to be disposed of. Unlike similar notions found outside the Bible, "tum'ah" in P is not demonic, not created by or connected with evil spirits or malicious deities. Neither is it the same as modern notions of dirt or filth, or of infection. Rather, it is a simple fact of life, a part of nature; certain phenomena in the created world are empirically sources of impurity. These phenomena are not necessarily bad; there is nothing morally repugnant about a human corpse or the carcass of an animal, there is nothing sinful about menstruation or sexual intercourse, and there is no evil in a genital flux or a disease of the skin. For this reason, nowhere in the Priestly law is there a prohibition of the lay Israelite's becoming "tame'" per se; people and objects routinely and unavoidably contract impurity at all times. The grievous and dangerous sin connected with impurity is rather that of remaining impure, of failing to dispose of impurity once one has contracted it, thereby allowing it to spread and to come into contact with the sacred, i.e., the sanctuary and its furnishings. For "tum'ah," as pictured by Priestly thought, is drawn irresistibly to the sacred sphere, which is particularly vulnerable to its penetration, and there it accumulates. If this goes unchecked, i.e., if too much of this odious matter collects in the divine abode, the divine Presence will depart and then Israel is doomed (see 15.31 n.). Only priests, who unclean as at the time of her menstrual infirmity.—³On the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised.—⁴She shall remain in a state of blood purification^a for thirty-three days: she shall not touch any consecrated thing, nor enter the sanctuary until her period of purification is completed. ⁵If she bears a female, she shall be unclean two weeks as during her menstruation, and she shall remain in a state of blood purification^a for sixty-six days.

are in constant contact with the sacred sphere, are explicitly cautioned to shun all but the most unavoidable impurity; lay Israelites are under no such obligation; they are simply required to attend conscientiously to its disposal. Three elements effect the disposal of impurity: the passage of time, cleansing (usually in water), and the purification offering. The first two purify the individual, the third purges the sanctuary. The minor types of impurity require only the bathing of the impure individual and the laundering of clothing, after which the impurity dissipates on its own by nightfall. Contamination of the Tabernacle by such minor impurities is negligible and is presumably cleansed by routine public offerings. Major impurities, on the other hand, directly contaminate the Tabernacle. When they occur, in addition to the passage of time and cleansing, a “ḥata’t” sacrifice must be made on behalf of the impure individual, in order to eradicate the impurity that he has caused to accumulate in the Tabernacle. Later tradition tended to adopt a less literal, more practical view of biblical “tum’ah,” and often reinterpreted it symbolically. Further, by rejecting the idea that impurity is drawn to the sanctuary from afar, the Rabbis made it less of a concern—only those who planned actually to visit the Temple need worry about purifying themselves. Ultimately “tum’ah” became simply an arbitrarily decreed ritual “state.” In biblical teaching, in contrast to its later interpretation, impurity

12.1–8: Impurity after childbirth. Neither procreation nor childbirth is sinful. Like other bodily impurities, the defilement attached to childbirth has no moral significance whatsoever; it is a fact of nature. As the text explicitly says, the woman who has given birth needs to be purified from her flow of blood (v. 7). The observable discharge of heavy, dark fluid (“lochia rubra”), which lasts for a number of days, followed by a lighter flow (“lochia blanca”) which may last for a number of weeks, provides the empirical explanation of the two phases of her purification. In order to prescribe unified legislation, these two approximate periods are standardized into the “round” numbers seven and forty used throughout the Bible, which are then doubled (see v. 5). The ch outlines the stages of the mother’s purification if a male child has been born (vv. 2–4), explains how they differ if a female child is born (v. 5), and prescribes how the mother is obligated to see to the purification of the sanctuary, whether she is a person of means (vv. 6–7) or not (v. 8). 2: She shall be unclean seven days: During the first phase the mother is severely unclean; her impurity penetrates to the sphere of the sacred, requiring her to offer a “ḥata’t.” This, however, she cannot do until she is completely purified, several weeks later (vv. 6–7a). Unclean as at the time of her menstrual infirmity: In addition to the fact that her impurity contaminates the sanctuary from afar, the regulations pertaining to the parturient are identical to those pertaining to the menstruant, as given in 15.19–24. She communicates minor impurity to whatever and whomever she touches by direct or almost direct contact.

3: Circumcision is not a stage in the purification process. It is noted here by association; mention of the seventh day of a male child’s life quite naturally calls to mind the event of the eighth day. Halakhic exegesis also notes that since the command of circumcision was given not to Moses but to Abraham (Gen. 17.9–14), it needed to be repeated here, in the context of the giving of the law to Israel in the wilderness, in order to be valid.

4: In a state of blood purification, lit. “in the blood of becoming pure,” that is, she will continue to observe some discharge, and thus remain impure to a lesser degree, before becoming fully purified. Thirty-three days: The number thirty-three, which has no significance, when combined with the first seven days yields forty, a “round” number of purification days. Not touch any consecrated thing, better, “anything holy.” During the second phase, she continues to contaminate sacred objects and the sanctuary, but only by direct contact, no longer from afar; she no longer communicates impurity to the nonsacred (to other humans or objects) at all. Thus she is permitted to resume relations with her husband in this second phase. Rabbinic law is more stringent, requiring a longer period of time; see also 15.19. 5: The reason the length of each phase is doubled when a female child is born is difficult to determine. Modern medicine recognizes no difference between the postpartum genital flow of the mother of a boy and that of the mother of a girl. The ancients, however, may have believed there was a difference, or they may have noted that there is occasionally vaginal flow from the infant girl herself and viewed this as necessitating a longer purification by the mother. 6–7a: The expi-

ther son or daughter, she shall bring to the priest, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, a lamb in its first year for a burnt offering, and a pigeon or a turtledove for a sin offering.^a ⁷He shall offer it before the LORD and make expiation on her behalf; she shall then be clean from her flow of blood. Such are the rituals concerning her who bears a child, male or female. ⁸If, however, her means do not suffice for a sheep, she shall take two turtledoves or two pigeons, one for a burnt offering and the other for a sin offering. The priest shall make expiation on her behalf, and she shall be clean.

13 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying: ²When a person has on the skin of his body a swelling, a rash, or a discoloration, and it develops into a scaly affection on the skin of his body, it shall be reported^b to Aaron the priest or to one of his sons, the priests. ³The priest shall examine the affection on the skin of his body:

a See note at 4.3. b Or "he shall be brought."

ation, that is, decontamination of the sanctuary, is accomplished elsewhere by means of the "hata't" sacrifice (see ch 4). Uniquely, the mother is also required to offer a burnt offering (see ch 1), though generally this is not needed for expiation. It may be an expression of thanks or a required gesture of obeisance. 6: Sin offering, correctly, purification offering (see 4.3); no sin has been committed. 7b: The summary caption. 8: An appended provision made for the woman who cannot afford the costly sacrifice (see 5.7–10 n.). Here the concern is to ensure that every parturient, even the poorest, performs her expiation, so that the divine abode is cleansed.

13.1–14.57: Impurity caused by "tzara'at." These two chs are a unit (see summary at 14.54–57), prescribing the elimination of the impurity caused by "tzara'at." This has sometimes been translated as "leprosy" (or "leprous affection"), but the disease today called leprosy (Hanson's disease) was not known in biblical times and the description given in the Bible is not consistent with it. Further, since "tzara'at" afflicts not only humans but also fabrics (13.47–59) and building materials (14.33–47), it cannot be identified with a single pathology. The distinctive symptom of "tzara'at" in humans is scale-like eruptions of the skin. Though most similar to psoriasis and vitiligo, not all of the symptoms correspond. Lacking modern microbiology, the Bible referred to conditions with similar outward manifestations by a single name. "Tzara'at" in fabrics and building materials are types of mildew. The Bible does not view disease per se as defiling. Only those having "tzara'at" or abnormal genital fluxes (see 15.1–33 n., 15.1–15, 25–30) are considered to be impure. "Tzara'at," seen as a gradual erosion of the skin, was thought to culminate, unless the patient recovered, in the ultimate disintegration of the flesh, which was taken as a manifestation of the gradual escape of life. The person afflicted with it was looked upon as potentially dead (see Num. 12.12), death itself having begun to consume his body (Job 18.13). This "leakage" of life, according to P, creates impurity (see chs 12–15 n.). For the steps necessary to dispose of the impurity lest it spread to the sanctuary, the priest, in his sacred role of distinguishing the pure from the impure (see 10.10; cf. 11.47) is given the task of "diagnosing" "tzara'at" in humans, fabrics, and buildings. But the priest is not a physician, and has no role in the healing process; the commands detail only the procedure to be followed, and the information necessary, for him to determine if the lesion is "tzara'at" or not. If it is, purification and expiation are prescribed; if not, the priest pronounces it clean. In the Bible, the onset and progress of disease, its persistence or eventual disappearance, are essentially outside of human control. In other biblical books "tzara'at" is seen as a divine penalty (e.g., Num. 12.10; 2 Kings 15.5). Rabbinic thought agreed, suggesting that the person afflicted with "tzara'at" (the "metzora'") was being punished thereby for the sin of slander (the same consonants in Heb: "motzi ra'"). But none of this is expressed here. P seems to view "tzara'at" quite matter-of-factly as a feature of the natural world created by God, like unclean animals, gonorrhea, and menstruation. No moral judgment is passed on the afflicted individuals, who are accountable only if they fail to attend to the prompt eradication of impurity once the disease has disappeared. 13.1: As in 11.1, the laws are communicated to Aaron as well as Moses, reflecting the central role of the priest in what follows. 1–46: Each set of symptoms is taken up separately, and directions are provided in order to determine whether "tzara'at" is present or not. If it is not, the priest declares the person pure. If it is, the person is declared impure until such time as the affliction is healed and the purification rituals have been completed (ch 14). If a conclusive diagnosis cannot be made, seven-day waiting periods ensue, after which the condition is examined again. 2–8: A swelling, a rash, or a discoloration (better: "shiny mark"): These are immediately if hair in the affected patch has turned white and the affection appears to be deeper than the skin of his body, it is a leprous affection;^a when the priest sees it, he shall pronounce him unclean. ⁴But if it is a white discoloration on the skin of his body which does not appear to be deeper than the skin and the hair in it has not turned white, the priest shall isolate the affected person for seven days. ⁵On the seventh day the priest shall examine him, and if the affection has remained unchanged in color and the disease has not spread on the skin, the priest shall isolate him for another seven days. ⁶On the seventh day the priest shall examine him again: if the affection has faded and has not spread on the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean. It is a rash; he shall wash his clothes, and he shall be clean. ⁷But if the rash should spread on the skin after he has presented himself to the priest and been pronounced clean, he shall present himself again to the priest. ⁸And if the priest sees that the rash has spread on the skin, the priest shall pronounce him unclean; it is leprosy.

⁹When a person has a scaly affection, it shall be reported^b to the priest. ¹⁰If the priest finds on the skin a white swelling which has turned some hair white, with “a patch of undisclored flesh”^c in the swelling, ¹¹it is chronic leprosy on the skin of his body, and the priest shall pronounce him unclean; he need not isolate him, for he is unclean. ¹²If the eruption spreads out over the skin so that it covers all the skin of the affected person from head to foot, wherever the priest can see—¹³if the priest sees that the eruption has covered the whole body—he shall pronounce the affected person clean; he is clean, for he has turned all white. ¹⁴But as soon as undisclored flesh appears in it, he shall be unclean; ¹⁵when the priest sees the undisclored flesh, he shall pronounce him unclean. The undisclored flesh is unclean; it is leprosy. ¹⁶But if the undisclored flesh again turns white, he shall come to the priest, ¹⁷and the priest shall examine him: if the affection has turned white, the priest shall pronounce the affected person clean; he is clean.

¹⁸When an inflammation appears on the skin of one’s body and it heals, ¹⁹and a white swelling or a white discoloration streaked with red develops where the inflammation was, he shall present himself to the priest. ²⁰If the

deemed to be “tzara’at” if the two symptoms in v. 3 are present. Otherwise a seven-day quarantine commences, after which, if the condition has spread or if the two symptoms appear, it is pronounced to be “tzara’at.” If not, a second seven-day period is observed; during it, if the condition spreads the afflicted person must immediately report back to the priest and be pronounced unclean. At the end of the second week, a final check is made: If the affection has faded it is deemed to be merely a rash and the person is pronounced clean; if at that time, or subsequently, it has spread or the two symptoms have appeared, it is deemed “tzara’at.” 3: A leprous affection, Heb “tzara’at”; better, “scale disease” (see above) or “surface affection.” 4: Shall isolate the affected person: This quarantine is not aimed at arresting the spread of the disease, but is an attempt to contain the spread of an intolerable amount of severe impurity in case “tzara’at” is present. 9–11: A scaly affection: This is immediately deemed to be “tzara’at” if it shows the three symptoms given in v. 10; no period of waiting is needed. 10: Undisclored flesh, lit. “raw” or “living” flesh. It appears where scales have rubbed off, indicating that the disease is still active. 11–13: The spreading of the scales to the entire body rather than deepening and causing erosion in specific spots indicates that healing is under way and the person is pronounced pure. 14–17: Undisclored flesh, see v. 10. Its reappearance indicates the disease has not yet healed; that is established only when the “raw” flesh again turns white and remains so. 18–23: A boil that heals and is followed by a white swelling or a whitish-reddish mark is deemed on sight to be “tzara’at” if the two symptoms outlined in v. 20 are present. If they are not, a seven-day waiting period is observed, after which, if the condition has spread, it is pronounced “tzara’at”; otherwise the person is pronounced pure.

priest finds that it appears lower than the rest of the skin and that the hair in it has turned white, the priest shall pronounce him unclean; it is a leprous affection that has broken out in the inflammation. ²¹But if the priest finds that there is no white hair in it and it is not lower than the rest of the skin, and it is faded, the priest shall isolate him for seven days. ²²If it should spread in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him unclean; it is an affection. ²³But if the discoloration remains stationary, not having spread, it is the scar of the inflammation; the priest shall pronounce him clean.

²⁹If a man or a woman has an affection on the head or in the beard, ³⁰the priest shall examine the affection. If it appears to go deeper than the skin and there is thin yellow hair in it, the priest shall pronounce him unclean; it is a scall, a scaly eruption in the hair or beard. ³¹But if the priest finds that the scall affection does not appear to go deeper than the skin, yet there is no black hair in it, the priest shall isolate the person with the scall affection for seven days. ³²On the seventh day the priest shall examine the affection. If the scall has not spread and no yellow hair has appeared in it, and the scall does not appear to go deeper than the skin, ³³the person with the scall shall shave himself, but without shaving the scall; the priest shall isolate him for another seven days. ³⁴On the seventh day the priest shall examine the scall. If the scall has not spread on the skin, and does not appear to go deeper than the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean; he shall wash his clothes, and he shall be clean. ³⁵If, however, the scall should spread on the skin after he has been pronounced clean, ³⁶the priest shall examine him. If the scall has spread on the skin, the priest need not look for yellow hair: he is unclean. ³⁷ But if the scall has remained unchanged in color, and black hair has grown in it, the scall is healed; he is clean. The priest shall pronounce him clean.

⁴⁷ When an eruptive affection occurs in a cloth of wool or linen fabric, ⁴⁸ in the warp or in the woof of the linen or the wool, or in a skin or in anything made of skin; ⁴⁹ if the affection in the cloth or the skin, in the warp or the woof, or in any article of skin, is streaky green^b or red, it is an eruptive affection. It shall be shown to the priest; ⁵⁰ and the priest, after examining the affection, shall isolate the affected article for seven days. ⁵¹ On the seventh day he shall examine the affection: if the affection has spread in the cloth—whether in the warp or the woof, or in the skin, for whatever purpose the skin may be used—the affection is a malignant eruption; it is unclean. ⁵² The cloth—whether warp or woof in wool or linen, or any article of skin—in which the affection is found, shall be burned, for it is a malignant eruption; it shall be consumed in fire. ⁵³ But if the priest sees that the affection in the cloth—whether in warp or in woof, or in any article of skin—has not spread, ⁵⁴ the priest shall order the affected article washed, and he shall isolate it for another seven days.

38–39: Streaked with white discolorations, better, "shiny white marks." This supplements vv. 2–8, providing a method for determining if the mark is merely a "tetter" or white patch. 40–44: Normal baldness is not a sign of "tzara'at." If, however, it is accompanied by the symptoms given in v. 43, it is immediately deemed to be "tzara'at" and no waiting period is required. 44–46: These vv. detail the behavior required of the person found to have "tzara'at" of any type from the moment the diagnosis is certain until he or she is cured, after which the instructions given in ch 14 are followed. 45: His head shall be left bare, better, "[the hair of] his head shall be disheveled"; this, together with the rending of garments, is a sign of mourning (see 10.6), appropriate for a person diagnosed with a disease equivalent to death itself. Covering of the upper lip was also a sign of mourning (see Ezek. 24.17, 22). He shall call out, "Unclean! Unclean!" to warn others that the impurity (not the disease) is contagious. 46: He shall dwell apart: Since he remains removed from society, no details regarding how his impurity is transmitted to other persons and objects are given. Most likely the person with "tzara'at" also contaminates whatever is under the same roof; therefore he must dwell apart. His impurity also defiles the sacred, from afar, which is why he will need to perform expiation when he is able (see 14.19). Outside the camp: This refers to the wilderness period; in later periods, outside the city (see 2 Kings 7.3). 47–58: Types of mildew or mold in fabrics that cause erosion and destruction were yet another manifestation of the same leakage of life-force that is the source of all impurity in P and are therefore also "tzara'at." As with humans, the fabric suspected of impurity is isolated for seven days; if the condition has spread the suspicion is confirmed. If not, the fabric is cleaned and isolated for seven more days. If the affection has not spread and has begun to clear up the fabric is pro-

⁵⁵And if, after the affected article has been washed, the priest sees that the affection has not changed color and that it has not spread, it is unclean. It shall be consumed in fire; it is a fret,^a whether on its inner side or on its outer side. ⁵⁶But if the priest sees that the affected part, after it has been washed, is faded, he shall tear it out from the cloth or skin, whether in the warp or in the woof; ⁵⁷and if it occurs again in the cloth—whether in warp or in woof—or in any article of skin, it is a wild growth; the affected article shall be consumed in fire. ⁵⁸If, however, the affection disappears from the cloth—warp or woof—or from any article of skin that has been washed, it shall be washed again, and it shall be clean.

⁵⁹Such is the procedure for eruptive affections of cloth, woolen or linen, in warp or in woof, or of any article of skin, for pronouncing it clean or unclean.

14 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²This shall be the ritual for a leper at the time that he is to be cleansed.

When it has been reported^b to the priest, ³the priest shall go outside the camp. If the priest sees that the leper has been healed of his scaly affection, ⁴the priest shall order two live clean birds, cedar wood, crimson stuff, and hyssop to be brought for him who is to be cleansed. ⁵The priest shall order one of the birds slaughtered over fresh water in an earthen vessel; ⁶and he shall take the live bird, along with the cedar wood, the crimson stuff, and the hyssop, and dip them together with the live bird in the blood of the bird that was slaughtered over the fresh water. ⁷He shall then sprinkle it seven times on him who is to be nounced pure; otherwise it is deemed to have "tzara'at." Fabrics with confirmed cases cannot be "cured," and must be destroyed promptly; they cannot be purified through a ritual. This explains why these vv., which would perhaps read more naturally after 14.32, are placed here, before the laws prescribing the purification of persons and objects that have been cured. 55: Whether on its inner side or on its outer side, Heb is identical to v. 42 "the bald part in the front or at the back of the head" and is translated appropriately to the context. Most likely these words are a scribal error and should be deleted. 59: Procedure, better, "instructions" (Heb "torat"; see 6.2). This summary caption refers only to vv. 47–58; the entire "tzara'at" section is summed up at 14.54–57. 14.1–32: Resuming 13.46, these vv. prescribe the steps required of the person cured to dispose of the impurity he has created. Anthropologically and sociologically these rituals have been seen as rites of passage, marking the return of the outcast to normal life in human society and in God's presence. Rabbinic interpretation, which tended to view the person afflicted as under divine sanction for wrongdoing, generally explained these rituals as acts of contrition, penance, and thanksgiving. In fact, however, they are for ridding the person and the environment of the impurity that has been generated, and the afflicted person is under no disapprobation unless he or she fails to carry them out. 2–3: The process begins when the priest has examined the afflicted person and declared him cured. The cure itself is God's affair; the priest's task begins where God's ends.

2: This shall be the ritual for, better, "these are the instructions concerning"; see 6.2. A leper (Heb "metzora," i.e., a person afflicted with "tzara'at"); see 13.3 and 13.1–14.57 n. 3–20: The purification of the "metzora" and the expiation, in three stages. 3–7: Stage one takes place outside the camp as soon as the priest pronounces the afflicted person cured. Its purpose is to rid the person of the impurity that has enveloped the physical body during the ailment. The purging agent is the blood of the first of two birds. This is the only instance in which purifying blood is applied to a human. The sprinkling of the reconstituted blood of the red heifer on the person contaminated by contact with a corpse (Num. ch 19) is the closest parallel and further indicates the close connection between "tzara'at" and death. The second bird is kept alive and set free to carry off the impurity, like the scapegoat on the annual Day of "Atonement" (or Purification); see ch 16. 4: Live, i.e., wild birds, that live in the open country. Clean birds, see 11.13–19. Cedar wood, crimson stuff, agents of purification throughout biblical and ancient Near Eastern tradition. Hyssop, used for dipping and sprinkling, and therefore associated with purification (Ps. 51.9). 5: Over fresh water in an earthen vessel, to dilute the substance, so that there is a sufficient quantity that may easily be sprinkled. 7: The two birds are considered one entity. Thus the impurity, after being removed by the blood of the slaughtered bird, cleansed of the eruption and cleanse him; and he shall set the live bird free in the open country. ⁸The one to be cleansed shall wash his clothes, shave off all his hair, and bathe in water; then he shall be clean. After that he may enter the camp, but he must remain outside his tent seven days. ⁹On the seventh day he shall shave off all his hair—of head, beard, and eyebrows. When he has shaved off all his hair, he shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water; then he shall be clean. ¹⁰On the eighth day he shall take two male lambs without blemish, one ewe lamb in its first year without blemish, three-tenths of a measure of choice flour with oil mixed in for a meal offering, and one log of oil. ¹¹These shall be presented before the LORD, with the man to be cleansed, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, by the priest who performs the cleansing.

¹²The priest shall take one of the male lambs and offer it with the log of oil as a guilt offering, and he shall elevate them as an elevation offering before the LORD. ¹³The lamb shall be slaughtered at the spot in the sacred area where the sin offering and the burnt offering are slaughtered.^a For the guilt offering, like the sin offering, goes to the priest; it is most holy. ¹⁴The priest shall take some of the blood of the guilt offering, and the priest shall put it on the ridge of the right ear of him who is being cleansed, and on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot. ¹⁵The priest shall then take some of the log of oil and pour it into the palm of his own left hand. ¹⁶And the priest shall dip his right finger in the oil that is in the palm of his left hand and sprinkle some of the oil with his finger seven times before the LORD. ¹⁷Some of the oil left in his palm shall be put by the priest on the ridge of the right ear of the one being cleansed, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot—over the blood of the guilt offering. ¹⁸The rest of the oil in his palm the priest shall put on the head of the one being cleansed. Thus the priest shall make expiation for him before the LORD. ¹⁹The priest shall then offer the sin offering and make expiation for the one being cleansed of his uncleanness. Last, the burnt offering shall be slaughtered, ²⁰and the priest shall offer the burnt offering and the meal offering on the altar, and the priest shall make expiation for him. Then he shall be clean.

²¹If, however, he is poor and his means are insufficient, he shall take one male lamb for a guilt offering, to be elevated in expiation for him, one-tenth of a measure of choice flour with oil mixed in for a meal offering, and a log is believed to be transferred to the second, live bird which is then dispatched, thereby permanently disposing of it. 8–9: Stage two, on the seventh day, consists of the cleansing of the individual. That cleansing is not sufficient in itself, but must be preceded by the removal and disposal rituals and the lapse of a seven-day period, indicates the severity of this impurity.

10–20: In stage three, on the eighth day, the “metzora” makes his offerings. 12: Guilt offering: The presence of an “asham” sacrifice (see 5.14–26), its prominence evidenced among other things by the elevation ritual, is a mystery, since being afflicted with “tzara’at” is not an obvious trespass against the sacred. One theory is that the “metzora” is under the strong presumption of having committed sacrilege; otherwise why would he have been stricken (see 2 Chron. 26.16–19)? Another possibility is that the inherent sanctity of the Israelite individual (see 19.2) has been compromised, though this would be unexpected in this portion of the book (see 19.1–37 n.). Perhaps the “asham” is brought simply to provide blood for the final removal of residual impurity a week after the initial decontamination. 14–18: The smearing of consecrated oil in addition to the blood of the “asham” sacrifice apparently adds a measure of sanctification to the purification process. 19: Sin offering, i.e., purification offering (see ch 4), by means of which the “metzora” rids the sacred sphere of the impurity that has accumulated there during the course of his illness.

20: The burnt offering and the meal offering: These complete the full set of offerings by the “metzora.” These acts of homage express rejoining the society of living Israelites engaged in the worship of the LORD. Then he shall be clean: This sums up the entire process; it does not mean that the offerings purify the person. 21–32: The provisions for the healed “metzora” of modest means; see 5.7–13 n.; 12.8 n. of oil; ²²and two turtledoves or two pigeons, depending on his means, the one to be the sin offering and the other the burnt offering. ²³On the eighth day of his cleansing he shall bring them to the priest at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, before the LORD. ²⁴The priest shall take the lamb of guilt offering and the log of oil, and elevate them as an elevation offering before the LORD. ²⁵When the lamb of guilt offering has been slaughtered, the priest shall take some of the blood of the guilt offering and put it on the ridge of the right ear of the one being cleansed, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot. ²⁶The priest shall then pour some of the oil into the palm of his own left hand, ²⁷and with the finger of his right hand the priest shall sprinkle some of the oil that is in the palm of his left hand seven times before the LORD. ²⁸Some of the oil in his palm shall be put by the priest on the ridge of the right ear of the one being cleansed, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot, over the same places as the blood of the guilt offering; ²⁹and what is left of the oil in his palm the priest shall put on the head of the one being cleansed, to make expiation for him before the LORD. ³⁰He shall then offer one of the turtledoves or pigeons, depending on his means—³¹whichever he can afford—the one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering, together with the meal offering. Thus the priest shall make expiation before the LORD for the one being cleansed. ³²Such is the ritual for him who has a scaly affection and whose means for his cleansing are limited.

³³The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying:

³⁴When you enter the land of Canaan that I give you as a possession, and I inflict an eruptive plague upon a house in the land you possess, ³⁵the owner of the house shall come and tell the priest, saying, "Something like a plague has appeared upon my house." ³⁶The priest shall order the house cleared before the priest enters to examine the plague, so that nothing in the house may become unclean; after that the priest shall enter to examine the house. ³⁷If, when he examines the plague, the plague in the walls of the house is found to consist of greenish^a or reddish streaks^b that appear to go deep into the wall, ³⁸the priest shall come out of the house to the entrance of the house, and close up the house for seven days. ³⁹On the seventh day the priest shall return. If he sees that the plague has spread on the walls of the house, ⁴⁰the priest shall order the stones with the plague in them to be pulled out and case (see v. 24). 33–53: Mildew or rot in the walls of a house. Since the condition resembled "tzara'at" in humans, it was believed to be a manifestation of the same deadly leakage of life. Greenish or reddish streaks . . . deep into the wall (v. 37) are deemed on sight to be "tzara'at," but the measures taken depend on the reexamination of the house after a seven-day quarantine. If the condition has spread, the affected stones and plaster are removed and replaced. (If it has not spread, perhaps another week of quarantine follows; the text is silent.) If it returns, the house must be demolished and the materials disposed of, since the condition has pervaded the entire dwelling. Otherwise the "tzara'at" is determined to have run its course and the priest pronounces the house to be clean. To eradicate the impurity that has accumulated, a ritual similar to the first stage in the purification of the affected human (vv. 3–7) is performed (vv. 49–53). 36: Once the priest determines that "tzara'at" is present, everything in the house susceptible to contamination will be declared impure. To prevent this, the house is cleared in advance and the foods and objects that have been removed remain under the presumption of purity. Rabbinic interpretation correctly recognized that this is designed to prevent undue economic hardship. 46–47: The impurity is contagious during the week of quarantine. 53: Make expiation for, Heb "kipper" is used anomalously here (see 16.1–34 n.) to refer to the decontamination of a person. No purification of the sacred sphere is prescribed, since if the "tzara'at" is deemed severe the house is destroyed before the impurity spreads to the sanctuary. 54–57: Concluding subscription to chs 13–14. Ritual, better, "instructions"; see 6.2.

cast outside the city into an unclean place. ⁴¹The house shall be scraped inside all around, and the coating^a that is scraped off shall be dumped outside the city in an unclean place. ⁴²They shall take other stones and replace those stones with them, and take other coating and plaster the house.

⁴³If the plague again breaks out in the house, after the stones have been pulled out and after the house has been scraped and replastered, ⁴⁴the priest shall come to examine: if the plague has spread in the house, it is a malignant eruption in the house; it is unclean. ⁴⁵The house shall be torn down—its stones and timber and all the coating on the house—and taken to an unclean place outside the city.

⁴⁶Whoever enters the house while it is closed up shall be unclean until evening. ⁴⁷Whoever sleeps in the house must wash his clothes, and whoever eats in the house must wash his clothes.

⁴⁸If, however, the priest comes and sees that the plague has not spread in the house after the house was replastered, the priest shall pronounce the house clean, for the plague has healed. ⁴⁹To purge the house, he shall take two birds, cedar wood, crimson stuff, and hyssop. ⁵⁰He shall slaughter the one bird over fresh water in an earthen vessel. ⁵¹He shall take the cedar wood, the hyssop, the crimson stuff, and the live bird, and dip them in the blood of the slaughtered bird and the fresh water, and sprinkle on the house seven times. ⁵²Having purged the house with the blood of the bird, the fresh water, the live bird, the cedar wood, the hyssop, and the crimson stuff, ⁵³he shall set the live bird free outside the city in the open country. Thus he shall make expiation for the house, and it shall be clean.

⁵⁴Such is the ritual for every eruptive affection—for scalls, ⁵⁵for an eruption on a cloth or a house, ⁵⁶for swellings, for rashes, or for discolorations—⁵⁷to determine when they are unclean and when they are clean.

Such is the ritual concerning eruptions.

15 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

When any man has a discharge issuing from his member,^b he is unclean. ³The uncleanness from his discharge shall mean the following—whether his member runs with the discharge or is stopped up so that there is no discharge, his uncleanness means this: ⁴Any bedding on which the one with the discharge lies shall be unclean, and every object on which he sits shall be unclean. ⁵Anyone who touches his bedding shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ⁶Whoever sits on an object on which the one with the discharge has sat shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ⁷Whoever touches the body of the one with the discharge shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ⁸If one with a discharge spits on one who is clean, the latter shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ⁹Any means for riding that one with a discharge has mounted shall be unclean; ¹⁰whoever touches anything that was under him shall be unclean until evening; and whoever carries such things shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ¹¹If one with a discharge, without having rinsed his hands in water, touches another person, that person shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening. ¹²An earthen vessel that one with a discharge touches shall be broken; and any wooden implement shall be rinsed with water.

15.1–33: Impurity from bodily discharges. Concluding the laws of purification from bodily impurities, this ch deals with defilement caused by the flow of life fluids from the genital organs: semen, menstrual fluid, and the discharge accompanying gonorrhea or urethral infection. They are treated as facts of nature: some normal, some abnormal. The only sin connected with them is failure to purify oneself from them. The ch is arranged chiasmatically. Section (a) speaks of abnormal discharge from a male (vv. 2b–15) and parallels section (e), which speaks of abnormal discharge from a female (vv. 25–30). These are severe impurities; since they reach the sacred sphere, their bearers must make purification offerings to decontaminate the sanctuary after they have been cleansed. Section (b) speaks of normal discharge from a male, i.e., the emission of semen (vv. 16–17); this parallels section (d), which speaks of normal discharge from a female; i.e., menstruation (vv. 19–24). These are lesser impurities; they require only the cleansing of the individual which, if performed promptly, arrests any possible contamination of the sacred. At the center is section (c) (v. 18), which deals with the impurity contracted during sexual intercourse by both males and females. 1: Moses and Aaron, see 11.1; 13.1. 2b–15: Abnormal discharge in a male; the symptoms are consistent with urethral infections of various types and not only gonorrhea. In biblical times it was not known that these ailments are transmitted by sexual contact. 2: His member, lit. “his flesh” (see translators’ note b), a euphemism; see v. 19.

¹³When one with a discharge becomes clean of his discharge, he shall count off seven days for his cleansing, wash his clothes, and bathe his body in fresh water; then he shall be clean. ¹⁴On the eighth day he shall take two turtledoves or two pigeons and come before the LORD at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and give them to the priest. ¹⁵The priest shall offer them, the one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering. Thus the priest shall make expiation on his behalf, for his discharge, before the LORD.

¹⁶When a man has an emission of semen, he shall bathe his whole body in water and remain unclean until evening. ¹⁷All cloth or leather on which semen falls shall be washed in water and remain unclean until evening. ¹⁸And if a man has carnal relations with a woman, they shall bathe in water and remain unclean until evening.

¹⁹When a woman has a discharge, her discharge being

4–12: The communication of impurity by direct or indirect contact. The details provided here and in vv. 19–27 are given in this ch only, to be applied by appropriate analogy in other cases of bodily impurity of similar degree; see, e.g., 12.2 and 13.46 n. Secondary impurity is less severe than that borne by the affected person himself; after washing (traditionally understood to mean immersion) and laundering it dissipates by nightfall and does not spread to the sacred sphere. It is taken for granted that contact with impure persons will occur in the normal course of everyday life. Unclean individuals are not “off limits,” but since contact with them communicates minor impurity, the necessary measures must be taken to rid oneself of it. 11: Touches another person, i.e., with his hands (which have probably come into contact with his genitals). Without having rinsed his hands in water: In rabbinic law this too was taken to mean immersion, thus equating it with the washing required in the preceding cases. 12: See 11.31–35. 13–15: The impurity is severe; thus it lasts for seven days after the condition has passed, after which the final cleansing of the man takes place. Then, when he is finally rid of his impurity and may approach the divine abode, the “hata't” is offered and the sacred area decontaminated. 14: Two turtledoves or two pigeons, see 5.7–10 n.; 12.8 n. Here, however, the two birds are prescribed for all, not just for those too poor to offer livestock; for the reason, see v. 29 n. 16–17: See also Deut. 23.10–12; 1 Sam. 20.26; here, however, the law is not restricted to involuntary nocturnal emission. The emission of semen per se, deliberate or accidental, during intercourse or not, creates a minor impurity which, after cleansing, is gone by nightfall. 17: Being minor, this impurity is not communicated to others by contact, but it is communicated to objects (and perhaps persons too) if the semen itself touches them. 18: As a function of the previous section and serving as a transition to the next. Sexual intercourse defiles both participants; their impurity, after cleansing, lasts until nightfall. 19–24: The menstruant. According to this ch, everyday nonsexual contact with the menstruating woman merely confers a minor impurity which, after cleansing, dissipates by nightfall. Even sexual intercourse with the menstruant is not forbidden; although it communicates a more severe impurity lasting seven days (v. 24), if the necessary purification takes place no sin has been committed. Thus the law in 18.19, forbidding sexual relations with a menstruant on pain of “karet” (see 7.20), directly contradicts this ch. Jewish tradition not only accepted the stricter view, forbidding intercourse with the menstruant, but blood from her body, she shall remain in her impurity seven days; whoever touches her shall be unclean until evening.²⁰ Anything that she lies on during her impurity shall be unclean; and anything that she sits on shall be unclean.²¹ Anyone who touches her bedding shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening;²² and anyone who touches any object on which she has sat shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening.²³ Be it the bedding or be it the object on which she has sat, on touching it he shall be unclean until evening.²⁴ And if a man lies with her, her impurity is communicated to him; he shall be unclean seven days, and any bedding on which he lies shall become unclean.

²⁵When a woman has had a discharge of blood for many days, not at the time of her impurity, or when she has a discharge beyond her period of impurity, she shall be unclean, as though at the time of her impurity, as long as her discharge lasts.²⁶ Any bedding on which she lies while her discharge lasts shall be for her like bedding during her impurity; and any object on which she sits shall become unclean, as it does during her impurity:²⁷ whoever touches them shall be unclean; he shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening.

²⁸When she becomes clean of her discharge, she shall count off seven days, and after that she shall be clean.²⁹ On the eighth day she shall take two turtledoves or two pigeons, and bring them to the priest at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting.³⁰ The priest shall offer the one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering; and the priest shall make expiation on her behalf, for her unclean discharge, before the LORD.

³¹You shall put the Israelites on guard against their uncleanness, lest they die through their uncleanness by defiling My Tabernacle which is among them.

³²Such is the ritual concerning him who has a discharge: concerning him who has an emission of semen and becomes unclean thereby,³³ and concerning her who is in menstrual infirmity, and concerning anyone, male or female, who has a discharge, and concerning a man who lies with an unclean woman.

16 The LORD spoke to Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron who died when they drew too close to the presence of the LORD.² The LORD said to Moses:

interpreted the latter law in such a way as to prohibit other forms of physical contact with her as well. The need to comply with 18.19 led to the survival of the laws restricting marital relations to the days between menstrual cycles, forbidding physical contact with menstruating women and requiring the monthly immersion of the wife ("tohorat hamishpaḥah") in Jewish law. The case is unique among the purification laws in the Bible, virtually all of which fell into disuse after the destruction of the Temple.

19: Blood, menstrual fluid was thought to be blood. Body, a euphemism; see v. 2. Seven days, approximating the maximum number of days each month during which most women menstruate. Rabbinic law, however, on the analogy of v. 28, determined that the seven "clean" days commence after the actual flow has ceased. 25–30: Paralleling 2b–15, above, but taking into account a second possibility as well: menstrual flow that lasts beyond its normal duration. 29: The inexpensive animals are prescribed since prolonged menstrual flow or irregular discharges are relatively frequent, so requiring livestock would impose economic hardship and the purification of the sanctuary would be neglected. By simple analogy birds are prescribed for males as well in v. 14. 31: The rationale for all of the purification laws in P; see chs 12–15 n. Lest they die through their uncleanness: The "death" is the collective destruction of Israel by defiling My Tabernacle which is among them. Failing to eradicate defilement causes it to collect in the divine abode, leading to its abandonment by the deity. See also 16.16; Num. 5.3; 19.13, 20. Rabbinic tradition reinterpreted this and similar passages to mean that the divine abode would be defiled only if the unclean person entered it; thus it severed the laws of purification from their biblical moorings.

16.1–34: Purging the Tabernacle annually. The preceding chs have established that sins and bodily into the Shrine behind the curtain, in front of the cover that is upon the ark, lest he die; for I appear in the cloud over the cover.³ Thus only shall Aaron enter the Shrine: with a bull of the herd for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering.—⁴ He shall be dressed in a sacral linen tunic, with linen breeches next to his flesh, and be girt with a linen sash, and he shall wear a linen turban. They are sacral vestments; he shall bathe his body in water and then put them on.—⁵ And from the Israelite community he shall take two he-goats for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering.

impurities contaminate the Tabernacle. Regular atonement for unintentional sin and the routine eradication of impurity eliminate as much of both types of defilement as possible. Yet, since not all unintentional wrongs are discovered and not everyone is diligent about atonement, a certain amount of defilement remains. In particular, deliberate crimes, which contaminate the inner sanctum where the divine Presence itself is said to dwell, are not expurgated by the regular atonement rituals. This ch thus provides the instructions for purging the inner sanctum along with the rest of the Tabernacle once a year, so that defilement does not accumulate. It logically follows the laws of purification (chs 12–15), as they conclude with the statement that only by preventing the spread of impurity can the Israelites ensure God's continual presence among them (15.31). The annual purification ritual, briefly alluded to in Exod. 30.10, is to be performed on the tenth day of the seventh month (v. 29). Elsewhere (23.27, 28; 25.9) this day is referred to as "yom hakippurim"—often translated as "Day of Atonement," with the verb "kipper," "atone," being used in the sense of "decontaminate [the sacred precincts] of sin or defilement" (see 1.4; 4.1–5.26 n.). This day is found only in the Priestly calendar of sacred times (23.26–32; see also Num. 29.7–11). Sanctuary purification rites are known in the ancient Near East outside of Israel. The biblical Day of Atonement, while unique in its conceptual and ritual complexity and in its non-demonic view of defilement, shares with them the specific ritual aim of decontaminating the sanctuary. It also, however, brings about a sort of purification of the Israelite people, since the thorough eradication and disposal of their sins and impurities serves as a personal and communal catharsis. Further, the people have a role in the process: vv. 29–34a prescribe that they must observe a fast and a cessation of labor. The Israelites emerge from this day secure in the knowledge that the equilibrium in their relationship with God has been restored and "all is forgiven." This too is expressed by the text: "For on this day atonement shall be made for you to cleanse you of all your sins; you shall be clean before the LORD" (v. 30). Long after the original notion that God threatened to abandon His people if His abode became impure had receded, the Day of Atonement, as an annual occasion for repentance and forgiveness, continued to have crucial importance. Even since the destruction of the Temple, when fasting, prayer, and penitence are all that survive of the day's ritual, it has remained a central feature of the liturgical year in Jewish tradition. 1: After the death of the two sons of Aaron, related in 10.1–2. Some have assumed a connection between the offense of Aaron's sons and the annual purgation, suggesting either that the priest is cautioned not to repeat their actions or that the purgation was necessitated by their deaths or their dire sins. But the narrator probably means that this ch was actually imparted to Moses immediately after Revelation Day, while chs 11–15, conveyed to Moses later in the month, have been placed here so that the reader may correctly grasp what is meant by "the uncleanness . . . of the Israelites" in v. 16 and understand why the Tabernacle needs to be purged (see 16.1–34 n.). 2: At will, lit. "at any time." Only once a year may Aaron or his successor enter the inner sanctum. The Shrine behind the curtain, in front of the cover that is upon the ark, the inner sanctum, known as the "holy of holies" and here called "haqodesh," "the holy place." Lest he die; for I appear in the cloud over the cover: How Aaron is to avoid death when purging the inner sanctum is explained in vv. 12–13. 3–22: The thorough purification of the Tabernacle, focusing on the inner sanctum. 4: Since the tasks to be performed on Purification Day are for purgation, not for worship, the priest is to remove the vestments worn for the daily service and to don simple linen garments, which, when soiled by the sprinkling of blood, are easily laundered. 5–22: The ritual includes the following components: (a) a slaughtered bull, to serve as a purification offering on behalf of the high priest and his household (cf. 4.3–12); (b) a slaughtered goat to serve as a purification offering on behalf of the Israelite people; (c) a live goat, to carry away the transgressions of the Israelites to the wilderness; (d) two burnt offerings, one on Aaron's own behalf and the other on behalf of the people. 7–10: The use of the two goats is similar to that of the two birds in 14.4–7, 49–53. The lottery deter-

at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting;⁸ and he shall place lots upon the two goats, one marked for the LORD and the other marked for Azazel.⁹ Aaron shall bring forward the goat designated by lot for the LORD, which he is to offer as a sin offering;¹⁰ while the goat designated by lot for Azazel shall be left standing alive before the LORD, to make expiation with it and to send it off to the wilderness for Azazel.

When he has made expiation for himself and his household, and for the whole congregation of Israel,¹⁸ he shall go out to the altar that is before the LORD and purge it: he shall take some of the blood of the bull and of the goat and apply it to each of the horns of the altar;¹⁹ and the rest of the blood he shall sprinkle on it with his finger seven times at random how each goat is to be used. 8: Azazel: The Rabbis cleverly divided this name into two words "ez 'azel," "the goat that goes away," from which the traditional "scapegoat" is derived. It literally means "fierce god" and as intimidated by the medieval exegete Abraham Ibn Ezra is evidently the name of a demon or deity believed to inhabit the wilderness. Thus the sins of the people are symbolically cast into the realm beyond civilization, to become the property of a being who is the antithesis of the God of Israel. Though Azazel accepts the goat bearing Israel's sins as a sacrifice to him, this is no disloyalty to God since He Himself commands it, as Nahmanides (Ramban) says: It is as though a king ordered "Give a portion [of this feast] to my servant so-and-so." 11–14: Aaron's first entry into the inner sanctum, to expiate for his own transgressions and impurities. 13: The cover that is over [the

Ark of] the Pact, the platform upon which the two winged cherubs stand, serving as a throne for the divine Presence which hovers above it (Exod. 25.10–22). The incense is placed on the coals to create a cloud of smoke, preventing Aaron from viewing the deity. The blood is sprinkled in front of the throne and behind it, purging the area most vulnerable to contamination. 15–16a: Aaron's second entry into the inner sanctum, to expiate for the transgressions and impurities of the people. The blood of the goat is sprinkled in the same way as that of the bull.

16: Of the uncleanness: A better translation is "of the impurities of the Israelites and, among all their sins, of their deliberate transgressions"; see v. 22 n. 16b: The cleansing of the inner sanctum is followed by the purification of the outer sanctum. Probably the procedure in 4.6–7a and 4.17–18a is intended, performed first with the blood of the bull and then with that of the goat. The Tent . . . abides, better, "the Tent of Meeting of the One who abides." 17: The first half of the v. confirms that in the outer sanctum too Aaron is to be alone (translate "the holy place" instead of the Shrine); the second half sums up the cleansing of the Tabernacle. 18–19a: The next step: purging the altar. The altar that is before the LORD: Rabbinic interpretation took this to mean the incense altar located in the inner sanctum. The words he shall go out would thus refer to Aaron's exiting the inner sanctum. But the v. would then be out of place, and the summary vv. 20 and 33 distinguish between the inner sanctum, the outer sanctum, and the altar. It is preferable to explain he shall go out as meaning "he shall exit the Tent of Meeting." The altar is the sacrificial altar that stood in the courtyard, the purification of the incense altar having been accomplished already (see v. 16b). 19: And consecrate it: The translation reflects the rabbinic midrash, according to which the altar was not only purged but reconsecrated for the coming year, but the word "vekidesho" stands times. Thus he shall cleanse it of the uncleanness of the Israelites and consecrate it.

²⁰When he has finished purging the Shrine, the Tent of Meeting, and the altar, the live goat shall be brought forward. ²¹Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat and confess over it all the iniquities and transgressions of the Israelites, whatever their sins, putting them on the head of the goat; and it shall be sent off to the wilderness through a designated^a man. ²²Thus the goat shall carry on it all their iniquities to an inaccessible region; and the goat shall be set free in the wilderness.

²³And Aaron shall go into the Tent of Meeting, take off the linen vestments that he put on when he entered the Shrine, and leave them there. ²⁴He shall bathe his body in water in the holy precinct and put on his vestments; then he shall come out and offer his burnt offering and the burnt offering of the people, making expiation for himself and for the people. ²⁵The fat of the sin offering he shall turn into smoke on the altar.

²⁷The bull of sin offering and the goat of sin offering whose blood was brought in to purge the Shrine shall be taken outside the camp; and their hides, flesh, and dung shall be consumed in fire. ²⁸He who burned them shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water; after that he may re-enter the camp.

²⁹And this shall be to you a law for all time: In the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, you shall practice self-denial; and you shall do no manner of work, neither the citizen nor the alien who resides among you. ³⁰For on this day atonement shall be made for you to cleanse you of all your sins; you shall be clean before the before of the uncleanness of the Israelites and means "and purge it." 20–22: Having removed the impure material from the inner and outer sanctums, Aaron now transfers it to the live goat for dispatch to the wilderness. The transfer is accomplished by placing both hands on the goat's head and making verbal declaration of the people's sins. Rabbinic law, reinterpreting the term "vekipper," "he shall make expiation" in vv. 6 and 11, added two more confessions to the Day of Atonement ritual. 21: Lay both his hands: Elsewhere single-hand leaning (e.g., 1.4) reflects designation of an animal; the gesture here is one of transfer to the animal. 22: All their iniquities, rather, "all the intentional sins and deliberate transgressions of the Israelites among all their sins." The impurities (see v. 16) have disappeared, eradicated by the blood of the "hata't" offerings. Deliberate sins, however, are indestructible; they can only be sent away, in the hope that they may never return. The idea is that intentional acts of wrongdoing, once committed, can never really be undone. 23–28: The remaining offerings, the cleansing of Aaron, the removal of the contaminated garments, the disposal of the flesh, and the purification of those who have become secondarily defiled as a result of their roles in the ritual. 29–34a: The rituals are to be performed on a specific date, annually, in perpetuity, by Aaron's successors in the high priesthood, accompanied by a community-wide fast and cessation of labor, observed by citizen and alien alike (see 23.26–32). 29: Practice self-denial, lit. "deprive your throats," i.e., fast (see Isa. 58.3, 5). The translation reflects the halakhic midrash, according to which "nefesh" is used in the sense of "self"; based on this the Rabbis decreed additional forms of self-affliction besides the abstinence from food and drink indicated explicitly by the text. Citizen, Heb "ezrah," "native," referring to the Israelite born in the land of Israel of bona fide Israelite ancestry. The alien who resides among you: The "ger," or resident alien, is a person of non-Israelite ancestry residing more or less permanently in the land of Israel. He is not considered a descendant of the Canaanite peoples, since they are believed to have been evacuated (see 18.24–30). Rabbinic tradition understands the "ger" as a proselyte or convert, but this is anachronistic; neither religious conversion nor gradual assimilation is contemplated anywhere in P. Laws pertaining to the "ger" appear throughout the remaining chs of Leviticus and elsewhere in the Priestly law; see, e.g., 17.8, 10, 12, 15; 18.26; 19.33–36; 24.16 n.; 25.47–54 n. The "ger" is not required to worship Israel's God but may do so voluntarily; thus the "ger" is not obligated to observe the performative commands, but must comply with all prohibitions, and must observe the laws of fairness and justice (see 24.17–22). The Israelite must refrain from op-

Chs 17–26. Scholars agree that chs 17–26, along with some other passages in Leviticus and elsewhere in P, belong to a literary stratum distinct from the remainder of the Priestly work. Although this section is not structurally differentiated from the rest, and does echo and supplement the ritual and sacral regulations in P in many ways, on substantive and stylistic grounds it appears to have been composed by Priestly authors other than those responsible for the remainder of P. Its most characteristic feature is a concern for holiness. Throughout Priestly thought, holiness is conceived of as an effervescence of the Presence of the LORD. It infuses everything with which it comes into contact (see 6.11; 8.10–13), transforming it into the designated “personal” property of the deity. In these chs we hear for the first time that holiness is not confined to the realm of the Tabernacle and priesthood; rather, the Israelite people as a whole can and must attain holiness (chs 19–20). This section also contains legislation concerning the holiness of the priests and of sacred offerings (chs 21–22), the annual festivals, here called holy times (ch 23), the holiness of the name of God (ch 24), and the holiness of the fiftieth year (ch 25). Implied also is the holiness of the land of Israel (chs 18 and 26). Holiness as the all-encompassing theme of these chs has given them their name, the Holiness Legislation (or Holiness Code or Collection), or H. While earlier critics believed H to be more ancient than P, many scholars now think that H was added to, and is therefore probably later than, the kernel of the Priestly document. If so, the addition of the Holiness Collection to the preexisting Priestly document marks an important development in Priestly tradition and thought. The earlier Priestly work reflects the idea that the commandments given by God to the Israelites at Sinai were concerned solely with worship and the maintenance of the purity of the divine abode; all else was a matter of universal morality but not the stuff of divine legislation for Israel. The H chs constitute a transformation; they claim that the laws given to Israel at Sinai included civil and criminal legislation and pertained to every sphere of interpersonal relationships and social behavior as well as ritual activity. H thereby makes explicit through specific commands what was only implicit in the earlier stratum of P, namely, that Israel’s compliance with God’s expectations in these areas impinges on the sacred no less than the maintenance of the institutions of worship. Among the unique characteristics of H are its distinct rationale for the blood prohibition (see 17.10–12), its peculiar understanding of sacrificial atonement (17.11), its strict prohibition of sexual relations with the menstruating woman (18.19), the new meaning it instills into the concept of impurity (18.24–30), its incorporation of popular ritual into the observance of the holy days (23.1–44), its detailed exploration of the full ramifications of God’s lordship over His people and land (25.1–55), and its explicit historicization of the Priestly promise of divine indwelling and threat of divine abandonment (26.3–45).

17.1–16: Slaughter and blood.

Three laws are communicated to Moses: the prohibition of common, or “profane,” slaughter of domestic livestock (vv. 3–7), the prohibition of sacrifice outside of the Tabernacle (vv. 8–9), and the prohibition of “eating” any blood (vv. 10–12). The third law draws in its wake two corollaries: the requirement to drain the blood of wild animals killed for food (vv. 13–14), and the need to dispose of the impurity one contracts from eating carrion (vv. 15–16). All five sections are thus concerned with proper disposal of the blood of slain animals. They derive from P’s view of the commands given to Noah and his descendants in Gen. 9.1–7 (see 11.1–47 n.), and they supplement the laws of sacrifice in chs 1–7, the dietary laws given in ch 11, and the laws of purification given in chs 12–15.

2: To Aaron and his sons and to all the Israelite people: As the laws commanded here require specific activity on the part of the priests, Aaron and his sons are singled out, but the laws in the ch apply to the people as a whole. 3–4: Ox or sheep or goat: Since animals from the herd camp, or does so outside the camp,⁴ and does not bring it to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting to present it as an offering to the LORD, before the LORD's Tabernacle, blood-guilt shall be imputed to that man: he has shed blood; that man shall be cut off from among his people.⁵ This is in order that the Israelites may bring the sacrifices which they have been making in the open—that they may bring them before the LORD, to the priest, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and offer them as sacrifices of well-being to the LORD;⁶ that the priest may dash the blood against the altar of the LORD at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and turn the fat into smoke as a pleasing odor to the LORD;⁷ and that they may offer their sacrifices no more to the goat-demons after whom they stray. This shall be to them a law for all time, throughout the ages.

⁸ Say to them further: If anyone of the house of Israel or of the strangers who reside among them offers a burnt offering or a sacrifice,⁹ and does not bring it to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting to offer it to the LORD, that person shall be cut off from his people.

¹⁰ And if anyone of the house of Israel or of the strangers who reside among them partakes of any blood, I will set My face against the person who partakes of the blood, and I will cut him off from among his kin.¹¹ For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have assigned it to you for making expiation for your lives upon the altar; it is the blood, as life, that effects expiation.¹² Therefore I say and flock are fit for the altar, they are considered as belonging to God. Thus, according to this law, the Israelites may not simply slaughter domestic livestock for food; they are required to offer them as a sacrifice of well-being ("shelamim"; see 3.1–17 and 7.11–34), after which they may partake of the offerers' share of the flesh. 4: Bloodguilt . . . he has shed blood: In P's view, until the time of the flood it was a capital crime to shed the blood of any animal; thereafter it was permissible as long as the blood was not ingested (Gen. 9.3–4). Now that the Tabernacle has been erected, Israelites may slay sheep and cattle for food only as well-being offerings; if they fail to present the animal as an offering, it is as if they had slain the animal in the antediluvian period when such an act was considered murder. Shall be cut off, see

7.20–21. 5–7: These three vv. are spoken only for Moses' ears, and they provide the actual rationale for the prohibition. 5: The sacrifices . . . in the open: This rests on the Priestly belief that the worship of the LORD began with the establishment of the Israelite cult at Sinai and until then the LORD was never worshipped. (The stories of sacrifices in Genesis and the first part of Exodus—such as those offered by Cain and Abel, by Noah after the flood and by the patriarchs—all belong to the non-Priestly material.) Heretofore, any slaughter of domestic livestock has been meaningless, "in the open"—in the Rabbis' phrase, "profane" or common slaughter. 7: That they may offer their sacrifices no more to the goat-demons: Conceptually, however, the nonsacrificial slaughter of domestic livestock actually is a sacrifice—not to God but to the demons thought to inhabit the open fields and desolate regions. Now that the Tabernacle cult is established, any further activity of this sort is an unpardonable sin. A law for all time, throughout the ages: The law is thus irreconcilable with that in Deut. 12.15, 20–27, according to which, after the Temple is built, it will become permissible to slaughter and eat livestock anywhere without making an offering. Though the law in H seems oppressive, it may not be entirely utopian. It imposes no restriction on the consumption of permitted nondomestic livestock (see 11.1–8), fowl, fish, or flying creatures (11.9–23). It is also conceivable that blemished sheep and cattle, not fit for the altar (22.21–24), might be slaughtered for food. The law in Deuteronomy ultimately became normative in Judaism. 8–9: Having established that all domestic livestock may be consumed only after having been presented as "shelamim" offerings, the law commands that all offerings must be made at the Tabernacle; anyone presenting a sacrifice elsewhere is threatened with the "karet" penalty (see 7.20–21). The Priestly legislator clearly has in mind a single legitimate sanctuary, agreeing with Deut. ch 12 in its demand that all sacrificial worship be centralized in one location, but disagreeing on whether nonsacrificial slaughter may be practiced after the centralization has been accomplished. 8: The strangers who reside among them, Heb "ger" ("resident alien"); see 16.29. 10–12: The blood prohibition. See Gen. 9.4; Lev. 3.17; 7.26–27. Deuteronomy also records this prohibition (Deut. 12.16, 23–24; 15.23). H offers its peculiar rationale for this law (see vv. 11–12 n.). 10: Partakes of any blood, lit. "eats" any blood. The act referred to is that of eating meat without first draining the blood. I will set My face, I will give it My personal, undivided and immediate attention (26.17). For this phrase, along with the active form of the threat of "karet" (see 7.20–21), both characteristic of H, see 20.3, 5, 6; cf. 23.30. 11–12: H's to the Israelite people: No person among you shall partake of blood, nor shall the stranger who resides among you partake of blood.

¹³And if any Israelite or any stranger who resides among them hunts down an animal or a bird that may be eaten, he shall pour out its blood and cover it with earth.

¹⁴For the life of all flesh—its blood is its life. Therefore I say to the Israelite people: You shall not partake of the blood of any flesh, for the life of all flesh is its blood. Anyone who partakes of it shall be cut off.

¹⁵Any person, whether citizen or stranger, who eats what has died or has been torn by beasts shall wash his clothes, bathe in water, and remain unclean until evening; then he shall be clean. ¹⁶But if he does not wash [his clothes] and bathe his body, he shall bear his guilt.

18 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

I the LORD am your God. ³You shall not copy the prac-unique rationale for the blood prohibition (intended like vv. 5–7 for Moses' ears alone) differs from that implied in 3.17 and 7.26–27, where blood, like suet, is God's food. It differs too from that given in Deut. 12.16, 23–24, where ingesting the animal's meat along with its "life" is inherently improper. Here, since the blood of sacrificial offerings has been assigned to the altar as ransom (see below), the blood of all flesh is strictly forbidden. 11: The life of the flesh is in the blood: Since loss of blood brings about swift death, it would be natural to assume that the life-force (Heb "nefesh," lit. "gullet" but often figuratively "life-force") is contained in the blood. For making expiation for your lives, better, "to serve as ransom for your lives"; see 1.4 n. This too is unique to H; sacrificial atonement is not the decontamination of the sacred precincts but rather a symbolic payment in exchange for one's life which would otherwise be forfeit. 13–14: In order to prevent the ingestion of the blood of nondomestic quadrupeds (which may be eaten if they conform to the stipulations of 11.3) and fowl (those not listed in 11.13–19), which would presumably be hunted, the Israelite is commanded to drain out the blood on the ground. Cover it with earth: Jewish tradition viewed this as a command in its own right; some interpreters saw it as a symbolic way of returning the "life" of the animal, i.e., its blood, to God. But the explicit reason for the draining and covering of the blood is to prevent its being eaten. 15–16: As mentioned in 7.24, permitted animals that have not been slaughtered as sacrifice but rather have died of themselves ("nevelah") or were killed by beasts ("terefah") may be eaten, although, as stated in 11.40, impurity results. This law is repeated here because it is an exception to the blood prohibition. When the blood of a permitted animal has cooled and coagulated within it, it no longer contains the animal's "nefesh" (see v. 11) and may be eaten. In opposition, the non-Priestly law collections prohibit the eating of "nevelah" (Deut. 14.21) and "terefah" (Exod. 22.30). The opposing views share the idea that refraining from "nevelah" and "terefah" is a mark of sanctity. Since according to the non-Priestly sources all Israelites are on an equal plane of sanctity, all must avoid "nevelah" and

"terefah." In P, only priests are so commanded (22.8), while lay Israelites are not. This opinion is held by Ezekiel as well (Ezek. 44.31). In the Priestly view, there are different grades of holiness and only the priests, who belong to the innermost sphere of sanctity, must observe the restriction. Rabbinic law accepts the stricter view, and even uses the term "terefah" as a general designation for all prohibited ("nonkosher") food. 15: Citizen or stranger, see 16.29.

18.1–30: The Abominations of the Canaanites. A list of prohibited sexual unions (vv. 6–23), including incestuous relationships (vv. 6–18), and the prohibition of sacrificing children to Molech (v. 21). These laws, rather than merely being proclaimed, are presented as part of a speech warning the Israelites not to practice the "abominations" characteristic of the peoples of Egypt and Canaan lest they suffer their dire fate. H thus conveys the idea that refraining from forbidden sexual practices and child sacrifice, no less than the scrupulous maintenance of the purity of the divine abode as emphasized by the earlier part of P, is the key to Israel's national survival in its land. This ch is read in the synagogue at the afternoon service on the Day of Atonement, a practice for which various interpretations have been suggested. 2–5: The introductory vv. lay the groundwork for what will follow. To survive, Israel must shun the practices of Egypt and Canaan and adhere only to God's commands. 2: I the LORD am your God, better, "I am the LORD your God" (or "I am YHWH your God"). This formula (with variations) is one of the hallmarks of H's style; here it sets up the contrast between "My rules/laws" and those of Egypt and Canaan. 3: The practices of the land of Egypt . . . or of the land of Canaan: The Egyptians and Canaanites are characterized in biblical tradition, particularly P, by rampant sexual licentiousness and perversion. This, however, does not emerge from Canaanite and Egyptian litertices of the land of Egypt where you dwelt, or of the land of Canaan to which I am taking you; nor shall you follow their laws. ⁴My rules alone shall you observe, and faithfully follow My laws: I the LORD am your God.

⁵You shall keep My laws and My rules, by the pursuit of which man shall live: I am the LORD.

⁶None of you shall come near anyone of his own flesh to uncover nakedness: I am the LORD.

⁷^aYour father's nakedness, that is, the nakedness of your mother, you shall not uncover; she is your mother—you shall not uncover her nakedness.

⁸Do not uncover the nakedness of your father's wife;^a it is the nakedness of your father.

ature, and it is now thought that the biblical writers used this accusation as a means of stigmatizing Israel's cultural rivals (in the guise of long-extinct enemies) by attributing to them the most heinous crimes. Thus they provided moral justification for the displacement of the Canaanites, while at the same time polemicizing against such practices in Israelite society itself. Nor shall you follow their laws: The midrash took these words as an indication that the Egyptians and the Canaanites actually had laws requiring these sexual practices (Sifre Ahare Mot Perek 18 parshah 8 [8]). 5: By the pursuit of which man shall live, better, "which, if a person follows, he/she will live," most simply understood as the converse of vv. 24–30, which detail how violation of these laws leads to collective death and to "karet" for the individual. Here too rabbinic law introduced a legislative import into an originally nonlegislative phrase, interpreting that one must "live by them [but do not die by them]," and ruling that all the laws of the Torah (except idolatry, incest, and bloodshed) are set aside if their observance will endanger the preservation of human life (b. Sanh. 74a). 6–23: My laws and My rules mentioned in v. 5 are now spelled out. 6: Anyone of his own flesh, the extended family; see 25.49; cf. 21.2. Uncover nakedness, "uncover the sexual organ." This term is used throughout vv. 6–19 (see also 20.11, etc.) to denote sexual intercourse. It focuses on the shamelessness of engaging in sexual relations with a member of one's family in flagrant disregard for the repulsion that viewing the nakedness of a close relative was thought to arouse. In postbiblical terminology, the phrase "uncover nakedness," ("gilui 'arayot") losing its literal meaning, became the standard term for incest, and the word "nakedness" became a euphemism for a forbidden sexual partner or act. 7–18: The list of prohibited sexual unions extends over four generations, with the male addressed in the text placed in the second. All female members of his immediate family who might be the object of his sexual desire during his adulthood are named. (a) Directly related women: in the generation preceding, his mother (v. 7) and step-mother (v. 8); in his own generation, his sister (v. 9); in the vertical line, his granddaughter (v. 10). (There is no satisfactory explanation for the omission of the daughter.) Supplementing the immediate relatives is the step-sister, pronounced here to be of the same degree as a true sister (v. 11). (b) Indirectly related women: in the generation preceding, his true aunt (vv. 12–13) and his aunt by marriage, pronounced here to be of the same degree (v. 14); in the next generation, his daughter-in-law (v. 15); in his own generation, his brother's wife. (c) Women related to each other: mother and daughter, grandmother and granddaughter (v. 17); sisters (v. 18). It cannot be determined whether analogous prohibitions, such as one's mother's brother's wife and one's niece, are implied or not. 7: Your father's nakedness, that is, the nakedness of your mother: A woman's sexual organs are permitted only to her husband; by engaging in intercourse with the wife of one's close relation one commits a crime against the male relation as well. 9: Your father's daughter or your mother's, referring specifically to the half-sister. The full sister may be supplied by inference since she is in both categories; see v. 14. Whether born into the household or outside, better: whether belonging (now) to the household of the parent to which you (now) belong or to another household. 10: For their nakedness is yours, obscure. 11: She is your sister: Similarly "she is your aunt" (v. 14), meant figuratively; the step-sister and uncle's wife are declared to be on the same level as blood-relations. 14: Your aunt: The legislator would thus view Amram's marriage to his aunt (Exod. 6.20) as an improper act. Similarly Abraham's marriage to his half-sister (Gen. 20.12), which violates v. 9, and Jacob's marriage to Rachel and Leah (Gen. 29.16–28), which violates v. 18, but these marriages are recounted only in the non-Priestly sources. 16: Your brother's wife: In direct opposition to the levirate law in Deut. 25.5–9. Rabbinic law resolved the conflict by viewing the latter as an exception: Intercourse with one's sister-in-law is prohibited in every case except that described in Deuteronomy. The midrash even suggests that the two laws were spoken in the same utterance, so that the general rule and the exception would become known at one and the same time (Mek. de R. Yishmael, Yitro, ba-Hodesh 7 [Horowitz-Rabin, p. 229]; Sifre Ki Tetze 223 [Finkelstein, p. 266]). 17: Nor shall you marry, Heb "tikkaḥ," "take" (so v. 18) does not always refer to marriage (see 20.17, 21), and may refer to sexual contact in general. Since the rhetorical aim of the ch is to enumerate the abhorrent sexual practices of the Canaanites, perhaps illicit unions too are contemplated. The halakhic tradition understood the entire series as a table of prohibited marriages, and legal systems throughout the Jewish and Christian worlds have based the impediments to lawful marriage on it. 18: A woman as a rival to her sister, see 1 Sam. 1.6. See v. 14 n. above. In the other's lifetime: After the death of one sister, however, it might be considered meritorious to marry the other. 19–23: Additional sexual prohibitions, arranged as follows: (a) intercourse with women, first, one's own wife, when menstruating

(v. 19), second, another's wife (v. 20); (b) nonprocreative intercourse, first, with a male (v. 22), second, with an animal (v. 23a); (c) intercourse in which no human seed is emitted, i.e., between a woman and a beast (v. 23b).

19: See 15.19–24 n. This stricter law is probably an indication of H's espousal of popular tradition, viewing the menstruating woman as taboo, overriding P's concern with purely formal, technical definitions according to which menstruation is no different from any other bodily impurity. 20: The adultery prohibition is included here since it too was thought to be characteristic of the Canaanites. Defile yourself: Note the wider sense of "defile" in H; in the strict, Priestly sense all sexual intercourse is defiling (see 15.18).

21: The inclusion in this ch of the prohibition of Molech sacrifice (see 20.2–5 n.) is unexpected. Apparently H shares the view of Deut. 12.31; 18.9–12 that child sacrifice was among the abominable practices for which the Canaanites were expelled from their land, so he adds it to the list of sexual offenses which he believes are equally responsible. Other biblical texts confirm that it was in fact practiced in Israel at certain times during the monarchy (see 2 Kings 16.3; 17.17; 21.6; 23.10; Isa. 30.33; 57.9; Jer. 7.31; 19.5; 32.35; Ezek. 16.21; 23.37; Ps. 106.37–38), and this accounts for the Torah sources' having attributed it to the Canaanites: to serve as a warning for Israel. 22: Biblical and ancient Near Eastern culture was not familiar with homosexuality in the sense of a defined sexual orientation or lifestyle (according to the biblical evidence David and Jonathan had no sexual relationship). It acknowledges only the occasional act of male anal intercourse, usually as an act of force associated with humiliation, revenge, or subjection (for the biblical examples see Gen. 19.4–5; Judg. 19.22). Of the biblical legal collections only H mentions it (here and in 20.13), declaring it to be an abominable act and a capital offense. It seems that ²³Do not have carnal relations with any beast and defile yourself thereby; and let no woman lend herself to a beast to mate with it; it is perversion.

²⁴Do not defile yourselves in any of those ways, for it is by such that the nations that I am casting out before you defiled themselves. ²⁵Thus the land became defiled; and I called it to account for its iniquity, and the land spewed out its inhabitants. ²⁶But you must keep My laws and My rules, and you must not do any of those abhorrent things, neither the citizen nor the stranger who resides among you; ²⁷for all those abhorrent things were done by the people who were in the land before you, and the land became defiled. ²⁸So let not the land spew you out for defiling it, as it spewed out the nation that came before you. ²⁹All who do any of those abhorrent things—such persons shall be cut off from their people. ³⁰You shall keep My charge not to engage in any of the abhorrent practices that were carried on before you, and you shall not defile yourselves through them: I the LORD am your God.

H views all sexual acts that are not typically procreative as aberrant. 24–30: The concluding exhortation, extrapolating from abhorrence in v. 22 and from the defilement mentioned in vv. 19 and 20, speaks of defilement as a destructive force emanating from all of the acts mentioned. These acts defile those who commit them, and this in turn defiles the land of Canaan which then spits out its inhabitants. This is the automatic reaction of the land of Canaan to abominations, no matter who commits them, Canaanites or Israelites. The intent of the exhortation is to say that what was, will be, unless the listeners themselves prevent it. The nations that I am casting out before you: The Egyptians, mentioned in v. 3, have disappeared from view; the focus is entirely on the Canaanites. See also 20.23. 25: Spewed out, lit. “vomited”; not actions performed upon the land by attackers from outside but rather performed by the land upon its population. As recognized by the midrash, “the land of Israel is not like the rest of the earth in that it does not sustain those who commit [sexual] offenses” (Sifre to v. 28 [Kod. 11:14], mistakenly placed in the Sifra at 20.22 because of similarity to the v. there). The land is so sensitive to the criminal behavior of its inhabitants that when abominable acts are performed, “defiling” the land, it ceases to yield its bounty and its population is forced to emigrate. Of course, as the previous v. confirms, God has imbued the land of Israel with its delicate constitution. This is unique to H; elsewhere in the Torah it is presumed that the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan were either destroyed or expelled by the conquering Israelites. 26: Neither the citizen nor the stranger who resides among you, see 16.29. 28: Spewed out the nation that came before you: Unique also is the idea that the evacuation of Canaan has already occurred. 29: Not only is the national fate sealed by failing to avoid the abominations, each perpetrator is punished with “karet” (see 7.20, 21).

19.1–37: Holiness of individuals. Commands pertaining to virtually every area of Israelite life; there is no such thing as a command pertaining merely to relations between human beings (“ben ’adam lahavero”); every commanded or prohibited action affects the sacred realm and is in the category of laws between God and human beings (“ben ’adam lamakom”). The ch expresses this by presenting an admixture of laws from every sphere—from worship to fairness in commerce, from legal proceedings to reverence for the Temple, from idolatry and the avoidance of pagan practices to family relations, from the use of the name of God in oaths to support for the needy, from the sanctity of first fruits to theft and fraud—all on equal footing; punctuating the separate paragraphs with the repeated refrain I am the LORD or I the LORD am your God, which is approximately equivalent to “because I, the LORD, say so.” The opening and closing vv. (2 and 37) provide the key to meaning: You shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy (v. 2). You shall faithfully observe all My laws and all My rules: I am the LORD (v. 37). These vv. resemble two that occur alongside each other in the next ch, 20.7–8. Only through faithful observance of God’s commands can the Israelite fulfill the sacred charge of being holy. This is repeated in Num. 15.39–40, recited every morning and evening as part of the Shema prayer, where the function of the fringe on the tallit is that one may “look at it and recall all the commandments of the LORD and observe them. . . . Thus you shall be reminded to observe all My commandments and be holy to your God.” Through this miscellany of laws H expresses the idea that through the performance of all commanded deeds and the avoidance of all prohibited actions, all Israelites are able to absorb the effusion of the divine Presence in their midst (see 6.11) and be holy. A number of rabbinic and modern interpreters, noting that the prohibitions of idolatry (v. 4), theft and falsehood (v. 11), and false witness (v. 12), along with the command to keep the Sabbath and to revere one’s mother and father (v. 3), are included in this collection, have suggested that this ch is the Priestly version of the Decalogue (see Exod. ch 20; Deut. ch 5). This is unlikely. The Priestly literature

19 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the whole Israelite community and say to them:

You shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy.

³You shall each revere his mother and his father, and keep My sabbaths: I the LORD am your God.

⁴Do not turn to idols or make molten gods for yourselves: I the LORD am your God.

⁵When you sacrifice an offering of well-being to the LORD, sacrifice it so that it may be accepted on your behalf. ⁶It shall be eaten on the day you sacrifice it, or on the day following; but what is left by the third day must be consumed in fire. ⁷If it should be eaten on the third day, it is an offensive thing, it will not be acceptable. ⁸And he who eats of it shall bear his guilt, for he has profaned what is sacred to the LORD; that person shall be cut off from his kin.

⁹When you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap all the way to the edges of your field, or gather the gleanings of your harvest. ¹⁰You shall not pick your vineyard bare, or gather the fallen fruit of your vineyard; you shall leave them for the poor and the stranger: I the LORD am your God.

¹¹You shall not steal; you shall not deal deceitfully or falsely with one another. ¹²You shall not swear falsely by My name, profaning the name of your God: I am the LORD.

¹³You shall not defraud your fellow. You shall not commit robbery. The wages of a laborer shall not remain with you until morning.

is completely unfamiliar with the Decalogue tradition; there is no logical explanation for the missing commands; and the six scattered parallels are outweighed by the remainder of ch 19, which does not resemble the Decalogue at all. 2: You shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy: This is the caption; what follows is its elaboration. Later interpreters often took it as a general command to emulate divine attributes such as compassion and forgiveness (“imitatio dei”). But “holy” in the Bible does not refer to superior moral qualities. God’s holiness is His essential “otherness,” His being separate from all that is not divine; humans are not called upon to be holy in this sense (the text does not say “as

I am holy”). Holiness in humans, as in time, space, objects, and speech, is the state of belonging to the deity, being designated God’s “personal” property. In the non-Priestly tradition Israel is holy simply by virtue of having been chosen (see Exod. 19.5–6; Deut. 7.6; 14.2, 21). In Priestly thought, holiness is the desired result of an effusion of God’s immanent Presence (see Exod. 29.43), which, according to H, Israel must actively absorb by performing the commandments. 3: The legislative part of the ch leads with a command pertaining to the ethical realm, reverence for parents, alongside one obviously belonging to the sacred sphere, the Sabbath, together with the formulaic I the

LORD am your God. Revere: The Rabbis correctly sensed that this differs from “honor” in Exod. 20.12 and Deut. 5.16; the Decalogue refers to the do’s; this v. refers to the don’ts. And keep My sabbaths, see 23.3. 5–8: See 7.11–21. This refers to the well-being offerings of the votive and freewill types (see 7.16–18; 22.21–23). The third type of well-being offering, that of thanksgiving (see 7.12–15) is mentioned in 22.29–30, marking the close of this section of H (chs 19–22). 7: It is an offensive thing, see 7.18. It will not be acceptable, correctly, “it will not be accepted.” See 1.3; 7.18 n.; 22.17–30. 8: He has profaned what is sacred to the LORD: This theme connects the passage with the holiness motif. Cut off from his kin, see 7.20, 21. 9–10: Four prohibitions, two in the field and two in the vineyard. The first in each pair is observed while reaping, the second during ingathering. All lead up to you shall leave them for the poor and the stranger. The command to care for the needy is fulfilled by inaction. I the LORD am your God transforms social legislation into a sacred act. Cf. Deut. 24.19–21. The stranger, see 16.29. 11–18: Four two-v. paragraphs, each one ending with I am the LORD, indicating that decency and honesty, ostensibly pertaining to interpersonal affairs, are in fact divine concerns. All four deal with matters of conscience: Since all of the crimes are to some degree committed in secret, their perpetrators imagine that they will go undetected. The progression is from the crimes most difficult to conceal to those which can never be proven and whose victims have no remedy whatsoever, leaving detection and punishment in the hands of God alone. 11–12: Falseness in commerce and its ramifications; see 5.20–26. Theft naturally leads to deceit, denial, and cover-up; these are likely to be aggravated by false oath, thus profaning the sacred name of God, so God becomes a party to what began as a purely civil matter. 13–14: Taking unfair advantage. The first v. prohibits fraud, extortion, and withholding wages from the defenseless laborer; the second, speaking metaphorically and not of those literally deaf or blind, extends the principle to include exploitation of others by capitalizing on their ignorance or vulnerability. 14: You shall fear your God: The victims of such exploitation may never know how they have been used; fear of God is the only real sanction (see also v. 32 as well as 25.17, 36, 43). As noted by the Rabbis, this phrase occurs when compliance is a matter of conscience rather than legal enforcement. 15–16: Perversion of justice. The first v. speaks directly of the corruption of judicial proceedings on the part of judges. A better rendering of v. 16 is: "Do not spread [false] rumors among your countrymen [to have unjust charges brought against a person]; do not stand by the blood of your fellow [i.e., ignore bloodshed, thus preventing charges from being brought against the perpetrator]."

15: Render an unfair decision, lit. "commit distortion in judgment"; see v. 35. 17–18: Pent-up hatred and its consequences. The two vv. are a unit, better rendered: "Do not hate your kinsfolk in your heart, rather, reprove your kinsman so as to incur no guilt because of him. In other words: Do not take vengeance or bear a grudge against your countrymen, rather, love your fellow as yourself." The first v. prohibits one whose fellow has wronged him from keeping his resentment inside instead of informing the wrongdoer of his action, lest the bottled-up hatred result in incurring guilt. The second v. explains: Such bearing of grudges results ultimately in vengeance, while by refraining from this course one treats his fellow with the same "love," i.e., understanding and forgiveness, one normally extends toward one's own shortcomings. Traditional interpretation tended to treat each phrase as a general command in its own right. For instance the words reprove your kinsman were seen as obligating competent persons to chastise their fellow Israelites for failings in their religious and ethical duties and returning them to the path of righteousness (b. 'Arak. 16 b and many other places). Most notably, love your fellow as yourself was generalized in Jewish and Christian tradition to serve as a brief encapsulation of the Torah's ethics (e.g., b. Shab. 31a; Matt. 22.34–40) and as a blanket command covering all ethical duties not specifically mentioned (e.g., Maimonides Yad 'Avelut 14:1; Matt. 19.16–19). 18: I am the LORD: In the Priestly worldview, ethical behavior is a religious act only when performed as an act of obedience to God. 19: My laws: "hukkotay" should be understood here more literally as "the boundaries I have fixed in the natural world"; cf. Isa. 5.14; Jer. 5.22; 33.25; Job 38.33). As explained in ch 11, according to P's view Israel is to maintain the distinctions present in the created order. Different kind, two kinds, Heb "kil'ayim," used in the parallel law in Deut. 22.9 as well. Mixture, Heb "sha'atnez." However, wool and linen are woven together in the priestly vestments (Exod. 28.6; 39.29) and in the fringes (tzitzit) Israelites are obligated to place in their clothing (Num. 15.37–40). The "unnatural" mixture is therefore taboo for mundane use but not for sacred garments. 20–22: If one's female slave is designated for marriage to another man, sexual relations with her are illicit. Only by legal technicality (since the woman is not yet free, she is not strictly "betrothed" in the legally binding sense) are the two exempt from the death penalty mandated for adultery (see 20.10 n.) but the offense against God must be expiated. The "'asham" sacrifice is prescribed (see 5.14–26) even though no desecration of the sacred has taken place, because the "hata't" sacrifice (see 4.1–35) does not atone for deliberate acts. 20: There shall be an indemnity: This translation is uncertain. A simpler one is:

she has not been freed. ²¹But he must bring to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, as his guilt offering to the LORD, a ram of guilt offering. ²²With the ram of guilt offering the priest shall make expiation for him before the LORD for the sin that he committed; and the sin that he committed will be forgiven him.

²³When you enter the land and plant any tree for food, you shall regard its fruit as forbidden.^a Three years it shall be forbidden^a for you, not to be eaten. ²⁴In the fourth year all its fruit shall be set aside for jubilation before the LORD; ²⁵and only in the fifth year may you use its fruit—that its yield to you may be increased: I the LORD am your God.

²⁶You shall not eat anything with its blood. You shall not practice divination or soothsaying. ²⁷You shall not round off the side-growth on your head, or destroy the side-growth of your beard. ²⁸You shall not make gashes in your flesh for the dead, or incise any marks on yourselves: I am the LORD.

²⁹Do not degrade your daughter and make her a harlot, lest the land fall into harlotry and the land be filled with depravity. ³⁰You shall keep My sabbaths and venerate My sanctuary: I am the LORD.

³¹Do not turn to ghosts and do not inquire of familiar spirits, to be defiled by them: I the LORD am your God.

³²You shall rise before the aged and show deference to the old; you shall fear your God: I am the LORD.

³³When a stranger resides with you in your land, you shall not wrong him. ³⁴The stranger who resides with you shall be to you as one of your citizens; you shall love him as yourself, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt: I the LORD am your God.

23–25: The fruit of a tree is off-limits for the first three years, and offered to the LORD in the fourth; only then may it be eaten. 23: You shall regard its fruit as forbidden, lit. "treat it as uncircumcised." Figuratively speaking, the fruit tree is to be regarded as though sealed off from use. 24: Set aside, Heb "kodesh," a sacred or "holy" object, thus connecting this law with the theme of the ch as a whole. The text does not state how the fruit is to be set aside and what is to be done with it. For jubilation before the LORD, see Judg. 9.27.

25: That its yield to you may be increased: Abstaining from the first three years' fruit will result not in material loss but rather in divine blessing. 26–28: From context it appears that You shall not eat anything with its blood, which refers to eating meat without having drained the blood (see 17.10–14; 1 Sam. 14.32–35), must, like the two prohibitions that follow, be associated with pagan forms of divination and magic. The acts prohibited in the next two vv. are extreme expressions of grief and mourning (see Deut. 14.1–2; 1 Kings 18.28); as they are associated with conjuring up dead spirits and the gods of the netherworld, they are not to be copied from the pagan peoples. Similar restrictions are placed on priests (see 21.5). 29: Degrade, lit. "profane." This is the opposite of holiness. 30–32: These three vv. mark the close of the main section of the unit, returning to the themes with which it opened and adding to them. 30: Keep My sabbaths, corresponding to v. 3a. Venerate My sanctuary, i.e., do not trespass the bounds of the sacred. The verb corresponds to that used in the second law in 3a. This v. occurs again in 26.2. 31: Do not turn to, corresponding to v. 4. Ghosts . . . familiar spirits, Heb "'ov" and "yide'oni," mentioned throughout the Bible as spirits conjured up by necromancers. Biblical tradition admits that this method of gaining knowledge of the occult is effective (see 1 Sam. 28.3–25) but places it strictly off-limits for Israelites; see 20.6, 27; cf. Deut. 18.9ff. 32: Rise . . . show deference to the old, corresponding to v. 3a. You shall fear your God, see v. 14 n. 33–36: These vv. make up the appendix, extending two of the laws mentioned in the main body of the ch to the "ger" or resident alien (see 16.29). Elsewhere in P, when the law is extended to include the strangers, it is to enable them to perform positive commands if they desire or to obligate them to observe prohibitions. Here, the purpose is to obligate the Israelite to treat the "ger" with the same decency he is required to show his fellow Israelite. 33–34: Reinterpreting and extending the law in v. 18 to the resident alien. Love of the "ger" is manifest in treating him as a citizen, though he is not one, in financial dealings. 33: Wrong him, the sense is "cheat him in commerce." 34: For you were strangers in the land of Egypt: The prohibition of exploiting the "ger" is logically grounded in Israel's own experience; see Exod. 22.20; 23.9; Deut. 10.19. 35–36: Extending the law in v. 15, "do not commit distortion in judgment," by employing "mishpat," "judgment," in its additional capacity. ³⁶You shall have an honest balance, honest weights, an honest ephah, and an honest hin.

I the LORD am your God who freed you from the land of Egypt. ³⁷You shall faithfully observe all My laws and all My rules: I am the LORD.

20 And the LORD spoke to Moses: ²Say further to the Israelite people:

Anyone among the Israelites, or among the strangers residing in Israel, who gives any of his offspring to Molech, shall be put to death; the people of the land shall pelt him with stones. ³And I will set My face against that man and will cut him off from among his people, because he gave of his offspring to Molech and so defiled My sanctuary and profaned My holy name. ⁴And if the people of the land should shut their eyes to that man when he gives of his offspring to Molech, and should not put him to death, ⁵I Myself will set My face against that man and his kin, and will cut off from among their people both him and all who follow him in going astray after Molech. ⁶And if any person turns to ghosts and familiar spirits and goes astray after them, I will set My face against that person and cut him off from among his people.

meaning of “correct portion.” These two vv. likely also refer to the “ger,” warning the Israelite not to take advantage of the alien’s lack of familiarity with local weights and measures. A similar law, not connected with “gerim” specifically, appears in Deut. 25.13–16. 36: Ephah, a dry measure, about 23 liters (21 quarts); hin, a liquid measure, a little less than 4 liters (1 gallon). I the LORD am your God who freed you from the land of Egypt: The elongated self-assertion formula (cf. for instance 26.13) signals the end of the ch; it also indicates that this paragraph is connected with the one preceding. 37: Concluding summation; see 19.1–37 n.

20.1–27: Molech worship and sexual crimes. A single speech, introduced in v. 1 and divided into four parts: (a) penalties for Molech worship (vv. 2–5); (b) exhortation (vv. 7–8); (c) a series of prescribed penalties for sexual and other crimes (vv. 9–21); (d) exhortation (vv. 22–26). Two appendices, dealing with conjuring up the spirits of the dead, have been placed at the conclusions of sections (a) and (d), respectively (vv. 6 and 27). Sacrifice to Molech and sexual crimes were treated at length in ch 18 as direct commands (“Do not uncover the nakedness of . . .”), while here they are phrased conditionally (“If a man [commits such-and-such], he shall [suffer such-and-such punishment]”). Many commentators have therefore assumed that this ch provides the punishments for the crimes given in ch 18. But this is unlikely for many reasons. Several of the acts prohibited in ch 18 are missing (intercourse with one’s mother, granddaughter, half-sister, step-granddaughter, and wife’s sister). Conversely, this ch mentions crimes not included in ch 18 (cursing one’s parents and consulting spirits). Even some of the parallels are not exact: 20.14, 17, 18 do not quite correspond to the commands in 18.9, 17, 19. Further, according to 18.29 all the crimes enumerated are punished by “karet,” whereas this ch mentions “karet” in a few cases only, and prescribes capital punishment in the others. Finally, the very existence of two separate chs devoted to one theme, with an entire ch standing between them, indicates that the two chapters were composed separately. The compilers of H, in their endeavor to include as much legislation as possible, preserved and included overlapping and contradictory compositions without harmonization. This illustrates the reverence ancient authors had for texts that they inherited from earlier bearers of tradition. 2–5: Molech is the Heb for an ancient Near Eastern deity associated with the netherworld. Biblical tradition is unanimous that the worship of Molech consisted of the sacrifice of children, and there is evidence that this cult of death was occasionally practiced in Israel, and that at times Israelites engaged in child sacrifice. In 18.21 this monstrous crime is included among the “abominations” which caused (and will again cause) the land of Canaan to spew out its inhabitants. 2–3: Sacrificing to Molech is a capital offense. The people of the land (which may refer to a designated body of citizens) are required to see the death by stoning of the perpetrators. In addition, God will personally attend to the eventual extinction of their line (“karet,” see 7.20, 21). Defiled My sanctuary: Sacrifices to Molech were not made in the LORD’s sanctuary; rather, the contamination of God’s abode results from this crime wherever it is committed. Profaned My holy name, by attributing salvific power to another deity, or by imagining that the God of Israel desires the sacrifice of children. 4–5: If those charged with prosecuting the criminal neglect their duty, God will extend the “karet” threat to the perpetrator’s larger family and all those who follow him in going astray after Molech. 6: Ghosts and familiar spirits, see 19.31. In v. 27 the death penalty is prescribed for those who “have” ghosts and familiar spirits. Thus the “providers” are punished by death, and the “consumers” are ⁷You shall sanctify yourselves and be holy, for I the LORD am your God. ⁸You shall faithfully observe My laws: I the LORD make you holy.

⁹If anyone insults his father or his mother, he shall be put to death; he has insulted his father and his mother—his bloodguilt is upon him.

punished by "karet." 7–8: See ch 19. These two vv. provide the transition to the second set of laws in the ch. 9–21: The series of penalties for severe crimes. For those in vv. 9–16 the death penalty is prescribed, with burning mentioned as the method in one case

(v. 14). For the remainder, "karet" (see 7.20, 21) is either pronounced (vv. 17–18) or implied (vv. 19–21). It is unclear why particular punishments are legislated for particular offenses. Many of the terms used to characterize the crimes are unclear (e.g., "depravity," "disgrace"), and it is uncertain why only some vv. contain such characterizations and others do not. These and other features of the text indicate that this ch, like the remainder of H, was not composed to be studied as a precise legal document but rather as an exhortation, with all the rhetorical technique and emotional expression that this entails. 9: Insults, Heb "curses." His bloodguilt is upon him: This phrase, here and in the following vv., emphasizes that although the crime was not one of bloodshed, the guilty parties have indeed incurred the death penalty and the executioners are not accountable. 10: Adultery is defined as sexual relations between any man, married or single, and a woman betrothed or married to someone else. Both parties to the crime are guilty; see Deut. 22.22. 11: See 18.8. 12: See 18.15. They have committed incest, Heb "tevel," taken to mean "improper mixing." 13: See 18.22. 14: See 18.17, where the formulation is "a woman and her daughter." 15–16: See 18.23. 17: See 18.9. Marries, see 18.17 n.; here too the Heb "yikah," "takes," may suggest a sexual relationship. They shall be excommunicated, Heb (see translators' note ^a) simply says "shall be cut off," precisely as in the "karet" threat in the next v. and throughout the Priestly law (see 7.20, 21). He shall bear his guilt, for this phrase, used also in vv. 19 and 20, see 5.1; 7.18. 18: See 15.19–24 n. and 18.19 n. In her infirmity, during her menstrual period; see 12.2; 15.33. 19: You shall not uncover the nakedness, see 18.12, 13. This v. abandons the conditional formulation found throughout this ch and reverts to the "you shall not" formulation of ch 18. 20: Uncle's wife: This may include the wife of the mother's brother as well as the wife of the father's brother mentioned specifically in 18.14. They shall die childless: This penalty, found here and in the next v., is probably a specific form of "karet" (see 7.20, 21), since the childless person's line is thereby made extinct. 21: See 18.16.

²²You shall faithfully observe all My laws and all My regulations, lest the land to which I bring you to settle in spew you out. ²³You shall not follow the practices of the nation that I am driving out before you. For it is because they did all these things that I abhorred them ²⁴and said to you: You shall possess their land, for I will give it to you to possess, a land flowing with milk and honey. I the LORD am your God who has set you apart from other peoples. ²⁵So you shall set apart the clean beast from the unclean, the unclean bird from the clean. You shall not draw abomination upon yourselves through beast or bird or anything with which the ground is alive, which I have set apart for you to treat as unclean. ²⁶You shall be holy to Me, for I the LORD am holy, and I have set you apart from other peoples to be Mine.

²⁷A man or a woman who has a ghost or a familiar spirit shall be put to death; they shall be pelted with stones—their bloodguilt shall be upon them.

21 The LORD said to Moses: Speak to the priests, the sons of Aaron, and say to them:

None shall defile himself for any [dead] person among his kin,² except for the relatives that are closest to him: his mother, his father, his son, his daughter, and his brother;³ also for a virgin sister, close to him because she has not married, for her he may defile himself. ⁴But he shall not defile himself ^aas a kinsman by marriage,^a and so profane himself.

a-a Lit. "as a husband among his kin"; meaning uncertain.

22–26: The concluding exhortation returns briefly (vv. 22–24) to the themes of 18.24–30, adding the description of the land of Canaan as a land flowing with milk and honey. It then (vv. 25–26) introduces the motif of “setting apart”: As God has separated Israel from the nations, they must separate clean from unclean foods, and thus be holy. Since holy means set apart, the text is saying that in order to be holy (to be Mine, v. 26) they are required to act accordingly (So you shall set apart, v. 25). Vv. 25–26 resemble 11.43–45 and would read well as an alternate conclusion to ch 11. 27: The appendix, evidently a secondary addition to the ch; see v. 6.

21.1–22.32: Worship and holiness. Whereas earlier chs were concerned with the proper procedure for sacrifice (chs 1–7, 17) and with the prompt disposal of impurity (chs 11–16), this section revolves primarily around holiness, that of the priests (ch 21) and that of sacrificial offerings (22.1–16). The sacred, which belongs to the divine sphere and has been “saturated” with holiness (see 6.11 n.), is vulnerable to attack; it is subject to desecration if it is not kept apart from impurity, disqualifying imperfections, and unauthorized contact or use. Desecration of the holy redounds to God, profaning His abode and His holy name, and brings disastrous consequences in its wake. The second topic, arising from the mention of disqualifying blemishes, is that of the acceptance of offerings, first mentioned in 1.3–4 (see also 7.18; 19.5–8). The chs consist of five speeches to Moses, the first four of which he is to convey to Aaron and his sons: (a) avoiding the desecration of the priests (21.1–15); (b) avoiding the desecration of the sanctuary and the offerings by contact with defective priests (21.16–24); (c) avoiding the desecration of the sanctuary and the sacred offerings by contact with impure priests and consumption by ineligible persons (22.1–16); (d) offerings deemed unacceptable due to physical defect or pagan origin (22.17–25); (e) offerings deemed unacceptable because of time factors, and concluding vv. of a general nature (22.26–33).

21.1–15: The holiness of the priesthood. 1–4: The priests, in contrast to the lay Israelite, must stay clear of avoidable impurity and must refrain from nearing the sacred when they become unavoidably impure since they are holy in the highest degree. Thus, while lay Israelites may come into contact with a corpse as long as they dispose of their impurity afterwards (see Num. ch 19), priests may not do so, unless it be in order to mourn the death of a blood relative—in which case they must, of course, avoid contact with the sacred until they have been cleansed. 2: The relatives that are closest to him, a narrower group than those denoted by the phrase “anyone of his own flesh” in 18.6; 25.49. 2–3: His mother, his father, etc.: In Jewish tradition, this (along with the wife, who is not mentioned but was supplied exegetically) is the basis for the list of relatives for whom one is required to observe the statutory mourning periods. 4: Defile himself as a kinsman by marriage: Others translate ⁵They shall not shave smooth any part of their heads, or cut the side-growth of their beards, or make gashes in their flesh. ⁶They shall be holy to their God and not profane the name of their God; for they offer the LORD's offerings by fire, the food of their God, and so must be holy.

⁷They shall not marry a woman defiled by harlotry, nor shall they marry one divorced from her husband. For they are holy to their God ⁸and you must treat them as holy, since they offer the food of your God; they shall be holy to you, for I the LORD who sanctify you am holy.

⁹When the daughter of a priest defiles herself through harlotry, it is her father whom she defiles; she shall be put to the fire.

¹⁶The LORD spoke further to Moses: ¹⁷Speak to Aaron and say: No man of your offspring throughout the ages who has a defect shall be qualified to offer the food of his God. ¹⁸No one at all who has a defect shall be qualified: no man who is blind, or lame, or ^bhas a limb too short or too long;^b ¹⁹no man who has a broken leg or a broken a See note at 10.6. b-b Or "mutilated or has a limb too long."

this difficult phrase literally: "a 'master' [i.e., a priest] must not defile himself for his kinsmen," a recapitulation of v. 1b. 5: Desecration of the priest results also from observing the widespread rituals of mourning detailed here; see 10.6–7. According to 19.27–28 these expressions of grief are also forbidden to lay Israelites. 6: The rationale for the preceding. The priests must maintain the sanctity with which they, like the Tabernacle and its furnishings, have been imbued (see 8.10–13). Since they offer the deity food gifts, any desecration of their persons would profane the name of God. Offerings by fire, see 1.9. 7: The holiness of the priests is held to be genetically transmitted; they may marry only women about whom there can be no suspicion of the presence of another man's seed. See v. 14 n. A woman defiled by harlotry, lit. "a harlotrous woman and one defiled," taken by most exegetes as two distinct categories. Traditionally, the former is defined as a woman who has had prohibited intercourse

(see 18.6–23) and the latter as a woman born of such a relationship, or of a union between a priest and a woman prohibited to him. Halakhah derives the prohibition of marriage between a priest and a proselyte from this phrase. 8: The repeated rationale, including a reference to God's own holiness. 9: The lay Israelite too is forbidden to allow his daughter to engage in harlotry (19.29). The priest's daughter, however, is a more serious case; her father's sanctity would thereby be desecrated, and the offense is therefore a capital one. 10–14: The high priest is subject to even stricter safeguards against possible desecration, since he is required to enter the Tabernacle daily. He must refrain even from benign expressions of grief, and may not contract corpse contamination even in order to mourn for a close relative (similarly the Nazirite; see Num. 6.6). Further, he must marry a virgin; even a widow (whom a lesser priest may marry, presumably because her husband has been dead long enough to nullify any suspicion of paternity) is off-limits; since another man's seed has entered her at some time in her life, the high priest's union with her is thought to desecrate his own seed. Ezekiel forecasts that in the rebuilt Temple all priests will be subject to the same restrictions (Ezek. 44.22–26); halakhah maintained the Torah's leniency. 10: On whose head, see 4.3 n. Bare his head, better: dishevel his head [i.e., his hair]; see 10.6. Or rend his vestments, see 10.6. 14: Of his own kin, i.e., of priestly descent. In contrast Ezekiel permits the priest to marry any virgin of the seed of Israel (44.22). Here the halakhah follows Ezekiel, once again adopting the more lenient view. 15: Have sanctified, better, "sanctify him," reflecting Priestly thought, where God sanctifies constantly by His very presence (Exod. 29.43–44; see also v. 8 above; Exod. 31.13; Lev. 20.8; 22.9, 16, 32; cf. Ezek. 37.28). 16–24: Physical defects, broadly defined as the absence or permanent mal-

arm; ²⁰or who is a hunchback, or a dwarf, or who has a growth in his eye, or who has a boil-scar, or scurvy, or crushed testes. ²¹No man among the offspring of Aaron the priest who has a defect shall be qualified to offer the LORD's offering by fire; having a defect, he shall not be qualified to offer the food of his God. ²²He may eat of the food of his God, of the most holy as well as of the holy; ²³but he shall not enter behind the curtain or come near the altar, for he has a defect. He shall not profane these places sacred to Me, for I the LORD have sanctified them.

²⁴Thus Moses spoke to Aaron and his sons and to all the Israelites.

22 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Instruct Aaron and his sons to be scrupulous about the sacred donations that the Israelite people consecrate to Me, lest they profane My holy name, Mine the LORD's. ³Say to them:

Throughout the ages, if any man among your offspring, while in a state of uncleanness, partakes of any sacred donation that the Israelite people may consecrate to the LORD, that person shall be cut off from before Me: I am the LORD. ⁴No man of Aaron's offspring who has an eruption or a discharge^a shall eat of the sacred donations until he is clean. If one touches anything made unclean by a corpse, or if a man has an emission of semen, ⁵or if a man touches any swarming thing by which he is made unclean or any human being by whom he is made unclean—whatever his uncleanness—⁶the person who touches such shall be unclean until evening and shall not eat of the sacred donations unless he has washed his body in water. ⁷As soon as the sun sets, he shall be clean; and afterward he may eat of the sacred donations, for they are his food. ⁸He shall not eat anything that died or was torn by beasts, thereby becoming unclean: I am the LORD. ⁹They shall keep My charge, lest they incur guilt thereby and die for it, having committed profanation: I the LORD consecrate them.

¹⁰No lay person shall eat of the sacred donations. No bound or hired laborer of a priest shall eat of the sacred donations; ¹¹but a person who is a priest's property by purchase may eat of them; and those that are born into his household may eat of his food. ¹²If a priest's daughter formation of external parts of the human body in its "completed," adult, male form, disqualify the priest from offering the sacred food gifts to God. Though he may not officiate, the defective priest remains a priest, as this is a fact of birth, and is entitled to eat the priestly portions of the sacrificial flesh. 21: See 1.9. 23: The specific ineligibility of the defective priest, i.e., the prohibition of approaching the altar and beyond, may indicate the precise rationale for the law. According to Priestly teaching, the human being is made in the image of the deity (Gen. 1.26–27; 5.1). The priest, as God's palace servant, profanes the abode of the deity if he cannot adequately reflect the divine form; only the fully formed specimens of the image of God can serve in His earthly habitation. These places sacred to Me, "mikdashay," lit. "My sanctuaries." This does not, however, indicate that P or H accepted a decentralized cult with multiple sanctuaries (see also 26.31 n.) Have sanctified, as in v. 15, "sanctify them."

22.1–16. Desecration of the offerings. Even minor impurities desecrate the sacred (vv. 2–9); moreover, the consumption of sacred flesh by nonpriests desecrates it (vv. 10–16). 2: Be scrupulous about, lit. "keep away from [whenever they are impure]." This v. thus provides the caption for vv. 2–9. Lest they profane My holy name: Allowing impurity to come into contact with the sacred profanes the divine name, since the divine abode and the food gifts of the deity are thereby treated as though they were common. Mine the LORD's, better, "I am the LORD [who commands this]." 3–7: Contact impurities (see ch 11) and bodily impurities (see chs 13–15). 3: Shall be cut off, see 7.20, 21. 4: Until he is clean, as stipulated by the laws that apply in each case. 7: Sun sets: The rule applies to vv. 4b–6 (see 11.24, etc.; 15.17). 8: See 11.39–40; 17.15–16 n. 9: And die for it: Death is depicted as the automatic and inevitable consequence of desecrating the sacred; see 10.2 n. 10–16: The portions of the sacrificial offerings whose consumption is restricted to the priests are considered among the most sacred; contact between them and the lay person leads to their desecration. Nonpriests in the priest's employ, and the daughters of priests, may eat of them only as marries a layman, she may not eat of the sacred gifts; ¹³but if the priest's daughter is widowed or divorced and without offspring, and is back in her father's house as in her youth, she may eat of her father's food. No lay person may eat of it: ¹⁴but if a man eats of a sacred donation unwittingly, he shall pay the priest for the sacred donation, adding one-fifth of its value. ¹⁵But [the priests] must not allow the Israelites to profane the sacred donations that they set aside for the LORD, ¹⁶or to incur guilt requiring a penalty payment, by eating such sacred donations: for it is I the LORD who make them sacred.

When any man of the house of Israel or of the strangers in Israel presents a burnt offering as his offering for any of the votive or any of the freewill offerings that they offer to the LORD, ¹⁹it must, to be acceptable in your favor, be a male without blemish, from cattle or sheep or goats. ²⁰You shall not offer any that has a defect, for it will not be accepted in your favor.

²¹And when a man offers, from the herd or the flock, a sacrifice of well-being to the LORD for an explicit^a vow or as a freewill offering, it must, to be acceptable, be without blemish; there must be no defect in it. ²²Anything blind, or injured, or maimed, or with a wen, boil-scar, or scurvy—such you shall not offer to the LORD; you shall not put any of them on the altar as offerings by fire to the LORD. ²³You may, however, present as a freewill offering an ox or a sheep with a limb extended or contracted; but it will not be accepted for a vow. ²⁴You shall not offer to the LORD anything [with its testes] bruised or crushed or torn or cut. You shall have no such practices^b in your own land, ²⁵nor shall you accept such [animals] from a foreigner for offering as food for your God, for they are mutilated, they have a defect; they shall not be accepted in your favor.

²⁶The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²⁷When an ox or a sheep or a goat is born, it shall stay seven days with its mother, and from the eighth day on it shall be acceptable as an offering by fire to the LORD. ²⁸However, no animal priest, just covered, and of a potential offering are analogous, but their ramifications are not. Whereas defective priests must not approach the altar lest they desecrate the sacred, they are not thereby excluded from the priesthood per se and may eat sacred flesh. Deformed animals do not cause desecration, but are simply not accepted and the person's sacrifice is deemed not to have been offered. For the underlying idea that what is placed on God's table must be without defect, see Mal. 1.6–14. 17–20: The disqualifying blemishes in the burnt offering; see 1.3 n. 19: Acceptable, see 1.3–4; 7.18 n. 21–23: The disqualifying blemishes in the well-being sacrifice. From this passage it becomes evident that the votive offering is of a greater sanctity since all of the blemishes enumerated disqualify it, whereas the freewill offering, in which the deformities mentioned in v. 23 are acceptable, is of a lesser sanctity. Taken along with 7.12–18, these vv. confirm that the hierarchy of the three classes is "todah" (thanksgiving offering), "neder" (votive offering), "nedavah" (freewill offering), in descending order. 24: Animals with defective or mutilated genitalia; this v. appears to pertain to all sacrificial animals. No such practices in your own land: The Rabbis took this as a general prohibition of castrating animals, even outside of the sacrificial context (b. Hag. 14b; b. Shab. 110b).

22.26–33: Rules of acceptability. The fifth and final speech of the section, containing three laws pertaining to the acceptability of sacrificial animals as a function of the time factor and concluding with a general exhortation. 26–27: From the context (see also Exod. 22.29), an animal is not considered fit for sacrifice until it is viable, i.e., has safely gotten beyond the stage of a newborn and is a creature in its own right. 27: Offering by fire, see 1.9. 28: In contrast to the preceding, the humane concern seems to be the only plausible explanation for this restriction; see Exod. 23.19 (= 34.26; Deut. 14.21)

^a Or "unspecified" or "extraordinary"; meaning of Heb. lephalle uncertain.

^b I.e., mutilations.

long as they are formally a part of the priest's household. 14: On unwitting desecration of the sacred, see also 5.14–16. 15–16: These vv. make it clear that actively preserving the boundaries between the sacred and the profane is the responsibility of the priests; see also 10.10.

22.17–25: Animals unfit for sacrifice. The disqualifying defects of a from the herd or from the flock shall be slaughtered on the same day with its young.

²⁹When you sacrifice a thanksgiving offering to the LORD, sacrifice it so that it may be acceptable in your favor. ³⁰It shall be eaten on the same day; you shall not leave any of it until morning: I am the LORD.

³¹You shall faithfully observe My commandments: I am the LORD. ³²You shall not profane My holy name, that I may be sanctified in the midst of the Israelite people—I the LORD who sanctify you, ³³I who brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God, I the LORD.

23 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

These are My fixed times, the fixed times of the LORD, which you shall proclaim as sacred occasions.

³On six days work may be done, but on the seventh day there shall be a sabbath of complete rest, a sacred occasion. You shall do no work; it shall be a sabbath of the LORD throughout your settlements.

and Deut. 22.6–7. All of the Torah law collections thus exhibit the same motif. It is not clear whether it expresses the sense that animals have emotional attachment to their young and experience distress at their fate or whether the aim is to sensitize humans to avoid unnecessary cruelty. 29–30: See 7.12–15. Together with 19.5–8, these vv. are a repetition of 7.12–18. 31–33: Elsewhere in the Holiness Legislation we have been told that compliance with the commandments enables the Israelites to absorb the holiness of God (19.2, 37; 20.7–8). This hortatory conclusion expresses the converse: that the failure to obey the commandments desecrates the name of God. This is only logical: The purpose of Israel's existence is to sanctify God's name, that is, to attest to His existence, to publicize His oneness, and to advertise His greatness, by worshipping Him and by keeping His laws. Their failure to do so has the opposite effect: His name is profaned, that is, His fame is diminished and His reputation tarnished.

23.1–44: Sacred times. God conveys to Moses, in five speeches, the laws of the weekly Sabbath and the annual holy days. Each of the Torah law collections contains a calendar of annual festivities, and most include a Sabbath law (some mention the Sabbath more than once). The command to abstain from labor on the Sabbath is found in all the collections, as is the tradition of festivals coinciding with the major events in the agricultural year: the early grain ripening, the reaping of the first produce, and the final ingathering. Some of the names of the festivals are shared by more than one law collection, as is the intrinsic connection between the springtime “matzot” festival and the commemorative “pesah” offering. The collections also agree that a central feature of at least some of the festivals is the “hag,” which means “pilgrimage” (later called “aliyah” or “ascent”), namely, the obligation to appear before the LORD. Despite these similarities, the Sabbath laws and festival calendars found in the separate law collections differ in many ways. Tradition managed to combine all of the legislation into a coherent whole, creatively reconciling the contradictions and interpreting each repeated passage as providing some further detail. Critical scholarship generally views each version of the festival calendar as reflecting a stage in the historical development of the festivals. The laws in this ch provide a glimpse of the unique Priestly vision of the Sabbath and festivals. They are “sacred times,” i.e., dates set apart from the remainder of the calendar and designated as “belonging to” the deity. Like sacred objects, persons, areas, and utterances, they may not be treated as common. Thus, only in P are the festivals, like the Sabbath, days of cessation from work, since engaging in daily activity (that is, labor) would amount to the desecration of the holy, which Priestly law, especially H, is at such pains to prevent. Further, in the Priestly view, though the festivals are determined by the agricultural year, they are primarily God's special occasions. Thus they are days on which He is worshipped—by His priests, in His abode—in a manner exceeding the daily routine. The literary structure of the ch reflects these two features. It is organized as a calendar of precise dates on which a cessation from labor is to be observed and a special “food-gift” offered to the LORD. Another Priestly festival calendar appears in Num. chs 28–29; that calendar is primarily concerned with the required offerings. 1–2: The caption. The terms fixed times of the LORD and sacred occasions express the underlying idea for the festival legislation. Which you shall proclaim: The translation reflects the rabbinic tradition (b. Rosh Hash. 24a) that the dates of the festivals are determined by the Israelites, i.e., the proclamation of the New Moon and the introduction of the intercalated month, upon which the entire calendar depends, are the responsibility of the Sages. 3: The weekly Sabbath. In the Priestly version of history, the weekly “shabbat” (lit. “cessation”) was consecrated at creation (see Gen. 2.1–3) but was not implemented until the Israelites had become a people, the Tabernacle was ready to be erected, and the ⁴These are the set times of the LORD, the sacred occasions, which you shall celebrate each at its appointed time: ⁵In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month, at twilight, there shall be a passover offering to the LORD, ⁶and on the fifteenth day of that month the LORD's Feast of Unleavened Bread. You shall eat unleavened bread for seven days. ⁷On the first day you shall celebrate a sacred occasion: you shall not work at your occupations. ⁸Seven days you shall make offerings by fire to the LORD. The seventh day shall be a sacred occasion: you shall not work at your occupations.

⁹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁰Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

When you enter the land that I am giving to you and you reap its harvest, you shall bring the first sheaf of your harvest to the priest. ¹¹He shall elevate the sheaf before the LORD for acceptance in your behalf; the priest shall elevate it on the day after the sabbath. ¹²On the day that you elevate the sheaf, you shall offer as a burnt offering to worship of the LORD was about to be inaugurated there (Exod. 31.12–17; 35.1–3). The Sabbath law is repeated several times in H (Lev. 19.3, 30; 26.2; see also Num. 15.32–36). In the non-Priestly literature the Sabbath and festivals are two distinct topics; only Priestly law, with its notion of sacred times, calls the Sabbath holy and mentions it alongside the festivals (see also Exod. 34.21, the location of which may have been influenced by this text). 4: The repetition of the caption (see v. 2) gives the impression that the inclusion of the weekly Sabbath among the “sacred times” was not part of an earlier version of the ch. See v. 38 n. 5–8: The annual “pesah” sacrifice, which is not a sacred occasion but which immediately precedes the first of these, the “matzot” pilgrimage. The historical explanation for each, the connection between the two, and the details of their observance, including the abstention from leaven, are given by P in Exod. ch 12; here only those aspects relevant to the calendar of “sacred occasions” are mentioned. 5: The first month, see Exod. 12.2. On the fourteenth day of the month, at twilight:

The date of the evening is that of the preceding day (see v. 32; Exod. 12.18); only in postbiblical tradition was the method reversed and evenings given the date of the following day. A passover offering, “pesah” (see Exod. 12.11–13) is the name of the sacrifice made in commemoration of the exodus; in postbiblical Judaism it became the name of the ensuing festival. 6: Feast, Heb “ḥag,” “pilgrimage.” In the non-Priestly calendars there are three annual pilgrimages: the pilgrimage of Unleavened Bread (“ḥag ha-matzot”), the pilgrimage of Harvest (“katzir”), also called Weeks (“shavu’ot”) and the pilgrimage of Ingathering (“ḥag ha’asif”) or Booths (“sukkot”). Here and in Num. 28.26–31 there are only two, and “shavu’ot” is observed as a sacred occasion but not as a pilgrimage. In addition, in the non-Priestly tradition, the three pilgrimages are an absolute requirement, incumbent upon all males (Exod. 23.14, 17; 34.23–24; Deut. 16.16); in P, no such unqualified obligation is present. Those who do not make the pilgrimages must, however, observe the cessation from labor on the days designated as holy. You shall eat unleav- ened bread: Nowhere does P provide the rationale for this; the non-Priestly traditions explain it as a commemoration of the haste in which the Israelites left Egypt (see Exod. 12.39; Deut. 16.3). The Priestly tradition thus preserves the agricultural origin of the eating of “matzot” in the early spring, marking the very beginning of the barley harvest. For seven days: The eating of unleavened bread lasts seven days; the pilgrimage, unlike “sukkot” (see vv. 34, 39–40) does not. According to Exod. 13.6 only the seventh day was observed as a pilgrimage; in our text it appears that the pilgrimage was observed on the first day, the day after the “pesah” offering, followed by six more days of eating unleavened bread; this is stated explicitly in Deut. 16.7–8. 7: You shall not work at your occupations: This phrase recurs in vv. 8, 21, 25, 35, 36, prohibiting labor on the fully sacred festival days. It differs from the phrase “You shall do no work” used with regard to the weekly Sabbath and the Day of Atonement in vv. 3, 28, 30. Relying on Exod. 12.16, Ramban interpreted the difference to mean that labors required for the preparation of food are permissible on festival days but not on the Sabbath and Day of Atonement. 8: Offerings by fire, see 1.9 n. The seventh day: The observance of the first and last days of the festival as full holy days, which became normative Jewish practice, is peculiar to the Priestly tradition (see vv. 36, 39; Exod. 12.16; Num. 28.25; 29.35). 9–22: The second speech contains a lengthy set of instructions for the rituals commencing after the “matzot” festival and culminating seven weeks later with the second of the sacred occasions. 9–14: The presentation (lit. “elevation”; see 7.30 n.) of the “omer,” or first sheaf of the new barley harvest, with its accompanying offerings, performed each year to secure the deity’s blessing for the new crops. 11: For acceptance in your behalf, see 1.3–4; 7.18; 19.5; 22.19. On the day after the sabbath: This phrase (appearing also in v. 15) became a the LORD a lamb of the first year without blemish. ¹³The meal offering with it shall be two-tenths of a measure of choice flour with oil mixed in, an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD; and the libation with it shall be of wine, a quarter of a hin. ¹⁴Until that very day, until you have brought the offering of your God, you shall eat no bread or parched grain or fresh ears;^a it is a law for all time throughout the ages in all your settlements.

¹⁵And from the day on which you bring the sheaf of elevation offering—the day after the sabbath—you shall count off seven weeks. They must be complete: ¹⁶you must count until the day after the seventh week—fifty days; then you shall bring an offering of new grain to the LORD. ¹⁷You shall bring from your settlements two loaves of bread as an elevation offering; each shall be made of two-tenths of a measure of choice flour, baked after leavening, as first fruits to the LORD. ¹⁸With the bread you shall present, as burnt offerings to the LORD, seven yearling lambs without blemish, one bull of the herd, and two rams, with their meal offerings and libations, an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD. ¹⁹You shall also offer one he-goat as a sin offering and two yearling lambs as a sacrifice of well-being. ²⁰The priest shall elevate these—the two lambs^b—together with the bread of first fruits as an elevation offering before the LORD; they shall be holy to the LORD, for the priest. ²¹On that same day you shall hold a celebration; it shall be a sacred occasion for you; you shall not work at your occupations. This is a law for all time in all your settlements, throughout the ages.

²²And when you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap all the way to the edges of your field, or major source of controversy in talmudic times (Sifra 'Emor 12:4; b. Menah. 66a). The Pharisaic sages, claiming that the word "sabbath" is used here in its nonspecific, literal sense ("cessation") but does not indicate the weekly Sabbath day, vehemently asserted that the "omer" is presented on the day after the day of rest at the beginning of the "matzot" pilgrimage, namely, the sixteenth of Nisan; otherwise the definite article in the phrase "the sabbath" would have no referent. Though this view has been accepted by Jewish tradition, the more natural sense of the phrase is that the ceremony was to take place on the first day of the week (Sunday) following the pilgrimage. This was the view of the Boethusians as well as the Qumran sect, while the Samaritans and the Karaites held that the Sunday during the "matzot" pilgrimage was intended. 14: As the presentation of the "omer" marks the beginning of the new harvest, partaking of the new grain is prohibited until the ceremony has taken place. 15–22: The new-grain ("first fruits"; see v. 20) offering, performed seven weeks later. 15–16: The precise counting of seven weeks is required in order for the cessation from labor observed by the population at large, wherever they are, to coincide with the Temple observances prescribed, since in P this festival is not marked by a pilgrimage (see v. 6). Only with the acceptance of the rabbinic interpretation of "the day after the sabbath" (see v. 11) and the establishment of the calendar did it become possible to specify a fixed date (6 Sivan) for this holy day; prior to this the fiftieth day would have fallen on a different date each year. The counting later became a ceremony in its own right, called, in commemoration of the sheaf of barley presented at its start, the "Counting of [i.e., from] the omer." The counting of seven weeks is also prescribed in Deut. 16:9, and even gives its name ("shavu'ot," "Weeks") to the festival observed at its conclusion (vv. 10 and 16; see also Exod. 34:22), but there it is to enable each landowner to determine the appropriate day for his own family's visit to the Temple. Here it has no name, but Num. 28:26 calls it "yom ha-bikkurim," "the Day of First Fruits" (see v. 20) and describes it further as "your Weeks." The connection of "shavu'ot" with the giving of the Torah at Sinai is not found in biblical tradition; it was derived by the Rabbis, who held that the dates coincide. 17–20: The offerings presented on the fiftieth day (in addition to those enumerated in Num. 28:26–31). They consist of a unique offering of two leavened loaves called the "bread of first fruits" (see v. 20), in thanks for the new grain harvest and accompanied by appropriate additional offerings. Among the latter are two yearling lambs offered as a well-being offering ("shelamim"). This is the only such offering made on behalf of the public, functioning here as a communal offering of thanksgiving. 20: First fruits: The word "fruit" is misleading; the reference here is to the new crop of wheat (see Exod. 23:16; 34:22) from which these loaves are produced; see also 2.14–17. 21: On that same day, see vv. 15–16 n. 22: A partial quotation from 19.9–10, added gather the gleanings of your harvest; you shall leave them for the poor and the stranger: I the LORD am your God.

²³The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²⁴Speak to the Israelite people thus: In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, you shall observe complete rest, a sacred occasion commemorated with loud blasts. ²⁵You shall not work at your occupations; and you shall bring an offering by fire to the LORD.

²⁶The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²⁷Mark, the tenth day of this seventh month is the Day of Atonement. It shall be a sacred occasion for you: you shall practice self-denial, and you shall bring an offering by fire to the LORD; ²⁸you shall do no work throughout that day. For it is a Day of Atonement, on which expiation is made on your behalf before the LORD your God. ²⁹Indeed, any person who does not practice self-denial throughout that day shall be cut off from his kin; ³⁰and whoever does any work throughout that day, I will cause that person to perish from among his people. ³¹Do no work whatever; it is a law for all time, throughout the ages in all your settlements. ³²It shall be a sabbath of complete rest for you, and you shall practice self-denial; on the ninth day of the month at evening, from evening to evening, you shall observe this your sabbath.

³³The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ³⁴Say to the Israelite people:

here by association to the context of harvest-time. 23–25: The third speech ordains the sacred occasion observed on the first day of the seventh month. The beginning of the seventh month marks the beginning of the agricultural year and opens the season of holy days culminating two weeks later in the Ingathering pilgrimage. The non-Priestly calendars are unfamiliar with this observance. 24: Commemorated with loud blasts, correctly, “remembrance by shouting”; compare “a day of shouting” [NIPS: “a day when the horn is sounded”] in the parallel law in Num. 29.1. The Priestly literature contains a number of observances to remind God of the Israelite people (Exod. 28.12, 29; 30.16; Num. 31.54). These may be compared to the rainbow, designated by God as a reminder (to Himself!) of His promise to preserve humanity (Gen. 9.14–16).

Num. 10.9–10 states that this is the function of the trumpet blasts sounded when Israel is in distress, to call their plight to God’s attention and secure His assistance, or when celebrating festivals, New Moons, and appointed seasons. The annual “Day of Shouting” would thus be envisaged by the Priestly tradition as a day of Israel’s crying out to God, to remind Him that they are His people and to secure His aid. In later tradition this observance developed in several directions. Though “teru’ah” literally means “raise a cry, shout,” it is used in Num. 10.5–10 in conjunction with the sounding of trumpets, and in Lev. 25.9 in reference to the ram’s horn. This led to the conclusion that here too the sound is to be made by the ram’s horn or shofar. With the eventual adoption of the autumnal New Year as the primary one, the first day of the seventh month in the vernal calendar became New Year’s Day (“Rosh Ha-Shanah”). Since, in the cultural milieu of the ancient Near East, the heralding of the New Year was particularly associated with celebrations of kingship, Rosh Ha-Shanah became, among other things, a day to mark God’s sovereignty as king. Finally, since it opens a period leading up to the annual Day of Atonement (see ch 16; 23.26–32), Rosh Ha-Shanah became invested with the significance of the latter, and now marks the beginning of Judaism’s annual ten-day penitential period. 26–32: The Day of Atonement, also unknown outside of Priestly literature. On this day the Tabernacle is purged of the accumulated impurities and transgressions of the Israelite people (ch 16). The cessation of labor, which serves (along with the fast) to effect the purification and atonement rituals performed, marks this day too as holy time, a “sacred occasion,” thus incorporating it into the annual cycle of such dates.

27: Practice self-denial, fast; see 16.29 n. 28: For it is a Day of Atonement, see 16.30. 29–30: See 7.20, 21; 17.10. 32: A sabbath of complete rest, a phrase used only of the Sabbath (v. 3; Exod. 31.15; 35.2) and the Day of Atonement (see also 16.31), highlighting the strict and total abstinence required in order for the atonement rituals to be effective. 32: On the ninth day of the month at evening, from evening to evening, see v. 5. Sabbath, cessation from labor. 33–42: The final speech, containing the laws for the “sukkot” festival and the concluding captions. 34: Feast, “pilgrimage”; see v. 6. Booths, Heb “sukkot,” “huts” serving as makeshift, temporary shelters while laboring in the field or vineyard for several days at a time (see Isa. 1.8). The autumn pilgrimage is so named because its long duration—seven full days—necessitates the erection of such shelters to accommodate the many pilgrims during their stay in the Temple city (see vv. 43–44 n.). Notably, the texts which do not spec-

On the fifteenth day of this seventh month there shall be the Feast of Booths^a to the LORD, [to last] seven days. ³⁵The first day shall be a sacred occasion: you shall not work at your occupations; ³⁶seven days you shall bring offerings by fire to the LORD. On the eighth day you shall observe a sacred occasion and bring an offering by fire to the LORD; it is a solemn gathering;^b you shall not work at your occupations.

³⁷Those are the set times of the LORD that you shall celebrate as sacred occasions, bringing offerings by fire to the LORD—burnt offerings, meal offerings, sacrifices, and libations, on each day what is proper to it—³⁸apart from the sabbaths of the LORD, and apart from your gifts and from all your votive offerings and from all your freewill offerings that you give to the LORD.

³⁹Mark, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when you have gathered in the yield of your land, you shall observe the festival of the LORD [to last] seven days: a complete rest on the first day, and a complete rest on the eighth day. ⁴⁰On the first day you shall take the product of hadar^c trees, branches of palm trees, boughs of leafy^d trees, and willows of the brook, and you shall rejoice before the LORD your God seven days. ⁴¹You shall observe it as a festival of the LORD for seven days in the year; you shall observe it in the seventh month as a law for all time, throughout the ages. ⁴²You shall live in booths seven days; all citizens in Israel shall live in booths, ⁴³in order that future generations may know that I made the Israelite

ify that the fall pilgrimage lasts for seven days (Exod. 23.16; 34.22) do not call it sukkot, whereas vv. 39 and 42, as well as Num. 29.12, refer to it as "the pilgrimage of the LORD"—the pilgrimage par excellence. Rabbinic tradition too called it simply "ḥag." 36: On the eighth day: As distinct from the "matzot" observance, the concluding holy day is added to the first seven. Apparently, the pilgrimage is to last seven days, while on the eighth day, not called a "ḥag" but simply a "sacred occasion," a cessation from labor is to be observed by all—those who do not make the pilgrimage, those who do so but return home for the eighth day, and those who remain an additional day. The eighth day is unknown outside of the Priestly tradition. A solemn gathering, Heb. "atzeret" (see Isa. 1.13; Joel 2.15; Amos 5.21; etc); this day is therefore later called "shemini 'atzeret," "the solemn gathering of the eighth [day]." In Deut. 16.8 "atzeret" is used for the solemnities on the final day of the "matzot" festival. Both apparently refer to local festive gatherings, as distinct from the pilgrimage to the Temple-city denoted by the word "ḥag." 37–38: A summary caption. 38: Apart from the sabbaths of the LORD: The Sabbath law in v. 3 was not originally part of the ch; see v. 4 n. 39–43: The closing section repeats the date and length of the pilgrimage, and the cessation of labor on the first and eighth days. Here, however, in place of the refrain "you shall offer food gifts to the LORD" are the additional observances of the festival. Since these are not sacrificial rites performed by the priests but are rather observed by the public at large, during their week-long visit to the Temple-city, they are not included in what comes before the caption in vv. 37–38. 39: Observe the festival, lit. "make a pilgrimage"; see v. 6. 40: The "taking" of the four species of branches and boughs is evidently a ritual of joyous acknowledgment of the current year's agricultural abundance. It may also have been a form of supplication for the next year's rainfall, expected to begin at this period of the year; in later times it was so interpreted. In Neh. 8.14–15 the branches were used for the construction of the booths, while according to rabbinic practice, they were gathered together in a bouquet and waved. Product, Heb. "peri," "fruit"; possibly also boughs or branches. Of hadar trees, lit. "majestic" or beautiful trees (see translators' note c). Though no specific identification can be determined, ancient tradition (b. Sukkah 31a) ruled that the fruit of the citron (the "etrog") is to be used. Boughs of leafy trees, traditionally, the myrtle. You shall rejoice, mentioned only here, a stark contrast to Deuteronomy, where rejoicing on the pilgrimages is mentioned several times (Deut. 16.11, 14, 15). 41: As a festival, "as a pilgrimage"; see v. 6. 43–44: Dwelling in booths for the seven days of the pilgrimage is here prescribed as a requirement, incumbent upon the entire population. The rationale differs from the people live in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt, I the LORD your God.

⁴So Moses declared to the Israelites the set times of the LORD.

24 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying:
²Command the Israelite people to bring you clear oil of beaten olives for lighting, for kindling lamps regularly. ³Aaron shall set them up in the Tent of Meeting outside the curtain of the Pact [to burn] from evening to morning before the LORD regularly; it is a law for all time throughout the ages. ⁴He shall set up the lamps on the pure^a lampstand before the LORD [to burn] regularly.

¹⁰There came out among the Israelites one whose mother was Israelite and whose father was Egyptian. And a fight broke out in the camp between that half-Israelite^c one suggested above (see v. 34 n.) and is obscure. It is an attempt to historicize the central observance of the pilgrimage, suggesting that it commemorates the period of dwelling in the presence of the LORD's abode, the Tabernacle, in the wilderness. The notion that God housed the Israelites in booths in the wilderness is not attested elsewhere.

24.1–9: Oil and loaves. A divine speech containing two laws. The first law (vv. 2–4), instructions for the oil for the Tabernacle lampstand, is almost a repetition of Exod. 27.20–21; the second (vv. 5–9), the procedure for the loaves to be displayed on the table in the Tabernacle, completes the legislation of Exod. 25.23–30. Both laws pertain to the ritual acts performed by the high priest regularly, inside the Tabernacle, and constituting a perpetual (Heb "tamid") display of worship. The daily lighting and tending of the lampstand is also mentioned in Exod. 30.7–8, in the context of the high priest's incense offering, the third component of the ritual complex. The laws relating to daily Tabernacle routine may supplement the preceding ch, which details the calendar of perpetually recurring special occasions.

2–3: See Exod. 27.20–21. 4: The instructions for fashioning the Tabernacle lampstand ("menorah") in Exod. 25.31–40 do not explain how the lampstand is to be used. The legislation here clarifies the command to have light burn from evening to morning in the Tabernacle (Exod. 27.20–21). The pure lampstand, an ellipsis meaning "the lampstand made of pure gold"; see Exod. 25.31, 39; 31.8; 37.17; 39.37; Num. 8.4. 5–9: The twelve loaves, known as the "show bread" or "Bread of Presence," are a symbolic offering, displayed but not sacrificed. They represent the twelve tribes of Israel and suggest dramatically their constant devotion to the deity enthroned in their midst. In the Priestly Tabernacle, the deity is enshrined in the inner sanctum, but the furnishings and the acts of devotion performed upon them all belong to the outer sanctum, and the partition dividing the two realms is never breached. Thus God, even as His Presence dwells among the Israelites, is perceived as separate from them and noncorporeal. The pure table, i.e., "the table overlaid with pure gold"; see Exod. 25.24; 37.11. 7, 9: Offering(s) by fire, better, "food gifts" (see 1.9 n.) 8: Every sabbath day: The weekday morning entry of the high priest into the Tabernacle consisted of offering incense and tending the lampstand; on the Sabbath, the removal and replacement of the twelve display loaves is added. 9: The loaves, having absorbed permanent, contagious sanctity from their close contact with the deity's Presence, can neither be discarded nor eaten by the laity. Conceptually, the loaves are a gift made by the Israelite people to the LORD, who gives it to the priests in recognition of their service (see 6.10–11).

24.10–23: The blasphemer. The report of an extraneous event interrupts the giving of the laws. A similar interruption is found in ch 10. In both cases, the resolution of the unforeseen situation requires direct divine intervention, and both times this leads to a brief legal discussion arising from the events (10.12–19; 24.17–22). Most significantly, both passages tell of flagrant crimes committed by individual Israelites in violation of the and a certain Israelite. ¹¹The son of the Israelite woman pronounced the Name in blasphemy, and he was brought to Moses—now his mother’s name was Shelomith daughter of Dibri of the tribe of Dan—¹²and he was placed in custody, until the decision of the LORD should be made clear to them.

¹³And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁴Take the blasphemer outside the camp; and let all who were within hearing lay their hands upon his head, and let the whole community stone him.

¹⁵And to the Israelite people speak thus: Anyone who blasphemes his God shall bear his guilt; ¹⁶if he also pronounces the name LORD, he shall be put to death. The whole community shall stone him; stranger or citizen, if he has thus pronounced the Name, he shall be put to death.

¹⁷If anyone kills any human being, he shall be put to death. ¹⁸One who kills a beast shall make restitution for it:

divinely imposed order established in the preceding chs: the crime of Nadab and Abihu against the indwelling deity, and the crime of the blasphemer against the sacred Name. Thus, both strata of the Priestly work, P and H (see ch 17), tell of a primal sin occurring shortly after the revelation of God, upsetting what should have been an untroubled relationship between God and His people and necessitating immediate action. The motif is also found in the non-Priestly tradition (Exod. 32–34; Deut. 9–10). 10: Half-Israelite: The case was initially puzzling because of the blasphemer’s mixed ancestry, but v. 16 renders the decision that both Israelites (citizens) and resident aliens were equally liable for blasphemy. 11: Pronounced the Name in blasphemy: Merely uttering $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$ is not a crime in P; throughout the Bible this is a normal and even commendable action. Nor is uttering God’s name in falsehood or “in vain,” prohibited in the Decalogue (Exod. 20.7 || Deut. 5.11), a case of blasphemy. Blasphemy consists of cursing God (see Exod. 22.27; 1 Kings 21.10–13), that is, uttering an imprecation against Him in which His name is included (“May such-and-such befall $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$ ”). As the divine Name is the one sacred “object” that can be used, or misused, by anyone at any time (see 5.20–26 n.), it is only logical that in the Holiness Legislation this is a sacrilege par excellence. 12–13: The blasphemer is apprehended and held in custody until Moses seeks and receives oracular instruction from God (probably by means of the “urim” on Aaron’s breastplate; see Exod. 28.15, 30). Moses’ inability to render a decision before consulting God occurs three more times in P, in the accounts of the second Passover, the Sabbath wood-gatherer, and the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 9.1–14; 15.32–36; 27.1–11), and in all four cases the remedy for a specific circumstance becomes a permanent law applicable for future generations as well. 14: The laying-on of hands (see 16.21) transfers to the blasphemer the guilt that the listeners have incurred by hearing the desecration of the sacred Name. This guilt will be eradicated along with the offender, who is stoned as an expression of the community’s collective horror and its urgent need to be rid of the instrument of desecration. 15–16: The legal decision is now generalized for future use. 15: Blasphemes his God . . . also pronounces the name LORD, lit. “curses his God and pronounces the name of $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$ ”; thus, one who maligned

God or invoked evil upon Him without actually pronouncing the Tetragrammaton would be exempt from the death penalty, since no actual desecration of the sacred Name would have taken place.

16: Stranger or citizen, see 16.29. The logical counterpart to the “ger” or resident alien, familiar in the author’s own period, would have been a non-Israelite accompanying the Israelites in the wilderness. In the author’s mind such persons would have been the offspring of Israelite women and Egyptian men, conceived and born while still in Egypt (the non-Priestly tradition probably agrees; see Exod. 12.38). Such a person is cast in the central role of the narrative in order to establish the legal principle that the desecration of $\Upsilon\text{H}\text{V}\text{H}$ ’s name is a capital offense by definition, whether performed by an Israelite or a “ger.” The Bible’s principle of patrilineal descent would consider such a person Egyptian rather than Israelite. 17–22: This short collection of laws is parenthetical and the narrative flow of vv. 10–16 continues, and concludes, in v. 23. It has been inserted here in accord with H’s principle that laws pertaining to wrongs committed against one’s fellow are the stuff of divine commands only if they impinge on the realm of the sacred. This brief law collection has a simple theme: With regard to the talionic or measure-for-measure (“eye-for-eye”) rule in crimes and damages, the resident alien has precisely the same obligation as the citizen (v. 22). God’s laws of fairness and justice are to be observed throughout the land where His Presence, with the holiness it effuses, resides. Unlike the obligation to worship Him, which rests upon Israel alone, the obligation to make fair restitution applies wherever God’s Presence dwells. The similar statement in the law of the blasphemer (v. 16) accounts for the addition of this section here. 17: See Gen. 9.6; Num. 35.31–34; outside of P: Exod. 21.12. The laws of asylum for unintentional homicide are designed to circumvent the life for life. ¹⁹If anyone maims his fellow, as he has done so shall it be done to him: ²⁰fracture for fracture, eye for eye, tooth for tooth. The injury he inflicted on another shall be inflicted on him. ²¹One who kills a beast shall make restitution for it; but one who kills a human being shall be put to death. ²²You shall have one standard for stranger and citizen alike: for I the LORD am your God.

²³Moses spoke thus to the Israelites. And they took the blasphemer outside the camp and pelted him with stones. The Israelites did as the LORD had commanded Moses.

25 The LORD spoke to Moses on Mount Sinai: ²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

When you enter the land that I assign to you, the land shall observe a sabbath of the LORD. ³Six years you may sow your field and six years you may prune your vineyard and gather in the yield. ⁴But in the seventh year the land shall have a sabbath of complete rest, a sabbath of the LORD: you shall not sow your field or prune your vineyard. ⁵You shall not reap the aftergrowth of your harvest or gather the grapes of your untrimmed vines; it shall be a year of complete rest for the land. ⁶But you may eat whatever the land during its sabbath will produce—you, your male and female slaves, the hired and bound laborers who death penalty when it is patently unethical; see in P Num. 35.9–33. 18: Restitution can always be made for destruction of livestock; see Exod. 21.33–37. 19–20: On the law of talion, or “eye-for-eye” principle, for bodily harm, see Exod. 21.23–25, where monetary compensation equivalent to the damages is meant (see v. 22). Rabbinic law interprets our text and Deut. 19.21 in the same fashion, but from the formulation of v. 20 it would seem that in Leviticus the literal sense is intended. 21: The recapitulation indicates the end of the interpolated section and reemphasizes the legal distinction between human life and the life of animals. 23: The narrative resumes and concludes: The people carry out the instructions given to Moses in v. 14.

25.1–26.46. As the end of the first month of the second year after the exodus approaches (see Num 1.1), the law-giving at Sinai draws to a close. During the first three weeks of the second month, some additional laws will be communicated (see Num. chs 5, 6; 8.23–26; 9.1–14; 10.1–10), but most of what is presented as divine communication to Moses during that period will consist of instructions for the journey to commence on the twentieth of the month. Thus, chs 25 and 26 mark the final stage of the law-giving. This is evident from the content of 26.3–45 and stated explicitly in the concluding verse (26.46). (Ch 27 is chronologically displaced.) Chs 25 and 26 contain two integrally connected sections, the laws of the sabbatical and jubilee (25.1–26.2) and the speech of promise and threat (26.3–45). The theme of the first section is God’s ownership of the land of Israel and the Israelites’ status as hired tenants on His estate; the second details the wages promised to the tenants if they acquiesce in all the Landowner’s demands and the measures He will take if they do not, culminating, if necessary, in their being evicted from His property. By combining two speeches into one, the longest in Leviticus, with the legal section flowing directly into the concluding exhortation, the author establishes this connection.

25.1–55: Sabbatical and jubilee laws. 1: On Mount Sinai: Midrashic interpretation took this to mean that the divine speech recorded here was communicated to Moses during one of his visits to the top of the mountain. In P, however, Moses ascended Sinai only once, for the sole purpose of receiving the instructions for the Tabernacle and the priesthood. Thus here the words “behar sinay” mean “at (not on) Mount Sinai,” i.e., [in the Tabernacle which stood] at [the foot of] Mount Sinai; see 7.38. 2: Assign to you, correctly, “give you” as in 14.34. 2–7: The sabbatical year. The command to “release and abandon” the produce of the seventh year appears in Exod. 23.11; the purpose there is to allow the poor to gather and eat what the owner leaves behind. The year of release in Deuteronomy also highlights social concerns, but it pertains to the cancellation of debts rather than the produce of the land (Deut. 15.1–6). Here, uniquely, it is forbidden to work the land in the seventh year, while its produce may be gathered and eaten—by the landholder. In Priestly law the poor are provided for by other measures (19.9–10; 23.22). 2: A sabbath of the LORD: Only here is the seventh year called “shabbat of the LORD,” thus making it equivalent to the other appointed times and sacred occasions of the LORD (see ch 23). 4: Sabbath of complete rest, a sabbath of the LORD, similarly with regard to the weekly Sabbath and the Day of Atonement; see 23.32 n. 5: Aftergrowth, plants that spring up on their own, without deliberate sowing. 6: Normal, wholesale reaping and harvesting is not permitted; rather, the landholder may gather live with you,⁷ and your cattle and the beasts in your land may eat all its yield.

⁸You shall count off seven weeks of years—seven times seven years—so that the period of seven weeks of years gives you a total of forty-nine years. ⁹Then you shall sound the horn loud; in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month—the Day of Atonement—you shall have the horn sounded throughout your land ¹⁰and you shall hallow the fiftieth year. You shall proclaim release^a throughout the land for all its inhabitants. It shall be a jubilee^b for you: each of you shall return to his holding and each of you shall return to his family. ¹¹That fiftieth year shall be a jubilee for you: you shall not sow, neither shall you reap the aftergrowth or harvest the untrimmed vines, ¹²for it is a jubilee. It shall be holy to you: you may only eat the growth direct from the field.

¹³In this year of jubilee, each of you shall return to his holding. ¹⁴When you sell property to your neighbor,^c or as needed in order to feed his own household, and his livestock may graze. 8–22: The jubilee year. It is not known whether the jubilee was ever observed in actual practice. There is no mention of the jubilee in biblical history of First Temple times, and according to the Rabbis it was not observed in Second Temple times at all (b. Arak. 32 b). There are, however, indications that a fifty-year cycle was employed in the calendar in ancient times; traditions of calculating the jubilees survived beyond the biblical period. The primary law of the jubilee (vv. 8–13) introduces its frequency and onset, its inauguration, its sanctity, and its two central features: the land release and the release of indentured persons. This is followed by a brief section detailing the implications for the sale of real estate between jubilees (vv. 14–17). The law then promises prosperity and security as reward for faithful observance (vv. 18–19) and concludes by reassuring the uneasy that God will provide (vv. 20–22). 8: Weeks of years, lit. “sabbaths of years”; “shabbat” in the sense of “week” is common in later Heb. 9: The fiftieth year follows the seventh sabbatical (though rabbinic tradition records other views as well). Unlike the seventh year, which is called a “shabbat” but not referred to as holy, it is sacred. It is inaugurated in the seventh month since the autumnal New Year, which later became dominant in the Jewish calendar but has biblical roots, is the start of the agricultural cycle (see Exod. 23.16; 34.22). On the tenth day of the month—the Day of Atonement: Perhaps the tenth of the month was thought of, as it was in later times, as the conclusion of the New Year’s celebrations.

10: Release, Heb “deror”; see Isa. 61.1; Jer. 34.8; Ezek. 46.17. A related term is known from Mesopotamia, where it indicates the general release proclaimed occasionally by kings in order to create or restore economic stability. This second aspect of the jubilee, the release of indentured persons, is detailed in vv. 39–46. Jubilee: Ancient translators drew an artificial connection between Heb “yovel” and the similar sounding Latin “jubilate,” “shout for joy”; thus the English “jubilee” suggests the idea of jubilation not present in the Heb. Outside of the Priestly literature “yovel” indicates a ram (Josh. 6.4–6) or a ram’s horn (Exod. 19.13), and since the fiftieth year is inaugurated by the sounding of the ram’s horn (v. 9), some feel that this has given its name to the institution. But the word “shofar” rather than “yovel” is mentioned in v. 9, and throughout the ch (and in 27.17–24; Num. 36.4) is used to denote what takes place during the fiftieth year and not the manner in which the year is heralded. “Yovel” here seems to be derived from “y-b-l,” “bring” and to mean “sending forth, home-bringing” or simply liberation, as reflected in LXX and realized in the 12th century by Abraham Ibn Ezra. Each of you shall return to his holding: The basic postulate of the jubilee, from which the legislation in this ch (and that in 27.17–24; Num. 36.4) derives, is that once the Israelites have entered Canaan, the land is divided up (by lot, see Num. 33.54) in perpetuity. The land of Canaan is not the Israelites’ property, it is rather a “holding” (“ahuzah”; see 14.34; Gen. 17.8; 48.4; Deut. 32.49); so are the plots of land held by each tribe, clan, and family. Collectively and individually, these holdings are not theirs to buy, sell, and reapportion. The Israelites are mere leaseholders, tenants on the divine estate, and the holdings God has parceled out to them are inalienable. Though the ultimate effect of this far-reaching legislation may be social, the pervasive concern is religious, indeed theocentric. The jubilee, like the Sabbath and festivals, is an assertion of God’s exclusive proprietorship and dominion, designed to keep the Israelites constantly aware that they are His indentured servants (vv. 42, 55). Once again the law-giver expresses the idea that social legislation is included among God’s commands only insofar as it impinges on the sacred; see notes to chs 17–26, 18, 19; 24.17–22. 11: See vv. 5–6. Since the fiftieth year always follows a sabbatical year, a two-year cessation of agricultural buy any from your neighbor, you shall not wrong one another. ¹⁵In buying from your neighbor, you shall deduct only for the number of years since the jubilee; and in selling to you, he shall charge you only for the remaining crop years: ¹⁶the more such years, the higher the price you pay; the fewer such years, the lower the price; for what he is selling you is a number of harvests. ¹⁷Do not wrong one another, but fear your God; for I the LORD am your God.

¹⁸You shall observe My laws and faithfully keep My rules, that you may live upon the land in security; ¹⁹the land shall yield its fruit and you shall eat your fill, and you shall live upon it in security. ²⁰And should you ask, "What are we to eat in the seventh year, if we may neither sow nor gather in our crops?" ²¹I will ordain My blessing for you in the sixth year, so that it shall yield a crop sufficient for three years. ²²When you sow in the eighth year, you will still be eating old grain of that crop; you will be eating the old until the ninth year, until its crops come in.

²³But the land must not be sold beyond reclaim, for the land is Mine; you are but strangers resident with Me. ²⁴Throughout the land that you hold, you must provide for the redemption of the land.

²⁹If a man sells a dwelling house in a walled city, it may be redeemed until a year has elapsed since its sale; the redemption period shall be a year. ³⁰If it is not redeemed before a full year has elapsed, the house in the walled city activity is entailed. 14–17: Buying and selling of land in Canaan is actually a matter of leasing until the jubilee. 17: Wrong: i.e., cheat, by deceitfully inflating the price. But fear your God, see 19.14 n.; 25.36. 20: And should you ask: Though the issue should properly have arisen after v. 7, it applies even more urgently here; see below. 21–22: The people are told to trust in God and do as commanded. The promise given is most easily understood elliptically. Crops sown in the fall of the sixth year and reaped in the spring will suffice for (1) the remainder of that year and (2) the entire seventh year. In the fall of the eighth year new crops may be sown, so the grain from the sixth year will suffice until the spring of the eighth, two years altogether. And if the eighth year is a jubilee, the produce of the sixth year will last until (3) the spring of the ninth year, when the crops sown in the fall following the jubilee come in, a total of three years. 23–55: While the jubilee effects a general, universal release, throughout the years leading up to it society must provide for the restoration of property and liberty whenever possible; the jubilee is the last resort. The basic law stating this (vv. 23–24) is followed by a series of specific cases spelling out its specific ramifications. 23: But, better, "Furthermore"; that is, in addition to all of the above and prior to it. Strangers resident, see 16.29. 24: Redemption: In the Bible this term retains its literal, commercial sense, as in reclaiming a pawned item or mortgaged property. One who has lost his property or liberty must be enabled to regain it. This obligation is twofold: It devolves upon the buyer, who is required to allow the person in question to repurchase property or liberty, and upon the kinsmen of the person in question, who must assist if the means to do so do not suffice. Otherwise the jubilee, when it eventually arrives, effects the redemption by default. Speaking of God as Israel's "Redeemer" is thus a metaphor. Since Israel is God's near kinsman, when Israel is in distress it is God's veritable obligation to come to its aid and make whatever efforts are necessary in order to extricate it from its predicament. 25–28: An Israelite is forced to sell (i.e., lease) a portion of an ancestral heritage. Prior to the jubilee, the buyer must enable the seller, or a kinsman acting on the seller's behalf, to reclaim at a price calculated in view of the number of years remaining until the jubilee. But even if neither the seller nor the kinsmen can come up with the necessary cash, the sale remains in effect only until the jubilee. 29–34: The only exception to the above is the sale (i.e., lease) of strictly urban property. The seller and the kinsmen have but one year to come up with the redemption price; if they default, the sale is final. But even here, several exceptions are enumerated.

shall pass to the purchaser beyond reclaim throughout the ages; it shall not be released in the jubilee.³¹ But houses in villages that have no encircling walls shall be classed as open country: they may be redeemed, and they shall be released through the jubilee.³² As for the cities of the Levites, the houses in the cities they hold—the Levites shall forever have the right of redemption.^{33a} Such property as may be redeemed from the Levites—houses sold in a city they hold—shall be released through the jubilee; for the houses in the cities of the Levites are their holding among the Israelites.³⁴ But the unenclosed land about their cities cannot be sold, for that is their holding for all time.

³⁵If your kinsman, being in straits, comes under your authority, and you hold him as though a resident alien, let him live by your side:³⁶ do not exact from him advance or accrued interest,^b but fear your God. Let him live by your side as your kinsman.³⁷ Do not lend him your money at advance interest, or give him your food at accrued interest.³⁸ I the LORD am your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, to be your God.

³⁹If your kinsman under you continues in straits and must give himself over to you, do not subject him to the treatment of a slave.⁴⁰ He shall remain with you as a hired or bound laborer; he shall serve with you only until the jubilee year.⁴¹ Then he and his children with him shall be free of your authority; he shall go back to his family and return to his ancestral holding.—⁴²For they are My servants, whom I freed from the land of Egypt; they may not give themselves over into servitude.—⁴³You shall not rule over him ruthlessly; you shall fear your God.⁴⁴ Such male and female slaves as you may have—it is from the nations round about you that you may acquire male and female slaves.⁴⁵ You may also buy them from among the children

b I.e., interest deducted in advance, or interest added at the time of repayment.

35–37: According to the simplest interpretation, the impoverished Israelite may have no recourse but to enter the kinsman's household and become a dependent. The kinsman, however, is commanded to refrain from exacting interest on the sustenance provided, so that the poor relative may save enough to regain economic independence. The prohibition of interest, which outside of the Priestly law is universal

trast to the picture emerging from the non-Priestly law collections (see Exod. 21.2–11 n.; Deut. 15.12–18 n.), the Priestly legal tradition recognizes no Israelite slavery as such. What appears to be servitude is not; an Israelite forced to become indentured to another Israelite has the status of a hired laborer. Moreover, this servitude is temporary, and the option of remaining in slavery forever, available in the non-Priestly codes, is not provided. 39: Continues, not reflected in the Heb. The dependent relative, in a dire situation, may become a kinsman's indentured laborer even without the prior, dependent stage. 40: Only until the jubilee year: Logical, but not explicit, is the possibility that the indentured servant may save enough to redeem himself before the jubilee arrives or that his kinsmen may help him to do so. 41: This v. indicates that the servitude envisaged was subsequent to the sale of property. When the jubilee arrives, the servants are released from their servitude and their ancestral property is released from its buyers, so persons and lands are reunited. And his children with him: Here, in contrast to Exod. 21.3–4, even children born during the long years of servitude do not become the property of the employer. 42–43: Israelites, like landholdings in Canaan, are divine property; thus they are released in the jubilee. Israelites are servants of God alone: He took them out of Egypt not in order to make them free but to make them slaves—of His own. This idea has practical as well as theological implications: Indentured Israelites may not be exploited or treated with the harshness with which a master may legitimately treat actual slaves. 44–46: These vv. make clear that the Priestly law has no principled objection to slavery per se. Non-Israelites may be enslaved, and they and their progeny become the permanent property of their master. 44: The nations round about you: According to the picture of history envisaged by H, the land of Canaan itself will have of aliens resident among you, or from their families that are among you, whom they begot in your land. These shall become your property: ⁴⁶you may keep them as a possession for your children after you, for them to inherit as property for all time. Such you may treat as slaves. But as for your Israelite kinsmen, no one shall rule ruthlessly over the other.

⁴⁷If a resident alien among you has prospered, and your kinsman being in straits, comes under his authority and gives himself over to the resident alien among you, or to an offshoot of an alien's family, ⁴⁸he shall have the right of redemption even after he has given himself over. One of his kinsmen shall redeem him, ⁴⁹or his uncle or his uncle's son shall redeem him, or anyone of his family who is of his own flesh shall redeem him; or, if he prospers, he may redeem himself. ⁵⁰He shall compute with his purchaser the total from the year he gave himself over to him until the jubilee year; the price of his sale shall be applied to the number of years, as though it were for a term as a hired laborer under the other's authority. ⁵¹If many years remain, he shall pay back for his redemption in proportion to his purchase price; ⁵²and if few years remain until the jubilee year, he shall so compute: he shall make payment for his redemption according to the years involved. ⁵³He shall be under his authority as a laborer hired by the year; he shall not rule ruthlessly over him in your sight. ⁵⁴If he has not been redeemed in any of those ways, he and his children with him shall go free in the jubilee year. ⁵⁵For it is to Me that the Israelites are servants: they are My servants, whom I freed from the land of Egypt, I the LORD your God.

26 You shall not make idols for yourselves, or set up for yourselves carved images or pillars, or place figured^a stones in your land to worship upon, for I the LORD am your God. ²You shall keep My sabbaths and venerate My sanctuary, Mine, the LORD's.

been evacuated of its former inhabitants (see 18.24–30), so non-Israelite slaves can only be purchased from foreign nations. 47–54: The Israelite forced to sell (i.e., indenture) himself to a non-Israelite is entitled to redeem himself; moreover, the members of his immediate and even extended family are obligated to make every effort to redeem him if he cannot redeem himself. As with landholdings (see vv. 14–17), the redemption price depends on the number of years remaining until the jubilee, since at that time the Israelite will be released in any case. 47: Resident alien, see. 16.29. It is assumed that the "ger" must, and can be compelled to, comply with the law requiring Israelite self-redemption or the release of the Israelite when the jubilee arrives. An offshoot of an alien's family, mentioned only here, but clearly indicating that in the Priestly view the "ger" does not eventually become an Israelite by assimilation, much less by conversion (unknown in biblical times). Rather, though he and his descendants may dwell and prosper in the land of Israel, they retain their non-Israelite status. For P, the only Israelites are the biological descendants of Jacob. 54: He and his children with him, see v. 41. 55: Repeating the rationale of v. 42, pertinent here and serving to conclude the corpus of jubilee legislation.

1–2: The ch division misinterprets these two vv. as the introduction to what follows, but they are in fact the conclusion to what precedes. They echo commands in ch 19; v. 1 elaborates on 19.4, and v. 2 repeats 19.30. They act as concluding refrains, expressing three of the basic concerns of the Holiness legislation and signaling the end of its body of laws. 3–45: The promise of reward and the threat of divine chastisement. By analogy to Deut. ch 28 and the treaty curses found in Mesopotamian texts, scholars generally refer to this section as the "blessings and curses" of the Holiness Legislation. But neither "bless" nor "curse" appears in the text, nor does the idea that these terms imply. 3–13: The reward for compliance: God will give the Israelites peace and prosperity, safety from wild beasts, population increase, and victory over their enemies. Further, He will give them the security that comes from the certain knowledge that all this is assured them. The aim of the exodus will be accomplished: Israel will become God's people, that is, His loyal servants; that the earth shall yield its produce and the trees of the field their fruit. ⁵Your threshing shall overtake the vintage, and your vintage shall overtake the sowing; you shall eat your fill of bread and dwell securely in your land.

⁶I will grant peace in the land, and you shall lie down untroubled by anyone; I will give the land respite from vicious beasts, and no sword shall cross your land. ⁷You shall give chase to your enemies, and they shall fall before you by the sword. ⁸Five of you shall give chase to a hundred, and a hundred of you shall give chase to ten thousand; your enemies shall fall before you by the sword.

⁹I will look with favor upon you, and make you fertile and multiply you; and I will maintain My covenant with you. ¹⁰You shall eat old grain long stored, and you shall have to clear out the old to make room for the new.

¹¹I will establish My abode in your midst, and I will not spurn you. ¹²I will be ever present in your midst: I will be your God, and you shall be My people. ¹³I the LORD am your God who brought you out from the land of the Egyptians to be their slaves no more, who broke the bars of your yoke and made you walk erect.

¹⁴But if you do not obey Me and do not observe all these commandments, ¹⁵if you reject My laws and spurn

He will take up residence in their midst, enshrined in the earthly abode which they will fashion for Him, and reign over them as their liege Lord. 3: If you follow My laws, all the laws that have been conveyed, from the beginning of Leviticus. 5: Threshing shall overtake the vintage, and your vintage shall overtake the sowing: There will be so much grain that threshing will continue into late summer, when the vines are picked; this will continue until early spring when sowing begins. See Amos 9.13. 9: Maintain My covenant: In P this means “uphold My promise.” In Priestly tradition the covenant is the commitment made by God to Abraham (Gen. 17.4–8) and repeated to Moses (Exod. 6.2–8): to make Israel numerous and to give them the land of Canaan as a hereditary holding (see 25.10 n.). 11: Spurn, see v. 15. 13: To be their slaves no more, for the implication, see 25.42, 55. Broke the bars:

Though God’s purpose in bringing Israel out of Egyptian slavery was to make them His own slaves, in the course of doing so He did indeed break their yoke and enable them to walk erect. The point is to remind them what He is capable of doing for them if they comply with His wishes. 14–45: The results of noncompliance. As in Deut. ch 28, considerably more space is given to the threats than the promises; but in direct contrast to Deut. 11.13–17 (recited daily as part of the Shema) and 28.15–68, the disasters threatened here are not punishments. Rather they are warnings arranged as a series of successive attempts to discipline the Israelites, that is, to force them into obedience. Each stage demonstrates an example of the sort of deadly disaster God may let loose upon them if they persist in their refusal to obey. Even the final stage, though it includes the element of vengeance and seems at first to be aimed at bringing Israel’s national existence to an end (as in Deuteronomy), is finally revealed to be yet another attempt at making Israel walk the straight and narrow. This stage, entailing destruction and exile, will culminate in Israel’s remorse; when this occurs God will remember His covenant and try once again to implement His plan of abiding in their midst and ruling over them. The effect of this diatribe is complex. On the one hand, it rains down upon the listener an unending barrage of fire and brimstone. The very contemplation of the horrors described forces the individual to consider the consequences of acting against the will of a God so uncompromising and so powerful. On the other hand, it casts God not in the role of the petty tyrant exacting retaliation for each infringement but rather as the undeterred ruler, patient but far from passive, who realizes that He may not achieve His end immediately and that severe measures may be necessary. God is pictured here as compelled to give repeated second chances, since He is bound and determined to have His way and cannot simply give up. In Priestly thought, the covenant cannot ever become null and void. 15: Reject, spurn, lit. graphic expressions of distaste: “you will find disgusting and your throat will vomit up”; see vv. 11, 30, 43, 44. So that you do not observe all My commandments: This is not a gradual abandonment of God’s laws after a period during which they were obeyed (as in Deuteronomy), but rather an initial, wholesale rejection of the commandments and successive attempts by God to “try again” to beat Israel into submission. Thus it is incorrect to speak of repentance here, since repentance consists of the return to former righteousness. And you break My covenant: This seems inconsistent with the Priestly view that the covenant is God’s to keep (or break), not Israel’s; only in the non-Priestly tradition is the covenant thought to be mutual. Probably, as in Gen. 17.14, the idea is that by refusing

My rules, so that you do not observe all My commandments and you break My covenant, ¹⁶I in turn will do this to you: I will wreak misery upon you—^aconsumption and fever, which cause the eyes to pine and the body to languish; you shall sow your seed to no purpose, for your enemies shall eat it. ¹⁷I will set My face against you: you shall be routed by your enemies, and your foes shall dominate you. You shall flee though none pursues.

¹⁸And if, for all that, you do not obey Me, I will go on to discipline you sevenfold for your sins, ¹⁹and I will break your proud glory. I will make your skies like iron and your earth like copper, ²⁰so that your strength shall be spent to no purpose. Your land shall not yield its produce, nor shall the trees of the land yield their fruit.

²¹And if you remain hostile toward Me and refuse to obey Me, I will go on smiting you sevenfold for your sins. ²²I will loose wild beasts against you, and they shall bereave you of your children and wipe out your cattle. They shall decimate you, and your roads shall be deserted.

²³And if these things fail to discipline you for Me, and you remain hostile to Me, ²⁴I too will remain hostile to you: I in turn will smite you sevenfold for your sins. ²⁵I will bring a sword against you to wreak vengeance for the covenant; and if you withdraw into your cities, I will send pestilence among you, and you shall be delivered into enemy hands. ²⁶When I break your staff of bread, ten women shall bake your bread in a single oven; they shall dole out your bread by weight, and though you eat, you shall not be satisfied.

²⁷But if, despite this, you disobey Me and remain hostile to Me, ²⁸I will act against you in wrathful hostility; I, for My part, will discipline you sevenfold for your sins. ²⁹You shall eat the flesh of your sons and the flesh of your daughters. ³⁰I will destroy your cult places and cut down your incense stands, and I will heap your carcasses upon your lifeless fetishes.

I will spurn you. ³¹I will lay your cities in ruin and make your sanctuaries desolate, and I will not savor your pleasing odors. ³²I will make the land desolate, so that your enemies who settle in it shall be appalled by it.

a Precise nature of these ills is uncertain.

to obey God's commands the Israelites move God to abrogate His promise. 16–17: The first attempt. An onslaught of diseases, followed by enemy incursions upon Israel's territory and despoilation of her crops. The fear instilled by the occupier's force will become so all-pervasive that the Israelites will "flee though none pursues."

16: Misery, better: "shock."

18–20: The second attempt. If the measures described do not succeed, they will be followed by the withholding of rain and the resultant crop failure. 18: Sevenfold for your sins, an expression signifying the maximum punishment.

21–22: The third attempt; the reverse of v. 6. Wild beasts are one of God's four weapons of destruction in Ezek. 14.12–23. 23: Hostile, uncertain; it should probably be understood to mean something like "uncaring, indifferent"; see v. 24.

23–26: Sword, pestilence, and famine, the three other divine judgments mentioned in Ezek. ch 14. Typically all three occur together, the latter two being the horrible results of the siege brought about by the former. Yet they are three separate phenomena, bringing the total number of measures employed by God to pressure His people into compliance to seven, commonly used in biblical literature to express completeness. 24: I too will remain hostile to you: He will treat them as they have treated Him. The mutuality is telling: God requires Israel's obedience the same way that they require His providence and kindness; if they withhold what He demands, He will do likewise. 26: Staff of bread, what one leans upon in order to remain erect; see Isa. 3.1. 27–33: The final blow. The enemy's siege of Israel's towns will culminate in the worst of its horrors, cannibalism resulting from dire famine (a trope in accounts of siege). It will end with the utter destruction of the towns, followed by desolation of the land and the dispersion of the population. 28: Wrathful hostility, see v. 21.

30: The invading enemy will destroy all the local shrines and cultic objects in its path, the very existence of which is a symptom of Israel's widespread, ongoing insubordination. The image of heaping the carcasses of slaughtered Israelites upon the lifeless idols of the false deities they worshipped is a particularly ironic instance of poetic justice. I will spurn you: The translation makes this the beginning of a new thought, but this is not warranted. For the meaning of the phrase see v. 15 n. 31: Sanctuaries: The existence of multiple local ³⁴Then shall the land make up for its sabbath years throughout the time that it is desolate and you are in the land of your enemies; then shall the land rest and make up for its sabbath years. ³⁵Throughout the time that it is desolate, it shall observe the rest that it did not observe in your sabbath years while you were dwelling upon it. ³⁶As for those of you who survive, I will cast a faintness into their hearts in the land of their enemies. You shall not be able to stand your ground before your enemies, ³⁸but shall perish among the nations; and the land of your enemies shall consume you.

³⁹Those of you who survive shall be heartsick over their iniquity in the land of your enemies; more, they shall be heartsick over the iniquities of their fathers; ⁴⁰and they shall confess their iniquity and the iniquity of their fathers, in that they trespassed against Me, yea, were hostile to Me. ⁴¹When I, in turn, have been hostile to them and have removed them into the land of their enemies, then at last shall their obdurate^a heart humble itself, and they shall atone for their iniquity. ⁴²Then will I remember My covenant with Jacob; I will remember also My covenant with Isaac, and also My covenant with Abraham; and I will remember the land.

sanctuaries is another manifestation of Israel's chronic disobedience. See 17.8–9 n. 33: And I will unsheath the sword against you, "after you," as you go into exile. Your land shall become a desolation and your cities a ruin. The enemies who will have by then settled in their land (v. 32) are not pictured as rebuilding it. 34–35: Israel's sustained failure to obey God's commands will necessarily have included the repeated nonobservance of the sabbatical year (25.2–7). But when Israel goes into exile and its land is deserted with none to work it, it will have a permanent "sabbath" and be repaid the rest it was denied. Rabbinic tradition interpreted these vv. more literally, viewing restitution for the land's missed sabbaths as the actual purpose of the exile and taking the sin of ignoring the sabbatical year as its specific cause. The plain sense of the text does not imply this, however. In contrast to the Deuteronomic doctrine that Israel's demise will have a particular cause, the worship of foreign deities, this ch insists that it is the nonobservance of the totality of the commandments that will bring about the horrible fate described. 36–38: After focusing momentarily on the land, the speaker now returns to the fate of the dispersed former inhabitants, not all of whom will survive the enemy assault. They will be persecuted by their captors and consumed by fear of dangers real and imagined; finally they will simply cease to exist. 39: Those of you who survive: The repetition of the phrase (see v. 36) indicates that only a fraction of those who survive to go into exile will also survive the tribulations of the exile itself. After a few generations, hardly any will be left even of these. Be heartsick over, correctly, "will rot away because of," become fewer and fewer with the passage of time. The repeated refusal of earlier generations to obey God's commands will be the cause of the misery of later ones.

40–42: At last, the remaining survivors will consider the cause of what has happened, will realize it was their own (and their ancestors' own) obduracy that caused their plight, and God will respond appropriately. Confess: It is not the ceremonial, ritual confession that accompanies sacrificial atonement (as in 16.21; Num. 5.7) that is predicted; in their exilic condition the remnant of the Israelite people will simply acknowledge their guilt and that of their ancestors, and this contrition will suffice.

41: Obdurate heart, lit. "uncircumcised heart." Atone for, better, "make full restitution for." When they finally take upon themselves the commitment to comply with God's demands, the slate will be wiped clean of the accumulated guilt. 42: Then will I remember My covenant: This event, to take place at some future time, is a fitting conclusion to the Priestly history of the nation of Israel, which begins when God hears Israel's cry in bondage and is moved to remember His covenant (Exod. 6.5). In the predicted future, He will hear not their cry of misery but their confession of guilt; recalling His promise to the patriarchs, He will try again to implement His plan. Jacob . . . Isaac . . . Abraham: The inverted order may express the gradual motion of God's recollection backwards in history. In P, God gives His promise to Abraham in Gen. 17.4–8 and reiterates

⁴³For the land shall be forsaken of them, making up for its sabbath years by being desolate of them, while they atone for their iniquity; for the abundant reason that they rejected My rules and spurned My laws. ⁴⁴Yet, even then, when they are in the land of their enemies, I will not reject them or spurn them so as to destroy them, annulling My covenant with them: for I the LORD am their God. ⁴⁵I will remember in their favor the covenant with the ancients, whom I freed from the land of Egypt in the sight of the nations to be their God: I, the LORD.

27 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying:
²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them: When anyone explicitly^a vows to the LORD the equivalent for a human being, ³the following scale shall apply: If it is a male from twenty to sixty years of age, the equivalent is fifty shekels of silver by the sanctuary weight; ⁴if it is a female, the equivalent is thirty shekels. ⁵If the age is from five years to twenty years, the equivalent is twenty shekels for a male and ten shekels for a female. ⁶If the age is from one month to five years, the equivalent for a male is five shekels of silver, and the equivalent for a female is three shekels of silver. ⁷If the age is sixty years or over, the equivalent is fifteen shekels in the case of a male and ten shekels for a female. ⁸But if one cannot afford the equivalent, he shall be presented before the priest, and the priest shall assess him; the priest shall assess him according to what the vower can afford.

it to Jacob in Gen. 35.11–12. No surviving P text tells of His repeating it to Isaac, but Isaac passes it on to Jacob (Gen. 28.1–4). 43: Eloquently elaborating on the end of v. 42, the v. describes God thinking of His abandoned estate. 45: The covenant with the ancients, whom I freed from the land of Egypt: Nowhere in P is God explicitly said to have made a covenant with the generation of the exodus. The reference is not to the Sinai events, as these are not called a covenant in P. The promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was, however, communicated to the generation of the exodus as well, by Moses; see Exod. 6.6–9. I, the LORD, better, “I am the LORD”; cf. 18.2; ch 19. 46: The caption to the Priestly account of the law-giving in the Tabernacle; cf. 7.37–38; see 25.1. On Mount Sinai, see 25.1.

27.1–34: Monetary and other dedications. The laws in this ch prescribe how monetary and other dedications are made to the sanctuary, the values or method for determining them, and whether or not such dedications may be redeemed. If the dedication is of land or property, the effect of the jubilee release on its value is prescribed. Objects that belong intrinsically to God and those that have been irrevocably consecrated cannot be dedicated; in the case of tithes, however, redemption is possible. Voluntary contributions might be made by anyone, at any time, as spontaneous acts of devotion. Besides constituting the most important source of revenue for the Temple, they allowed individual Israelites to achieve a sense that the regimen of public worship performed by the priests was being conducted on their behalf. The placement of this ch after the concluding caption in 26.46 can be explained on literary grounds. Since a section of the ch (vv. 16–24) is dependent upon the laws of land tenure, it would have been unclear if it had been placed before ch 25. On the other hand, placing this ch between chs 25 and 26 would have interrupted their thematic continuity. Wishing to keep distinct topics of legislation separate and at the same time to make the laws as intelligible as possible, the author occasionally saw the need to stray somewhat from the order in which he imagined the laws were conveyed to Moses, taking care not to hide this from the reader (see also 16.1 n.). 2–8: A vow to dedicate the value of a human being. The person wishes to make a significant monetary contribution to the upkeep of the sanctuary. Through the procedure described, a purely fiscal transaction takes on the character of the ultimate act of devotion, that of consecrating oneself or a member of one’s household to the LORD. Thus biblical religion preserves vicariously the notion of self-consecration without requiring one actually to sacrifice oneself. 3–7: The scale is evidently based on size and strength, and thus on potential productivity in terms of physical labor. It is not indicative of any social hierarchy. 8: If a poor person wishes to “dedicate” himself or a member of his family, the scale is flexible, in con-

⁹If [the vow concerns] any animal that may be brought as an offering to the LORD, any such that may be given to the LORD shall be holy. ¹⁰One may not exchange or substitute another for it, either good for bad, or bad for good; if one does substitute one animal for another, the thing vowed and its substitute shall both be holy. ¹¹If [the vow concerns] any unclean animal that may not be brought as an offering to the LORD, the animal shall be presented before the priest, ¹²and the priest shall assess it. Whether ^ahigh or low,^a whatever assessment is set by the priest shall stand; ¹³and if he wishes to redeem it, he must add one-fifth to its assessment.

¹⁴If anyone consecrates his house to the LORD, the priest shall assess it. Whether ^ahigh or low,^a as the priest assesses it, so it shall stand; ¹⁵and if he who has consecrated his house wishes to redeem it, he must add one-fifth to the sum at which it was assessed, and it shall be his.

¹⁶If anyone consecrates to the LORD any land that he holds, its assessment shall be in accordance with its seed requirement: fifty shekels of silver to a homer of barley seed. ¹⁷If he consecrates his land as of the jubilee year, its assessment stands. ¹⁸But if he consecrates his land after the jubilee, the priest shall compute the price according to the years that are left until the jubilee year, and its assessment shall be so reduced; ¹⁹and if he who consecrated the land wishes to redeem it, he must add one-fifth to the sum at which it was assessed, and it shall pass to him. ²⁰But if he does not redeem the land, and the land is sold to another, it shall no longer be redeemable: ²¹when it is released in the jubilee, the land shall be holy to the LORD, as land proscribed; it becomes the priest's holding.

9–13: Vows to donate animals. Animals are of two types: those fit for the altar (vv. 9–10) and those which may not be sacrificed (vv. 11–13). In the former category, once dedicated to the sanctuary, the pledged animal must be brought in fulfillment of the vow and may not be substituted, and the consequence of substitution is that both animals are dedicated. Animals in the latter category, since they cannot be sacrificed, can be dedicated only in order to be sold by the sanctuary for their monetary value. Unlike persons, animals must have their values fixed ad hoc by the priest. The consecration of an animal not fit for sacrifice may sound strange, but the aim of this system is to enable anyone to devote a portion of his wealth to the upkeep of the divine abode. A person whose wealth consists, say, of asses rather than of herds of sheep is thus not disenfranchised. 12–13: Whether high or low: The priest's assessment is final, i.e., it is valid for the outside buyer or for the donor if he wishes to redeem it; i.e., if, instead of donating the animal, he would prefer to make his contribution and also keep the animal, he may pay a 20 percent surcharge (compare 5.16, 24). This would apply also to persons wishing to extricate themselves from vows they regret having made. It is not clear whether this option exists for animals in both categories or only for nonsacrificial ones. 14–15: Similarly, one may choose to dedicate his house, that is, to donate it to the sanctuary for sale, or, if his primary intention is actually to make a monetary contribution in the amount of his home, he may effect this by dedicating the house and redeeming it for silver, adding 20 percent to the price that has been fixed. 16–24: Dedication of fields. These too may be donated for sale, the proceeds going to the sanctuary treasury, or the donor may redeem them at a 20 percent surcharge, with proper adjustment for the number of years remaining until the jubilee. 16: Any land that he holds, any portion of the land belonging to his ancestral holding. In accordance with its seed requirement: The sale price is thus a function of size, which is constant, whereas fixing it in accordance with how much it has produced in past years would be a function of divine blessing, which may change from one year, or from one owner, to the next. Fifty shekels of silver: Probably one shekel per year; maximally fifty, if the jubilee is 50 years away. A homer of barleyseed, a measure of seed equal to the normal load carried by an ass; see Ezek. 45.11. It was about 230 liters (a little more than 6.5 bushels). 17: Its assessment stands, see v. 12. 20–21: The original holder's right to reclaim his land expires when the Temple treasury has sold it to another or when the jubilee arrives, whichever comes first. When it is released in the jubilee, in the former case. If not sold to another person, it remains the property of the Temple. The land shall be holy to the LORD: Since the whole point of the jubilee is that the land is the LORD's property, land that has been dedicated to the LORD obviously remains His when the next jubilee comes, the proprietorship which is not land of his holding, ²³ the priest shall compute for him the proportionate assessment up to the jubilee year, and he shall pay the assessment as of that day, a sacred donation to the LORD. ²⁴ In the jubilee year the land shall revert to him from whom it was bought, whose holding the land is. ²⁵ All assessments shall be by the sanctuary weight, the shekel being twenty gerahs.

²⁶ A firstling of animals, however, which—as a firstling—is the LORD’s, cannot be consecrated by anybody; whether ox or sheep, it is the LORD’s. ²⁷ But if it is of unclean animals, it may be ransomed as its assessment, with one-fifth added; if it is not redeemed, it shall be sold at its assessment.

²⁸ But of all that anyone owns, be it man or beast or land of his holding, nothing that he has proscribed for the LORD may be sold or redeemed; every proscribed thing is totally consecrated to the LORD. ²⁹ No human being who has been proscribed can be ransomed: he shall be put to death.

³⁰ All tithes from the land, whether seed from the ground or fruit from the tree, are the LORD’s; they are holy to the LORD. ³¹ If anyone wishes to redeem any of his tithes, he must add one-fifth to them. ³² All tithes of the herd or flock—of all that passes under the shepherd’s passing to the priests. As land proscribed, see vv. 28–29. 22–24: Dedication of purchased fields, i.e., lands that will revert to their original owners at the jubilee. The donor is not donating something of his own, and he does not have the option of transferring ownership to the sanctuary for sale to a third party. Purchased fields thus, like humans (vv. 3–8), may be consecrated only by donating their monetary value, as assessed by the priest, and in the jubilee they revert to their original owner.

25: All assessments: This applies to all of the preceding legislation. The sanctuary weight, better: the sacred shekel, i.e., the official shekel in use in the sanctuary treasury (about 11.5 grams, less than half an ounce). Twenty gerahs, see Exod. 30.13; Num. 3.47; 18.16.

26–33: A set of restrictions on the above: objects that cannot be consecrated to the LORD since they belong to Him already. 26–27: A firstling of livestock may not be dedicated, as it belongs to the LORD by definition (see Exod. 13.2; 22.28–29; 34.19; Num. 3.40 ff.; Deut. 15.19–20). Firstlings of the flock and herd must be sacrificed and cannot be redeemed; firstlings of nonsacrificial animals may be redeemed or sold. The law here differs from the non-Priestly regulation in Exod. 13.13; 34.20, according to which impure animals must be exchanged for a lamb or destroyed. 27: Ransomed, Heb “padah,” usually synonymous with “ga’al,” “redeem.” Since they are the property of God, the person is not regaining ownership of them but gaining it for the first time. 28–29: The second restriction: proscribed things (Heb “herem”). This term is used outside of the Priestly writings for those condemned to destruction, such as defeated military enemies, those guilty of idolatry, and persons who fail to comply with the terms of a communal oath (the so-called “ban”) requiring all to “do or die.” It refers also to the spoils confiscated from those so condemned, consisting of animals, which were also destroyed, and inanimate objects, which were probably reserved for the sanctuary. Such items are “off-limits” and their taboo nature is contagious. Further, this destruction or confiscation of spoils is said to be for the LORD. This indicates that the obligation to condemn, destroy, and despoil is a divinely sanctioned one, and implies that the destroyed persons and animals are, like the silver and gold confiscated for the sanctuary, a form of offering to God. This passage seems to mean another type of “herem”: the “proscribing” by an individual (rather than by the community or God) of an object by pledging that no use would ever be made of it and that it would become the permanent property of the LORD, with no option to sell, redeem, or exchange. 28: Be it man or beast, see next v. Totally consecrated, Heb “kodesh kodashim,” “most holy” (see also 2.3, etc.). Consistent with Priestly thought and law, such objects are here deemed to be sacred; since they have been made immutably so, they are called “most holy.” The use of the term is not entirely consistent with its use elsewhere. 29: The text shockingly says that one may sentence oneself, one’s slave, or a household member under one’s authority to death as a consecration to the LORD, and once this is done there is no reprieve or remedy. Commentators have interpreted the text differently, but there is little basis for this. 30–33: Tithes constitute the third and final restriction: They belong to God already and cannot be dedicated. 30–31: It is not clear whether this tithe, which belongs to the LORD, is in addition to the crop tithe assigned to the Levites in Num. 18.21ff. for their upkeep, or whether our ch views all crop tithes as a tax given to the central sanctuary. 32–33: A tithe of herds and flocks is not mentioned elsewhere in the Torah. According to 1 Sam. 8.15–17, kings are notorious for imposing such tithes as a staff, every tenth one—shall be holy to the LORD. ³³He must not look out for good as against bad, or make substitution for it. If he does make substitution for it, then it and its substitute shall both be holy: it cannot be redeemed.

form of taxation. 33: He must not look out for good as against bad: He must offer the tenth sheep to pass under the staff, without regard to its size or quality. Make substitution, see vv. 9–13 n. 34: The caption of 26.46 is repeated in abbreviated form; see 27.1–34 n. On Mount Sinai, explained at 7.38; 25.1.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE TORAH, Numbers, recounts memorable events of the Israelite wanderings from Sinai, God's mountain, to the plains of Moab, just opposite the promised land. Thus, Numbers continues the story begun in Exodus and continued in Leviticus of the escape from Egyptian servitude, the desert journey to Mount Sinai, the revelation at Sinai and giving of the law, and the building of the Tabernacle with instruction on its operation. The Hebrew name of this book, Bemidbar, "in the wilderness [of Sinai]," taken from the fifth Hebrew word in chapter 1, reflects this theme. In contrast, the English name, Numbers, derives from the Greek translation, the Septuagint, which titled the book after the censuses mentioned in the first four chapters. This Greek name reflects an earlier Hebrew name for the book, well-attested in classical rabbinic sources, from a period when books of the Torah were named thematically rather than after one of their initial words.

Numbers is a complex collection of texts containing an assortment of interwoven literary genres: historical narratives, legal texts, ritual prescriptions, and poetic folk traditions. Its final form reflects a long and intricate literary history. Modern critical scholarship—based on stylistic, linguistic, and contextual criteria—identifies separate sources underlying the final version of the book. (See essay "Modern Study of the Bible," pp. 2084–96.) Primarily, the texts derive from various layers of the Priestly school (P), with additional texts from the two older narrative sources, the Yahwist (J) and Elohist (E). The predominant Priestly material often functions to expand, supplement, or recast ideologically the earlier (JE) texts to fit the agenda of Priestly circles. The lengthy Balaam pericope (chs 22–24) in its entirety stands untouched by the Priestly writer and may represent the hand of yet another author(s), neither J, E, or P. Jewish tradition, on the other hand, views the seemingly disparate texts in Numbers as a single work written by Moses. Although critical scholarship does not recognize Mosaic authorship, it has begun to emphasize the merits of a holistic approach, one that studies the parts in the context of the whole.

The book of Numbers can easily be divided by subject and other criteria into several primary units; these can be further subdivided into smaller sections and subsections. It is, however, often difficult to determine the relationship between contiguous segments. Based on geographical criteria and ideological motifs, three major units can be distinguished, reflecting a literary sandwich of sorts: (1) the final encampment at Sinai and preparation to resume the wilderness trek (1.1–10.10); (2) the generation-long march in the desert from Sinai to Moab (10.11–22.1); (3) the encampment on the plains of Moab and preparation to enter Canaan (22.2–36.13). Unit one marks the period when Israel, with God's law in hand, readies itself for the desert march to its final destination. This is the first time that the people enter the wilderness while they are bonded by covenant to the LORD. The wanderings in the second unit form a bridge between the first and last units. The slave generation dies in the desert and a new generation matures. In unit three this new generation prepares to embark on a journey once more, this time to enter the promised land as a free-born national entity.

The Final Encampment at Sinai

THE THEME OF THIS UNIT (1.1–10.10) centers on the organization of the Israelite camp around the Tabernacle and the maintenance of cult purity within the camp, assuring God's presence in the Tabernacle. Thus the material is mainly prescriptive. The first section of the unit opens with a census of eligible military-age males and an election of tribal chieftains (1.1–46). A description of duties for the military-exempt Levites follows (1.47–54). Next is a diagram of the traveling tribal camp (2.1–34). Much space is devoted to the roles of the Levites, who are stationed closest to the Tabernacle, performing guard duty there, making sure that no non-priests approach the Tabernacle. Topics include the consecration of the Levites in place of first-born Israelites, two Levite censuses, and a detailed outline of the familial relationships of the Levitical clans and their duties (chs 3–4).

The next sections shift focus from camp organization to the maintenance of camp purity. Conditions for removal and readmission of persons who have become impure are delineated (parts of ch 5). Laws regarding Nazirite vows and the formula for the priestly blessing follow (ch 6). The next few sections focus again on the Tabernacle and its functionaries: the initiatory gifts brought by the tribal chieftains to the sanctuary (ch 7); the procedure for lighting the lampstand (menorah); and the purification of the Levites (ch 8). The last section of unit one (9.1–10.10) discusses the final preparations for departure from Sinai. Israel celebrates the first Passover in the wilderness, and Moses makes provisions for ritually impure persons to celebrate a second Passover one month later. Directives concerning the fire-cloud, to guide Israel's travels, and the silver trumpets, to herald movement of the camp divisions, conclude the unit.

The Generation-long March in the Desert from Sinai to Moab

THIS MIDDLE UNIT (10.11–22.1) is composed of narratives woven into a story line interspersed by sacrificial law, injunctions against certain transgressions, and expiation processes. A recurring cycle of murmuring and rebellion against the authority of God and Moses, by individuals or by the community as a whole, characterizes this unit. Even Miriam, Aaron, and Moses have moments of disloyalty to God. In certain cases, where rebellion by a few persons is contagious to the group or where it is enacted by the leadership, punishment is severe.

The unit opens with a description of the camp's departure (10.11–36) followed by a litany of grievances and their resolutions (11.1–35). After the first complaint God responds with deadly fire; Moses then successfully intercedes on Israel's behalf. This cycle repeats in one form or another. Eventually Moses appoints seventy elders to relieve his burden, but displays of disloyalty continue, even among the community leaders. Miriam and Aaron criticize Moses on account of his Cushite wife while ultimately protesting against his unique status as prophet (ch 12). The mood of rebellion intensifies in the spy episode (chs 13–14). Israel sides with the ten spies who declare Canaan unconquerable and ponder returning to Egypt, and God reacts by condemning the entire exodus generation to death in the wilderness. Soon thereafter a Levite named Korah and his followers stage a rebellion against Moses and Aaron (chs 16–17). Finally, in frustration, Moses and Aaron defy God (20.1–13). For their hubris God, in an unexpected decree, bars Moses and Aaron from entering the promised land.

Interspersed between these accounts of human infidelity and divine retribution are prescriptive passages detailing ordinances regarding sacrifices and purification (chs 15, 19), and the duties and privileges of priests and Levites (ch 18), including the commandment for Israelites to attach tzitzit (fringes) to their garments (15.37–41). At the end of unit two Israel emerges from the wilderness to face the peoples inhabiting Transjordan. Not surprisingly, the rulers of those small kingdoms deny Israel passage through their territory. Nevertheless, Israel moves ever closer to its final destination, and prevails in encounters with her enemies (20.14–21.35).

Encampment on the Plains of Moab and Preparation to Enter Canaan

UNIT THREE (22.2–36.13) finds the Israelites encamped on the eastern side of the Jordan opposite Jericho, their destination within visible reach. This unit, like the previous two, is composed of narrative and legal material; it also contains lengthy poetic folk traditions. The theme centers on the new Israelite community's final preparation to inherit the land of Canaan. As such, much of the legal material here focuses on inheritance.

The first section, composed of narrative and poetry, is the story of the Moabite king Balak and the prophet Balaam whom he hires to curse the Israelites (chs 22–24). God thwarts Balaam's mission, turning the intended curse into a blessing. Israel's apostasy at Baal-peor follows (25.1–18); the plague that God inflicts upon the sinners eliminates the last members of the exodus generation.

The opening of chapter 26 is an alternate juncture for the end of unit two and the beginning of unit three. With the demise of the older generation and the crossing into Canaan imminent, Moses conducts a second census and apports the land to the tribes (ch 26). The Levitical clans, who are not allotted landholdings, are counted separately. Arising from the process of apportioning land is the special case of Zelophehad's daughters, who petition for the right of women to inherit when there are no male heirs (27.1–11). That case is followed by the succession of Joshua (27.12–23). Next is an insertion of ritual prescriptions establishing the cultic calendar and governing the daily, new moon, Sabbath, and festival offerings (28.1–30.1). The section ends with a discussion on the annulment of vows and oaths. Following a statement that men are bound by their vows and oaths comes a list of conditions under which women's vows can be annulled (30.2–17). The narrative resumes with a war against the Midianites, allegedly in retaliation for their seduction of the Israelites at Baal-peor (ch 31).

Having routed her enemies in Transjordan, Israel begins the settlement process. The tribes of Reuben and Gad ask to receive a portion of land on the eastern side of the Jordan (ch 32). Part of the tribe of Manasseh settles there as well. A summary of the wilderness itinerary that highlights key events follows (33.1–49). The next narrative section continues where the previous one left off (32.42); having appropriated land to two and a half tribes in Transjordan, Moses reformulates the division of Canaan among the remaining nine and a half tribes (33.50–35.8). As part of the process, he defines the boundaries of Canaan and assigns Levitical towns in place of tribal land for Levites.

Unit three ends with several final prescriptions (35.9–36.13). Moses designates six cities of refuge, three of which are across the Jordan River, in the land about to be conquered; furthermore he distinguishes between involuntary and deliberate homicide. The last section outlines marriage regulations for female heirs, using the case of Zelophehad's daughters as a model. The issue of land inheritance projects into the future since it is significant only after the land of Israel is settled. The book of Numbers ends by stating that the precepts in this unit were enjoined upon the Israelites "on the steppes of Moab, at the Jordan near Jericho." This phrase forms an inclusio with the last phrase of the second unit (22.1), a transition between units two and three.

1 On the first day of the second month, in the second year following the exodus from the land of Egypt, the LORD spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the Tent of Meeting, saying:

²Take a census of the whole Israelite community by the clans of its ancestral houses, listing the names, every male, head by head. ³You and Aaron shall record them by their groups, from the age of twenty years up, all those in Israel who are able to bear arms. ⁴Associated with you shall be a man from each tribe, each one the head of his ancestral house.

⁵These are the names of the men who shall assist you:

- From Reuben, Elizur son of Shedeur.
- 6 From Simeon, Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai.
- 7 From Judah, Nahshon son of Amminadab.
- 8 From Issachar, Nethanel son of Zuar.
- 9 From Zebulun, Eliab son of Helon.

1.1–46: First Israelite census and appointment of tribal chieftains: Numbers opens with the Israelites still encamped at the base of Mt. Sinai (1.1–10.10). They already have received the laws, constructed the portable Tabernacle, and been instructed on formal worship procedures and regulated observances both for priests and lay persons (Exod. chs 20–31; 34–40; Lev. chs 1–27). Now they must be organized into a mobile war camp to resume their travels in the wilderness and in readiness to meet any foes along the way. Ch 1 begins with a census. 2: The purpose of a census is to determine military strength or potential taxation revenues (cf. 2 Sam. ch 24), though later Jewish interpretation suggests that God counts Israel because they are dear to Him (see Rashi). All males 20 years and older are eligible for military duty, and tribal chieftains who function as census supervisors are appointed, one from each tribe. A separate census is taken of the Levites who are exempt from military service (ch 3; 26.57–62). 5–15: Heading the list of chieftains is the representative of Reuben, Jacob's first-born son, though elsewhere in Numbers, Judah is typically listed first. The other sons follow Reuben in chronological order of birth with Leah's sons first, Rachel's second, and the concubines' last. None of the names on the list contains a theophoric element, that is, an element with the name of God as prefix ("yeho-" or "yo-") or suffix ("-yahu" or "-yah"). In the latter period of the monarchy such names are commonplace (e.g., Jehoiada, Zechariah). 20–46: The census figures for each tribe, with a grand total of 603,550, are vastly inflated by any realistic standards. The final tally, however, is generally consistent in the biblical literature (cf. Exod. 12.37; 38.26; Num. 11.21; 26.51). Earlier biblical scholars posited that this number reflected a census at a later period, perhaps under David, but this is incorrect. 27: Judah has the largest number, reflecting its later importance.

³⁶Of the descendants of Benjamin, the registration of the clans of their ancestral house, as listed by name, aged twenty years and over, all who were able to bear arms—³⁷ those enrolled from the tribe of Benjamin: 35,400.

³⁸Of the descendants of Dan, the registration of the clans of their ancestral house, as listed by name, aged twenty years and over, all who were able to bear arms—³⁹ those enrolled from the tribe of Dan: 62,700.

⁴⁴Those are the enrollments recorded by Moses and Aaron and by the chieftains of Israel, who were twelve in number, one man to each ancestral house. ⁴⁵All the Israelites, aged twenty years and over, enrolled by ancestral houses, all those in Israel who were able to bear arms—⁴⁶ all who were enrolled came to 603,550.

⁴⁷The Levites, however, were not recorded among them by their ancestral tribe. ⁴⁸For the LORD had spoken to Moses, saying: ⁴⁹Do not on any account enroll the tribe of Levi or take a census of them with the Israelites. ⁵⁰You shall put the Levites in charge of the Tabernacle of the Pact, all its furnishings, and everything that pertains to it: they shall carry the Tabernacle and all its furnishings, and they shall tend it; and they shall camp around the Tabernacle. ⁵¹When the Tabernacle is to be set out, the Levites shall take it down, and when the Tabernacle is to be pitched, the Levites shall set it up; any outsider who encroaches shall be put to death. ⁵²The Israelites shall encamp troop by troop, each man with his division and each under his standard. ⁵³The Levites, however, shall camp around the Tabernacle of the Pact, that wrath may not strike the Israelite community; the Levites shall stand guard around the Tabernacle of the Pact.

⁵⁴The Israelites did accordingly; just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so they did.

1.47-54: Levites are charged with the Tabernacle. This is part one of a lengthy, detailed outline of Levitical duties (continued in chs 3-4). Being exempt from military service, the Levites are charged with guarding the Tabernacle as well as dismantling it for travel and erecting it when encamped. As such, their position in the layout of the camp is closest to the Tabernacle. Rabbinic midrash (Num. Rab. 1.12) attributes their prestigious responsibilities to a reward they receive for remaining loyal to God by not having participated in the golden calf worship (Exod. 32.25-29).

2 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying: ²The Israelites shall camp each with his standard, under the banners of their ancestral house; they shall camp around the Tent of Meeting at a distance.

³Camped on the front, or east side: the standard of the division of Judah, troop by troop.

Chieftain of the Issacharites: Nethanel son of Zuar.

⁷ The tribe of Zebulun.

Chieftain of the Zebulunites: Eliab son of Helon. ⁸His troop, as enrolled: 57,400.

⁹The total enrolled in the division of Judah: 186,400, for all troops. These shall march first.

¹⁰On the south: the standard of the division of Reuben, troop by troop.

Chieftain of the Reubenites: Elizur son of Shedeur.

¹¹His troop, as enrolled: 46,500.

¹² Camping next to it:

The tribe of Simeon.

Chieftain of the Simeonites: Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ¹³His troop, as enrolled: 59,300.

Chieftain of the Gadites: Eliasaph son of Reuel.

¹⁵His troop, as enrolled: 45,650.

¹⁶The total enrolled in the division of Reuben: 151,450, for all troops. These shall march second.

¹⁷Then, midway between the divisions, the Tent of Meeting, the division of the Levites, shall move. As they camp, so they shall march, each in position, by their standards.

¹⁸On the west: the standard of the division of Ephraim, troop by troop.

Chieftain of the Ephraimites: Elishama son of Ammihud. ¹⁹His troop, as enrolled: 40,500.

²⁰ Next to it:

The tribe of Manasseh.

Chieftain of the Manassites: Gamaliel son of Pedahzur. ²¹His troop, as enrolled: 32,200.

Chieftain of the Benjaminites: Abidan son of Gideoni.

2.1–34: The plan of the camp.

The camp blueprint, according to God's instruction, situates the Tabernacle in the center surrounded by the twelve tribes. Each tribe is assigned a location in this military-style camp.

2: Each tribal group marches and camps with its standard, under the banners of its ancestral house. The meaning of the Heb term "degel" is uncertain. It may refer to a standard, probably with an attached banner or flag bearing the insignia of the tribe. Medieval commentators suggest that the tribal animal totem is depicted on the banner (Ibn Ezra) or that a colored cloth corresponding to the color of the tribe's stone on the priest's breastplate hangs from the banner (Rashi). Alternately, "degel" may refer to a military unit, a subdivision of the tribe. Levites and priests are not assigned a position in this account (see ch 3), and the Joseph tribe is broken into his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh (see Gen. 48.1–20) to reach the number twelve. 3–31: The twelve tribes are arranged to form a square camp of four divisions with three tribes in each. The Leah tribes are situated to the east and south of the Tabernacle; Gad, a son of Leah's maid-servant Zilpah, replaces Levi. Benjamin and Joseph's sons Ephraim and Manasseh, the Rachel tribes, take their position west of the Tabernacle. The remaining concubine tribes are located to the north. Judah's eastern position facing the Tabernacle entrance is a mark of the tribe's distinction as the progenitor of the Davidic royal house (see Gen. 49.10). Each of the four camp divisions has a designated leading tribe; the choice is based on traditions regarding attributes of Jacob's sons (Gen. ch 49).

²⁴The total enrolled in the division of Ephraim: 108,100 for all troops. These shall march third.

²⁵On the north: the standard of the division of Dan, troop by troop.

Chieftain of the Danites: Ahiezer son of Ammishadai. ²⁶His troop, as enrolled: 62,700.

²⁷Camping next to it:

The tribe of Asher.

Chieftain of the Asherites: Pagiel son of Ochran.

²⁸His troop, as enrolled: 41,500.

²⁹And the tribe of Naphtali.

Chieftain of the Naphtalites: Ahira son of Enan. ³⁰His troop, as enrolled: 53,400.

³¹The total enrolled in the division of Dan: 157,600. These shall march last, by their standards.

³⁴The Israelites did accordingly; just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so they camped by their standards, and so they marched, each with his clan according to his ancestral house.

3 This is the line of Aaron and Moses at the time that the LORD spoke with Moses on Mount Sinai. ²These were the names of Aaron's sons: Nadab, the first-born, and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar; ³those were the names of Aaron's sons, the anointed priests who were ordained for priesthood. ⁴But Nadab and Abihu died ^aby the will of^a the LORD, when they offered alien fire before the LORD in the wilderness of Sinai; and they left no sons. So it was Eleazar and Ithamar who served as priests in the lifetime of their father Aaron.

⁵The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ⁶Advance the tribe of Levi and place them in attendance upon Aaron the priest to serve him. ⁷They shall perform duties for him and for the whole community before the Tent of Meeting, doing the work of the Tabernacle. ⁸They shall take charge of all the furnishings of the Tent of Meeting—a duty on behalf of the Israelites—doing the work of the Tabernacle. ⁹You shall assign the Levites to Aaron and to his sons: they are formally assigned to him from among the Israelites. ¹⁰You shall make Aaron and his sons responsible for 32-34: These summary verses repeat the census grand total of ch 1, adding the information about the military organization, which, after all, is the purpose of the census. The concluding v. confirms that subsequently the Israelites camped and marched according to this plan (Num. 10.14-28). Such summary verses at the end of a unit typify Priestly literature, which also emphasizes that God's command was fulfilled exactly (v. 34).

3.1-51: The first Levite census, their ranking, and special roles. This is the first of three Levite censuses (ch 4; 26.57-62). The tribe of Levi is divided into clans; each bears the name of a son of Gershon, Kohath, or Merari, Levi's three sons. Preserving the genealogy of the Levites and especially that of the Aaronite priests is of great importance to the Priestly writer(s). P considers the Aaronites as the sole legitimate priestly line. Non-Aaronite Levites function in subordinate roles to the priests. Any challenge to Aaron's divinely ordained authority is summarily crushed (see Korah rebellion, chs 16-17). 1-3: This is the line of Aaron and Moses: It is most unusual for Aaron's name to precede Moses'; elsewhere this occurs only in other genealogical texts of the P source (Exod. 6.20; Num. 26.59; 1 Chron. 5.29; 23.13). Rashi notes that Aaron's sons are named but not Moses', and he concludes that Moses is, figuratively, the father of Aaron's sons as well because he (Moses) taught them Torah on the day God spoke to him on Mt. Sinai. 4: A reference to the obscure incident described in Lev. ch 10. 5-10: The main role of the Levites is guard duty. They are charged with guarding the Tabernacle from non-priestly encroachers while it is stationary and guarding its furnishings during travel. The purview of the priests is the interior of the Tabernacle, its sacred objects, and performing the rites associated with them. Any outsider, that is, a non-priest, is forbidden contact with the holy place or holy observing their priestly duties; and any outsider who encroaches shall be put to death.

¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹²I hereby take the Levites from among the Israelites in place of all the first-born, the first issue of the womb among the Israelites: the Levites shall be Mine. ¹³For every first-born is Mine: at the time that I smote every first-born in the land of Egypt, I consecrated every first-born in Israel, man and beast, to Myself, to be Mine, the LORD's.

¹⁴The LORD spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, saying: ¹⁵Record the Levites by ancestral house and by clan; record every male among them from the age of one month up. ¹⁶So Moses recorded them at the command of the LORD, as he was bidden. ¹⁷These were the sons of Levi by name: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. ¹⁸These were the names of the sons of Gershon by clan: Libni and Shimei. ¹⁹The sons of Kohath by clan: Amram and Izhar, Hebron and Uzziel. ²⁰The sons of Merari by clan: Mahli and Mushi.

These were the clans of the Levites within their ancestral houses:

²⁷To Kohath belonged the clan of the Amramites, the clan of the Izharites, the clan of the Hebronites, and the clan of the Uzzielites; those were the clans of the Kohathites. ²⁸All the listed males from the age of one month up came to 8,600, attending to the duties of the sanctuary. ²⁹The clans of the Kohathites were to camp along the south side of the Tabernacle. ³⁰The chieftain of the ancestral house of the Kohathite clans was Elizaphan son of Uzziel. ³¹Their duties comprised: the ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars, and the sacred utensils that were used with them, and the screen^b—all the service connected with these. ³²The head chieftain of the Levites was articles, on penalty of death. Only the sanctified priests may enter the sacred space of the Tabernacle. Nahmanides (Ramban) compares the boundaries of the Tabernacle with the bounds set for Mt. Sinai when Moses ascends the mountain to receive the law (Exod. 19.12). 11–13: Another role of the Levites is to replace first-born Israelites who are consecrated to God. Levites serve the priests in place of Israelite first-born males, who by birth are destined to minister to God. The dedication of Samuel to Eli at Shiloh reflects this practice (1 Sam. 1.10–11, 24–28). Rabbinic interpretation understands the substitution by Levites as an indication that originally first-born children were sacrificed to the deity, comparable to the offering of first-born animals (Exod. 13.2; Lev. 27.26–27; Num. 8.17; 18.15–16), but no proof exists for that assumption. 14–39: The first census of Levites states that they are counted from the age of one month up, the age of a viable infant; contrast the Israelite census from age 20 up in 1.3, the age of military conscription. The various clans of Gershonites, Kohathites, and Merarites are numbered and assigned a position from which to guard the Tabernacle: the west side, south side, and north side, respectively; the priests are stationed at the eastern entrance. The specific duties of each clan are also delineated.

^a See note on Exod. 26.1. ^b I.e., the screening curtain; cf. 4–5.

Eleazar son of Aaron the priest, in charge of those attending to the duties of the sanctuary.

³³To Merari belonged the clan of the Mahlites and the clan of the Mushites; those were the clans of Merari. ³⁴The recorded entries of all their males from the age of one month up came to 6,200. ³⁵The chieftain of the ancestral house of the clans of Merari was Zuriel son of Abihail. They were to camp along the north side of the Tabernacle. ³⁶The assigned duties of the Merarites comprised: the planks of the Tabernacle, its bars, posts, and sockets, and all its furnishings—all the service connected with these; ³⁷also the posts around the enclosure and their sockets, pegs, and cords.

⁴⁰The LORD said to Moses: Record every first-born male of the Israelite people from the age of one month up, and make a list of their names; ⁴¹and take the Levites for Me, the LORD, in place of every first-born among the Israelite people, and the cattle of the Levites in place of every first-born among the cattle of the Israelites. ⁴²So Moses recorded all the first-born among the Israelites, as the LORD had commanded him. ⁴³All the first-born males as listed by name, recorded from the age of one month up, came to 22,273.

⁴⁴The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ⁴⁵Take the Levites in place of all the first-born among the Israelite people, and the cattle of the Levites in place of their cattle; and the Levites shall be Mine, the LORD's. ⁴⁶And as the redemption price of the 273 Israelite first-born over and above the number of the Levites, ⁴⁷take five shekels per head—take this by the sanctuary weight, twenty gerahs to the shekel—⁴⁸and give the money to Aaron and his sons as the redemption price for those who are in excess. ⁴⁹So Moses took the redemption money from those over and above the ones redeemed by the Levites; ⁵⁰he took the money from the first-born of the Israelites, 1,365 sanctuary shekels. ⁵¹And Moses gave the redemption money to Aaron and his sons at the LORD's bidding, as the LORD had commanded Moses.

40-51: Although Levites function as substitutes for first-born Israelites, apparently the Levite population is short by 273 of the number of Israelite first-borns. The excess children are redeemed with a payment to the priests of five shekels per head. The numbers here are problematic as well; it is difficult to understand how the number of first-born children from all the tribes was nearly equivalent to the number of Levites; this would assume that each mother had a huge number of children. 47: By the sanctuary weight, twenty gerahs to the shekel: Two standards of weights coexisted in ancient Israel, the sanctuary weight (Exod. 30.13, 24; Lev. 5.15; Num. 7.13) and the royal weight (2 Sam. 14.26). The gloss "twenty gerahs" specifies the number of small units of weight in the lighter sanctuary shekel. The royal shekel (24 gerahs), also known as the shekel of the king, is widely attested in the archaeological record. A gerah was about .5 gm; the royal shekel was about 11.5 gm, the sanctuary shekel about 9.5 gm (less than .5 oz.).

4 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying:
²Take a [separate] census of the Kohathites among the Levites, by the clans of their ancestral house, ³from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who are subject to service, to perform tasks for the Tent of Meeting. ⁴This is the responsibility of the Kohathites in the Tent of Meeting: the most sacred objects.

⁵At the breaking of camp, Aaron and his sons shall go in and take down the screening curtain and cover the Ark of the Pact with it. ⁶They shall lay a covering of dolphin^a skin over it and spread a cloth of pure blue on top; and they shall put its poles in place.

¹⁵When Aaron and his sons have finished covering the sacred objects and all the furnishings of the sacred objects at the breaking of camp, only then shall the Kohathites come and lift them, so that they do not come in contact with the sacred objects and die. These things in the Tent of Meeting shall be the portage of the Kohathites.

4.1–49: The second Levite census and delineation of Levite duties. The second census of Levites is restricted to the work force between the ages of 30 and 50, who transport the Tabernacle's structural parts, its curtains, and its sacred objects during travel in the wilderness. Responsibilities for specific components of the Tabernacle are divided among the Levitical clan groups. 4–20: The most important components of the Tabernacle are dealt with first. Since the Levites are not empowered to handle these sacred objects or even view them, on pain of death, those objects, including the Ark, are first wrapped by priests. Coverings of different material and color distinguish the sacred objects transported by the Kohathite clans. The Ark of the Covenant, the most sacred article, is covered with three cloths. The Ark is considered the divine throne of God (1 Sam. 4.4; 2 Sam. 6.2), who in Priestly literature is envisioned as dwelling in the Tabernacle itself (contrast Deut. 12). For that reason the Ark is sometimes brought into battle (1 Sam. ch 4). According to a rabbinic midrash, the earthly Ark is a counterpart of the heavenly throne (Num. Rab. 4:13).

priest for the lighting oil, the aromatic incense, the regular meal offering, and the anointing oil—responsibility for the whole Tabernacle and for everything consecrated that is in it or in its vessels.

¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying: ¹⁸Do not let the group of Kohathite clans be cut off from the Levites. ¹⁹Do this with them, that they may live and not die when they approach the most sacred objects: let Aaron and his sons go in and assign each of them to his duties and to his portorage. ²⁰But let not [the Kohathites] go inside and ^awitness the dismantling of the sanctuary;^a lest they die.

²¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²²Take a census of the Gershonites also, by their ancestral house and by their clans. ²³Record them from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who are subject to service in the performance of tasks for the Tent of Meeting. ²⁴These are the duties of the Gershonite clans as to labor and portorage: ²⁵they shall carry the cloths of the Tabernacle, the Tent of Meeting with its covering, the covering of dolphin skin that is on top of it, and the screen for the entrance of the Tent of Meeting; ²⁶the hangings of the enclosure, the screen at the entrance of the gate of the enclosure that surrounds the Tabernacle, the cords thereof, and the altar, and all their service equipment and all their accessories; and they shall perform the service. ²⁷All the duties of the Gershonites, all their portorage and all their service, shall be performed on orders from Aaron and his sons; you shall make them responsible for attending to all their portorage. ²⁸Those are the duties of the Gershonite clans for the Tent of Meeting; they shall attend to them under the direction of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest.

²⁹As for the Merarites, you shall record them by the clans of their ancestral house; ³⁰you shall record them from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who are subject to service in the performance of the duties for the Tent of Meeting. ³¹These are their portorage tasks in connection with their various duties for the Tent of Meeting: the planks, the bars, the posts, and the sockets of the Tabernacle; ³²the posts around the enclosure and their sockets, pegs, and cords—all these furnishings and their service: you shall list by name the objects that are their portorage tasks. ³³Those are the duties of the Merarite clans, pertaining to their various duties in the Tent of

They are supervised by Aaron's son Ithamar. 29–33: The Merarites, the third group of clans, are charged with carrying the structural parts of the Tabernacle. Meeting under the direction of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest.

³⁴So Moses, Aaron, and the chieftains of the community recorded the Kohathites by the clans of their ancestral house, ³⁵from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who were subject to service for work relating to the Tent of Meeting. ³⁶Those recorded by their clans came to 2,750. ³⁷That was the enrollment of the Kohathite clans, all those who performed duties relating to the Tent of Meeting, whom Moses and Aaron recorded at the command of the LORD through Moses.

³⁸The Gershonites who were recorded by the clans of their ancestral house, ³⁹from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who were subject to service for work relating to the Tent of Meeting—⁴⁰those recorded by the clans of their ancestral house came to 2,630. ⁴¹That was the enrollment of the Gershonite clans, all those performing duties relating to the Tent of Meeting whom Moses and Aaron recorded at the command of the LORD.

⁴²The enrollment of the Merarite clans by the clans of their ancestral house, ⁴³from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who were subject to service for work relating to the Tent of Meeting—⁴⁴those recorded by their clans came to 3,200. ⁴⁵That was the enrollment of the Merarite clans which Moses and Aaron recorded at the command of the LORD through Moses.

⁴⁶All the Levites whom Moses, Aaron, and the chieftains of Israel recorded by the clans of their ancestral houses, ⁴⁷from the age of thirty years up to the age of fifty, all who were subject to duties of service and portage relating to the Tent of Meeting—⁴⁸those recorded came to 8,580. ⁴⁹Each one was given responsibility for his service and portage at the command of the LORD through Moses, and each was recorded as the LORD had commanded Moses.

5 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Instruct the Israelites to remove from camp anyone with an "eruption or a discharge" and anyone defiled by a corpse. ³Remove male and female alike; put them outside the camp so that they do not defile the camp of those in whose midst I dwell.

⁴The Israelites did so, putting them outside the camp; as the LORD had spoken to Moses, so the Israelites did.

5.1-31: Laws of purity and the role of the priests. Priestly tasks include responsibilities over worldly as well as sacred matters; in the ancient world the two were inseparable. Laws concerned with the maintenance of religious purity inside the Israelite camp reflect this ideology, and the purity of the camp was essential if the Israelites wanted God to continue dwelling in their midst. This explains why these regulations immediately follow the instructions for the proper organization and transport of the wilderness camp (chs 1-4). 1-4: The sacred status of the Tabernacle, which sits in the center of the camp, necessitates that the entire area within the bounds of the camp preserve a state of cultic (religious) purity. According to the Priestly writer(s), contact with impurity is contagious to both persons and objects. Therefore, that which is in a state of impurity must be removed from the camp, lest it pollute the holiness of the sanctuary and endanger the Presence of God. The most dangerous conditions, those marked by severe impurity, require a seven-day purification process (Lev. chs 13-16; Num. ch 19). They include persons with certain skin diseases, abnormal sexual discharges, menstruating women, or those who are defiled by a corpse. 5-10: Lev. ch 5 details the "asham," or guilt offering, and the expiation processes for transgressions that require this category of sacrifices. Here in Numbers two provisions supplement the guilt offering for sins involving robberies and accompanying false oaths: (1) A confession must precede the act of restitution; (2) if the injured party has no living relative the reparation payment goes to the officiating priest (as does the meat from the expiatory sacrifice).

fellow man, thus breaking faith with the LORD, and that person realizes his guilt, ⁷he shall confess the wrong that he has done. He shall make restitution in the principal amount and add one-fifth to it, giving it to him whom he has wronged. ⁸If the man has no kinsman^a to whom restitution can be made, the amount repaid shall go to the LORD for the priest—in addition to the ram of expiation with which expiation is made on his behalf.^b ⁹So, too, any gift among the sacred donations that the Israelites offer shall be the priest's. ¹⁰And each shall retain his sacred donations: each priest shall keep what is given to him.

If any man's wife has gone astray and broken faith with him ¹³in that a man has had carnal relations with her unbeknown to her husband, and she keeps secret the fact that she has defiled herself without being forced, and there is no witness against her—¹⁴but a fit of jealousy comes over him and he is wrought up about the wife who has defiled herself; or if a fit of jealousy comes over one and he is wrought up about his wife although she has not defiled herself—¹⁵the man shall bring his wife to the priest. And he shall bring as an offering for her one-tenth of an ephah of barley flour. No oil shall be poured upon it and no frankincense shall be laid on it, for it is a meal offering of jealousy, a meal offering of remembrance which recalls wrongdoing.

¹⁶The priest shall bring her forward and have her stand before the LORD. ¹⁷The priest shall take sacral water in an earthen vessel and, taking some of the earth that is on the floor of the Tabernacle, the priest shall put it into the water. ¹⁸After he has made the woman stand before the LORD, the priest shall bare the woman's head^c and place upon her hands the meal offering of remembrance, which is a meal offering of jealousy. And in the priest's hands shall be the water of bitterness ^d“that induces the spell.”^d ¹⁹The priest shall adjure the woman, saying to her, “If no man has lain with you, if you have not gone astray in defilement while married to your husband, be immune to harm from this water of bitterness that induces the spell. ²⁰But if you have gone astray while married to your husband and have defiled yourself, if a man other than your husband has had carnal relations with you”—

11–31: The ordeal, or more correctly, the trial of the suspected adulteress, is a means of allaying or confirming the fears of a husband that his wife was unfaithful. Marital infidelity by the woman is a grave offense because it threatens the purity of the lineage. Adultery is defined as involving sexual contact between a married woman and a man other than her husband, and is a capital crime (Lev. 20.10). (Since Israel was a polygynous society, sexual contact between a married man and an unmarried woman was not considered adultery, although it was not encouraged.) When conclusive evidence is lacking, judgment and subsequent punishment is left in the hands of the divine. Water ordeals of varying types are attested from the ancient Near East. In the Babylonian Laws of Hammurabi, §132, (18th century BCE), one method of determining the guilt or innocence of a suspected adulteress is the river ordeal, in which the woman is thrown into the water and her fate is left to the river god. According to the Mishnah, the biblical ordeal for a suspected adulteress was suspended after the destruction of the Second Temple, one reason being the uncontrollable number of cases of adultery (m. Sot. 9.9). The episode of the suspected adulteress is narrated here for two reasons: The ritual utilizes earth from the floor of the Tabernacle (v. 17), the focus of the previous chapter, and the ritual, like the guilt offering, is connected to broken faith (see vv. 6, 12).

12: If a man's wife has gone astray: The initial sin of the woman may be a violation of the marriage oath. Rashi understands it as the woman having gone mad. 14: The reason for the husband's jealousy is not stated but may be that his wife is pregnant and he questions the paternity of the child. 15–26: The husband brings a menial meal offering, and the priest prepares a mixture of sacral water, dust from the sanctuary floor, and ink rubbed off the inscription of the curse for the woman to drink. Most importantly, the priest ad-

²¹ here the priest shall administer the curse of adjuration to the woman, as the priest goes on to say to the woman—“may the LORD make you a curse and an imprecation among your people, as the LORD causes your thigh to sag and your belly to distend; ²² may this water that induces the spell enter your body, causing the belly to distend and the thigh to sag.” And the woman shall say, “Amen, amen!”

²³ The priest shall put these curses down in writing and rub it off into the water of bitterness. ²⁴ He is to make the woman drink the water of bitterness that induces the spell, so that the spell-inducing water may enter into her to bring on bitterness. ²⁵ Then the priest shall take from the woman’s hand the meal offering of jealousy, elevate the meal offering before the LORD, and present it on the altar. ²⁶ The priest shall scoop out of the meal offering a token part of it and turn it into smoke on the altar. Last, he shall make the woman drink the water.

²⁷ Once he has made her drink the water—if she has defiled herself by breaking faith with her husband, the spell-inducing water shall enter into her to bring on bitterness, so that her belly shall distend and her thigh shall sag; and the woman shall become a curse among her people. ²⁸ But if the woman has not defiled herself and is pure, she shall be unharmed and able to retain seed.

6 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ² Speak to the Israelites and say to them: If anyone, man or woman, explicitly^a utters a nazirite’s vow, to set himself apart for the LORD, ³ he shall abstain from wine and any other intoxicant; he shall not drink vinegar of wine or of any other intoxicant, neither shall he drink anything in which grapes have been steeped, nor eat grapes fresh or dried. ⁴ Throughout his term as nazirite, he may not eat anything that is obtained from the grapevine, even seeds or skin.^b ministers the woman’s oath and utters the curse that takes effect if she is guilty. 18: Water of bitterness seems to refer to the bitter taste of the water, which contains ink and dust, probably mixed with ashes fallen to the sanctuary floor from the altar. Alternatively, the “bitterness” can refer to the punishment, apparently a distended uterus, a possible miscarriage, and ultimate infertility (so medieval commentators). A third interpretation translates the Heb term “hamarim” as “instructing,” derived from a different verbal root (“y-r-h”). Thereby, the waters reveal the woman’s innocence or guilt.

21: This v. repeats the curse; it can be explained as an interpolation that adds God to the formula. 22: The woman shall say, “Amen, amen!”: Amen or twice amen is an affirmation of truth often attached to oaths (Deut. 27.15–26; Neh. 5.13). An archeological discovery of a letter from the 7th century BCE that records the petition of an Israelite worker to his officer, uses “Amen” to affirm the truth of the worker’s statement. Oaths and curses similar in formula to those uttered in this biblical case are known from ancient Near Eastern treaties. In the case of the biblical adulteress, as well as in some non-biblical examples, the function of the water mixture is to effectuate the oath. 27–28: These vv. repeat the two possible results of the trial. 29–31: This is the ritual, or instruction, “Torah.” Priestly legislation often concludes with these types of summary statements (see concluding verses in Lev. chs 7, 11, 15).

6.1–21: Vow of the Nazirite. By taking the vow of a Nazirite an Israelite consecrates himself or herself to God for a limited time period, becoming a type of lay priest, with restrictions similar to those of priests. The vow entails a number of restrictions to the person’s lifestyle: abstaining from fermented drinks and grape products; abstaining from cutting the hair; and abstaining from coming in contact with the dead. (This explains why Samson, who was a

his head being left to grow untrimmed. ⁶Throughout the term that he has set apart for the LORD, he shall not go in where there is a dead person. ⁷Even if his father or mother, or his brother or sister should die, he must not defile himself for them, since "hair set apart for his God" is upon his head: ⁸throughout his term as nazirite he is consecrated to the LORD.

⁹If a person dies suddenly near him, ^b defiling his consecrated hair, he shall shave his head on the day he becomes clean; he shall shave it on the seventh day. ¹⁰On the eighth day he shall bring two turtledoves or two pigeons to the priest, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ¹¹The priest shall offer one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering, and make expiation on his behalf for the guilt that he incurred through the corpse. That same day he shall reconsecrate his head ¹²and rededicate to the LORD his term as nazirite; and he shall bring a lamb in its first year as a penalty offering. The previous period shall be void, since his consecrated hair was defiled.

¹³This is the ritual for the nazirite: On the day that his term as nazirite is completed, he ^c shall be brought to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁴As his offering to the LORD he shall present: one male lamb in its first year, without blemish, for a burnt offering; one ewe lamb in its first year, without blemish, for a sin offering; one ram without blemish for an offering of well-being; ¹⁵a basket of unleavened cakes of choice flour with oil mixed in, and unleavened wafers spread with oil; and the proper meal offerings and libations.

¹⁹The priest shall take the shoulder of the ram when it has been boiled, one unleavened cake from the basket, and one unleavened wafer, and place them on the hands of the nazirite after he has shaved his consecrated hair. ²⁰The priest shall elevate them as an elevation offering before the LORD; and this shall be a sacred donation for the priest, in addition to the breast of the elevation offering Nazirite, was not supposed to cut his hair.) The Rabbis explain that the passage on Nazirite vows follows the section on the suspected adulteress to teach that abstinence from drink is commendable, since drinking intoxicants can lead to adultery (b. Sot. 2a). Modern critical approaches connect the sections by their emphasis on the key roles of the priests. 9–12: Contamination by a corpse requires shaving the hair and following the purification process outlined in ch 19. After purification, the Nazirite restarts his or her original vow timetable. Defilement of a Nazirite affects the consecrated hair rather than the person. 18: The significance of the hair is also apparent at the completion ceremony, at which time it is burnt in the fire underneath (the pot of) the Nazirite's sacrifice of well-being. Hair offerings are known from ancient practices in the Aegean. 13–20: The rites that the Nazirite undergoes at the completion of the vow not only commemorate the fulfillment of the vow but function as a transitional ritual that allows the person to return to his or her former status. In this Priestly passage, the role of the priest in the ceremony is central to the discussion of the Nazirite. These verses concern a Nazirite for a prescribed period of time; Judg. ch 13 depicts Samson as a lifetime Nazirite, with similar restrictions.

and the thigh of gift offering. After that the nazirite may drink wine.

²¹Such is the obligation of a nazirite; except that he who vows an offering to the LORD of what he can afford, beyond his nazirite requirements, must do exactly according to the vow that he has made beyond his obligation as a nazirite.

²²The LORD spoke to Moses: ²³Speak to Aaron and his sons: Thus shall you bless the people of Israel. Say to them:

²⁴The LORD bless you and protect you!

²⁵The LORD ^adeal kindly and graciously with you!^a

²⁶The LORD ^bbestow His favor^b upon you and grant you peace!^c

²⁷Thus they shall link My name with the people of Israel, and I will bless them.

7On the day that Moses finished setting up the Tabernacle, he anointed and consecrated it and all its furnishings, as well as the altar and its utensils. When he had anointed and consecrated them, ²the chieftains of Israel, the heads of ancestral houses, namely, the chieftains of the tribes, those who were in charge of enrollment, drew near^d ³and brought their offering before the LORD: six draught carts and twelve oxen, a cart for every two chieftains and an ox for each one.

6.22-27: The priestly blessing.

Another duty of priests is to bless the community of Israel (Lev. 9.22-23; Deut. 10.8; 21.5) or individual Israelites (1 Sam. 2.20) in the name of the LORD. The three-part blessing here invokes God's mercy and favor toward the children of Israel for the sake of their general well-being, "shalom." Each of the three parts is longer than the preceding one, emphasizing the overflowing of blessing that is hoped for. Ibn Ezra connects Aaron's blessing of Israel at the dedication of the Tabernacle (Lev. 9.22-23) to the priestly blessing in Numbers. An interpretive version of the priestly blessing, contained in the sectarian literature of the Dead Sea Scrolls, expands the biblical text to more clearly define the particulars of God's blessing (1QS 2.2-4). 25: Deal kindly is more literally "shine His face," a sign of favor. Similarly in v. 26, bestow His favor is "raise His head." The Bible often refers to God in such anthropomorphic terms. 27: The prescription to place God's name upon Israel may refer to amulets inscribed with the name of the LORD worn around the neck. This interpretation is supported by the discovery in a Jerusalem tomb of two silver amulets incised with slightly shorter versions of the priestly benediction in Numbers. These First Temple-period amulets testify to the antiquity of the blessing. The priestly blessing has been preserved to modernity in Jewish liturgy as part of the "'Amidah" and in the blessing recited by parents for their children on Friday night. And I will bless them: The Heb actually reads, "and I will bless you (plural)." Ibn Ezra correctly explains that "you" refers to the priests; the priests bless Israel and God in turn blesses the priests.

7.1-89: Final preparation for the operation of the Tabernacle cult. After the organization of the camp and the relegation of duties to the Levites and priests, Moses consecrates the Tabernacle and its implements and outfits it with supplies necessary for its operation. The consecration of the altar repeats the account in Lev. chs 8-9, expanding the narrative in Leviticus by adding the chieftains' gifts. The tribal chieftains bring joint gifts, representing all Israel equally (cf. Exod. 30.15), as well as gifts from their separate tribes. Joint initiatory gifts for the sanctuary consist of six carts and twelve oxen. The carts and oxen are given to the Gershonite and Merarite Levitic clans for transporting the portable Tabernacle. The Kohathites do not receive carts because they must carry the sacred objects on their shoulders. Individual chieftains bring their tribe's gifts and dedication offerings for twelve consecutive days, one chieftain per day. The insertion of this information at this point fits with the previous assignment of Levitic tasks and the appointment of tribal heads. 1: Anointing the Tabernacle and its implements with oil as an act of consecration is an ancient Near Eastern practice. In the Bible, a comparable act is performed by Jacob at Bethel when he anoints the pillar that he erects to mark the holiness of the site. Jacob then designates the pillar as a future shrine (Gen. 28.18-22). 2: According to Rashi, the chieftains of Israel are the same officers who were in charge of the slaves in Egypt and beaten on their (the Israelites') account (see Exod. 5.14, where they are called "foremen"). Now they

⁶Moses took the carts and the oxen and gave them to the Levites. ⁷Two carts and four oxen he gave to the Gershonites, as required for their service, ⁸and four carts and eight oxen he gave to the Merarites, as required for their service—under the direction of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest. ⁹But to the Kohathites he did not give any; since theirs was the service of the [most] sacred objects, their portage was by shoulder.

¹⁰The chieftains also brought the dedication offering for the altar upon its being anointed. As the chieftains were presenting their offerings before the altar, ¹¹the LORD said to Moses: Let them present their offerings for the dedication of the altar, one chieftain each day.

²⁴On the third day, it was the chieftain of the Zebulunites, Eliab son of Helon. ²⁵His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ²⁶one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ²⁷one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ²⁸one goat for a sin offering; ²⁹and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Eliab son of Helon.

are rewarded. 10: Dedication offering for the altar: In Heb “hanukah” is the term for the opening dedication of a house, temple, or altar (cf. Deut. 20.5; 1 Kings 8.63; 2 Chron. 7.9). Similarly, the holiday of Hanukkah celebrates the purification and rededication of the Jerusalem Temple by the Maccabees (1 Macc. 4.36–61). The Torah reading for Hanukkah is taken from this chapter in Numbers. 12: Judah, as most important, is mentioned first.

³⁰On the fourth day, it was the chieftain of the Reubenites, Elizur son of Shedeur. ³¹His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ³²one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ³³one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ³⁴one goat for a sin offering; ³⁵and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Elizur son of Shedeur.

³⁶On the fifth day, it was the chieftain of the Simeonites, Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ³⁷His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ³⁸one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ³⁹one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁴⁰one goat for a sin offering; ⁴¹and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai.

⁴²On the sixth day, it was the chieftain of the Gadites, Eliasaph son of Deuel. ⁴³His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ⁴⁴one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ⁴⁵one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁴⁶one goat for a sin offering; ⁴⁷and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Eliasaph son of Deuel.

herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁵⁸one goat for a sin offering; ⁵⁹and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Gamaliel son of Pedahzur.

⁶⁰On the ninth day, it was the chieftain of the Benjaminites, Abidan son of Gideoni. ⁶¹His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ⁶²one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ⁶³one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁶⁴one goat for a sin offering; ⁶⁵and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Abidan son of Gideoni.

⁶⁶On the tenth day, it was the chieftain of the Danites, Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai. ⁶⁷His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ⁶⁸one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ⁶⁹one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁷⁰one goat for a sin offering; ⁷¹and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai.

⁷²On the eleventh day, it was the chieftain of the Asherites, Pagiél son of Ocran. ⁷³His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ⁷⁴one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ⁷⁵one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁷⁶one goat for a sin offering; ⁷⁷and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Pagiél son of Ocran.

⁷⁸On the twelfth day, it was the chieftain of the Naphtalites, Ahira son of Enan. ⁷⁹His offering: one silver bowl weighing 130 shekels and one silver basin of 70 shekels by the sanctuary weight, both filled with choice flour with oil mixed in, for a meal offering; ⁸⁰one gold ladle of 10 shekels, filled with incense; ⁸¹one bull of the herd, one ram, and one lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ⁸²one goat for a sin offering; ⁸³and for his sacrifice of well-being: two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five yearling lambs. That was the offering of Ahira son of Enan.

⁸⁴This was the dedication offering for the altar from the chieftains of Israel upon its being anointed: silver bowls, 12; silver basins, 12; gold ladles, 12.⁸⁵ Silver per bowl, 130; per basin, 70. Total silver of vessels, 2,400 sanctuary shekels.⁸⁶ The 12 gold ladles filled with incense—10 sanctuary shekels per ladle—total gold of the ladles, 120.

⁸⁷Total of herd animals for burnt offerings, 12 bulls; of rams, 12; of yearling lambs, 12—with their proper meal offerings; of goats for sin offerings, 12.⁸⁸ Total of herd animals for sacrifices of well-being, 24 bulls; of rams, 60; of he-goats, 60; of yearling lambs, 60. That was the dedication offering for the altar after its anointing.

⁸⁹When Moses went into the Tent of Meeting to speak with Him, he would hear the Voice addressing him from above the cover that was on top of the Ark of the Pact between the two cherubim; thus He spoke to him.

BE-HA'ALOTEKHA

8 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to Aaron and say to him, “When you mount^a the lamps, let the seven lamps give light at the front of the lampstand.” ³Aaron did so; he mounted the lamps at the front of the lampstand, as the LORD had commanded Moses.—⁴Now this is how the lampstand was made: it was hammered work of gold, hammered from base to petal. According to the pattern that the LORD had shown Moses, so was the lampstand made.

⁵The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ⁶Take the Levites from among the Israelites and cleanse them. ⁷This is what you shall do to them to cleanse them: sprinkle on them water of purification, and let them go over their whole body with a razor, and wash their clothes; thus they shall be cleansed. ⁸Let them take a bull of the herd, and with it a meal offering of choice flour with oil mixed in, and you take a second bull of the herd for a sin offering. ⁹You shall bring the Levites forward before the Tent of Meeting. Assemble the whole Israelite community,¹⁰ and bring the Levites forward before the LORD. Let the Israelites lay their hands upon the Levites,¹¹ and let Aaron designate^b the Levites before the LORD as an elevation offering from the Israelites, that they may perform the service of the LORD. ¹²The Levites shall now lay their hands upon the heads of the bulls; one shall be offered to the LORD as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering, to make expiation for the Levites.

84–88: A typically Priestly summary of the account. 89: This appended v. reiterates how Moses communicates with God in the Tent of Meeting, the portable site for revelation where God dwells (Exod. 25.17–22; Lev. 9.23). God’s name is not mentioned but is substituted by the Voice, a term that is the precursor of the rabbinic “bat kol,” “daughter of the voice,” or “echo,” signifying a divine voice from the heavens.

8.1–4: Lighting the lampstand.

Several passages in Exodus (25.31–40; 27.20–21; 30.7–8; 37.17–24; 40.4) and one in Leviticus (24.1–4) deal with the construction and lighting instructions for the lampstand (menorah). Here the instructions are fulfilled. Lighting the lampstand inside the Tabernacle is a logical conclusion to 7.89, where Moses enters the Tent of Meeting and communicates with God. Ibn Ezra explains the textual placement as a lesson that God’s word also comes at night, necessitating the light to burn day and night. 2: Let the seven lamps give light at the front of the lampstand: The lamps are positioned on the stand facing forward, northward, to cast light on the altar and the table with showbread situated in front of the menorah. Seven-spouted ceramic lamps excavated from the shrine at Dan, dating to the First Temple period, are shaped differently; they are circular with spouts for wicks projecting in all directions. 4: The unit concludes in typically Priestly fashion, that God’s command was executed exactly.

The duties of the Levites are explained in the previous chs. Here they undergo rites of ritual purification so that they can handle the Tabernacle and its contents. 7: Cleansing entails being sprinkled with water of purification (fresh water mixed with the ashes of the red cow; see ch 19), shaving the entire body, and washing one’s clothing. 9–16: These preparatory rituals are followed by sacrifices

¹³You shall place the Levites in attendance upon Aaron and his sons, and designate them as an elevation offering to the LORD. ¹⁴Thus you shall set the Levites apart from the Israelites, and the Levites shall be Mine. ¹⁵Thereafter the Levites shall be qualified for the service of the Tent of Meeting, once you have cleansed them and designated them as an elevation offering. ¹⁶For they are formally assigned to Me from among the Israelites: I have taken them for Myself in place of all the first issue of the womb, of all the first-born of the Israelites. ¹⁷For every first-born among the Israelites, man as well as beast, is Mine; I consecrated them to Myself at the time that I smote every first-born in the land of Egypt. ¹⁸Now I take the Levites instead of every first-born of the Israelites; ¹⁹and from among the Israelites I formally assign the Levites to Aaron and his sons, to perform the service for the Israelites in the Tent of Meeting and to make expiation for the Israelites, so that no plague may afflict the Israelites “for coming” too near the sanctuary.

9 The LORD spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, on the first new moon of the second year following the exodus from the land of Egypt, saying: ²Let the Israelite people offer the passover sacrifice at its set time: ³you shall offer it on the fourteenth day of this month, at twilight, at its set time; you shall offer it in accordance with all its rules and rites.

and a laying-on-of-hands ceremony in front of the Tent of Meeting. In a gesture reminiscent of laying hands upon the heads of sacrificial animals (8.12), a group of Israelite representatives lay their hands on the Levites as Aaron designates them (the Levites) as an elevation offering from Israel. These rituals officially separate the Levites from other Israelites and dedicate them to God’s service. 23–26: The last vv. of this section specify the age limits for Levitic duties. The starting age for joining the Levite work force, age 25, conflicts with the starting age for being counted in the census, age 30 (ch 4). This suggests that the Priestly material in Numbers has a complex history, though rabbinic interpretation harmonizes the conflicting numbers by surmising that between the ages of 25 and 30 Levites function as assistants and only at age 30 are they counted as full-fledged members of the work force.

9.1–14: First Passover in the wilderness. Israel observed the first Passover in Egypt just prior to the exodus (Exod. ch 12). Now, one year later, as Israel prepares to depart from Sinai, it celebrates the first Passover in the wilderness. Here the Passover is bound to the Sinaitic covenant, including the laws of ritual purity that must be observed inside the camp in the presence of the Tabernacle. The time-bound obligation to partake of the Passover sacrifice presents a legal problem for Israelites who are ritually impure from contact with a corpse. The issue is resolved with the designation of an alternate Passover, one month later, for persons in a state of impurity or on a distant journey. According to the Chronicler, King Hezekiah (late 8th century BCE) also postponed one Passover to the second month. In that case, not enough priests were in a state of purity and those Israelites residing in the north needed time to assemble in Jerusalem (2 Chron. 30). Passover is the only festival or ritual for which a “make-up” is ⁴Moses instructed the Israelites to offer the passover sacrifice; ⁵and they offered the passover sacrifice in the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month, at twilight, in the wilderness of Sinai. Just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so the Israelites did.

⁶But there were some men who were unclean by reason of a corpse and could not offer the passover sacrifice on that day. Appearing that same day before Moses and Aaron, ⁷those men said to them, ^a“Unclean though we are by reason of a corpse, why must we be debarred from presenting the LORD’s offering at its set time with the rest of the Israelites?” ⁸Moses said to them, “Stand by, and let me hear what instructions the LORD gives about you.”

⁹And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁰Speak to the Israelite people, saying: When any of you or of your posterity who are defiled by a corpse or are on a long journey would offer a passover sacrifice to the LORD, ¹¹they shall offer it in the second month, on the fourteenth day of the month, at twilight. They shall eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, ¹²and they shall not leave any of it over until morning. They shall not break a bone of it. They shall offer it in strict accord with the law of the passover sacrifice. ¹³But if a man who is clean and not on a journey refrains from offering the passover sacrifice, that person shall be cut off from his kin, for he did not present the LORD’s offering at its set time; that man shall bear his guilt.

¹⁴And when a stranger who resides with you would offer a passover sacrifice to the LORD, he must offer it in accordance with the rules and rites of the passover sacrifice. There shall be one law for you, whether stranger or citizen of the country.

¹⁵On the day that the Tabernacle was set up, the cloud covered the Tabernacle, the Tent of the Pact; and in the evening it rested over the Tabernacle in the likeness of fire until morning. ¹⁶It was always so: the cloud covered it, appearing as fire by night. ¹⁷And whenever the cloud lifted from the Tent, the Israelites would set out accordingly; and at the spot where the cloud settled, there the Israelites would make camp. ¹⁸At a command of the LORD the Israelites broke camp, and at a command of the LORD they made camp: they remained encamped as long as the cloud stayed over the Tabernacle. ¹⁹When the cloud lingered over the Tabernacle many days, the Israelites observed the LORD’s mandate and did not journey on. ²⁰At scheduled; this is because of the importance of the festival as an acknowledgment of God’s role as redeemer from Egypt. 10: Defiled by a corpse or are on a long journey: Both of these exemptions require further definition. According to the Rabbis, corpse defilement is inclusive of all other impurities; the distance that qualifies as a long journey from the Temple is debated. 14: Observance of the Passover is mandatory both for Israelites and resident aliens, though according to Exod. 12.48, only circumcised resident aliens may partake.

This passage is strategically placed just prior to Israel’s resumption of the desert march which was interrupted by their encampment at Sinai (Exod. 19.1–Num. 10.1). The fire-cloud, God’s manifestation to Israel, guides the movement of the traveling camp as a cloud by day and a fire at night. When the fire-cloud descends over the Tabernacle, Israel camps; when it rises, Israel marches (also Exod. 40.36–38). The cloudy fiery aura of the LORD is a divine feature also found in non-Israelite societies; it arrives over the Tabernacle once that structure is completed (v. 15) and serves as a sign of divine favor. In other Priestly writings this divine fire is called “kavod,” God’s Presence or glory (Exod. 24.16–17; 2 Chron. 7.3). In the account of the burning bush (Exod. ch 3) and Ezekiel’s vision of the divine chariot (Ezek. ch 1), God also manifests Himself as, or from within, fire.

such times as the cloud rested over the Tabernacle for but a few days, they remained encamped at a command of the LORD, and broke camp at a command of the LORD.²¹ And at such times as the cloud stayed from evening until morning, they broke camp as soon as the cloud lifted in the morning. Day or night, whenever the cloud lifted, they would break camp.²² Whether it was two days or a month or a year—however long the cloud lingered over the Tabernacle—the Israelites remained encamped and did not set out; only when it lifted did they break camp.²³ On a sign from the LORD they made camp and on a sign from the LORD they broke camp; they observed the LORD’s mandate at the LORD’s bidding through Moses.

10 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying:² Have two silver trumpets made; make them of hammered work. They shall serve you to summon the community and to set the divisions in motion.³ When both are blown in long blasts,^a the whole community shall assemble before you at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting;⁴ and if only one is blown, the chieftains, heads of Israel’s contingents, shall assemble before you.⁵ But when you sound short blasts,^a the divisions encamped on the east shall move forward;⁶ and when you sound short blasts a second time, those encamped on the south shall move forward. Thus short blasts shall be blown for setting them in motion,⁷ while to convoke the congregation you shall blow long blasts, not short ones.⁸ The trumpets shall be blown by Aaron’s sons, the priests; they shall be for you an institution for all time throughout the ages.

^{9b} When you are at war^b in your land against an aggressor who attacks you, you shall sound short blasts on the trumpets, that you may be remembered before the LORD your God and be delivered from your enemies.¹⁰ And on your joyous occasions—your fixed festivals and new moon days—you shall sound the trumpets over your burnt offerings and your sacrifices of well-being. They shall be a reminder of you before your God: I, the LORD, am your God.

10.1–10: The silver trumpets. The trumpets, like the fire-cloud, summon the Israelite divisions to march. Together, the fire-cloud and trumpets appeal to the senses of hearing and sight. Similarly, both senses are invoked in the revelation at Sinai by thunder, lightning, and dense cloud cover (Exod. 19.16). Usually an animal horn, a shofar, is used to signal the people to assemble for religious or military purposes (i.e., Lev. 25.9; Judg. 3.27). Trumpets, presumably of metal, are attested in a number of biblical texts, primarily of Priestly authorship. Only trumpets explicitly manufactured of silver are mentioned in this text. Trumpets play a significant role in the postbiblical War Scroll, a description of the eschatological war found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. 9–10: In wartime, the sound of the trumpets alerts God that Israel is in trouble; at festivals, the sound of the trumpets is a reminder that Israel stands before God, no doubt as a blessing. The Rabbis used the final verse in this section as the foundation on which they constructed the three-part “Musaf” (additional prayer) of Rosh Ha-Shanah. I, the LORD, am your God stands for God’s kingship (“malkhuyot”—kingship); you shall sound the trumpets stands for trumpets or horns (“shofarot”—related to the shofar or ram’s horn); they shall be a reminder of you before your God stands for memorials (“zikhronot”—remembrance).

10.11–12.16: The march from Sinai to the desert of Paran.

10.11–28: Order of march. The second major literary unit in Numbers begins here. (The chapter numbers in our Bibles date from the 13th century CE, so it is not surprising that a major unit may begin in the middle of a chapter.) It starts with the Israelite departure from Sinai to resume their journey through the wilderness. The four camp divisions travel in a single column while maintaining the same order as in camp. The division of Judah leads, reflecting mand through Moses, ¹⁴ the first standard to set out, troop by troop, was the division of Judah. In command of its troops was Nahshon son of Amminadab; ¹⁵ in command of the tribal troop of Issachar, Nethanel son of Zuar; ¹⁶ and in command of the tribal troop of Zebulun, Eliab son of Helon.

²⁹ Moses said to Hobab son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law, "We are setting out for the place of which the LORD has said, 'I will give it to you.' Come with us and we will be generous with you; for the LORD has promised to be generous to Israel."

³⁰ "I will not go," he replied to him, "but will return to my native land."^a ³¹ He said, "Please do not leave us, inasmuch as you know where we should camp in the wilderness and can be our guide."^a ³² So if you come with us, we will extend to you the same bounty that the LORD grants us."

yet again the importance of this tribe; they are followed by the Gershonites and Merarites who carry the structural parts of the Tabernacle. The division of Reuben is next, followed by the Kohathites with the sacred objects. In that way the structure of the Tabernacle can be reassembled by the time the sanctuary objects reach an encampment stop. The last two divisions, those led by Ephraim and then Dan, bring up the rear. 29–32:

From this point until the end of ch 12 the narrative style and contents reflect the writing of the JE source(s). The focus switches to the story of the journey, without the features that characterize the Priestly source: genealogical lists, lengthy discussions of priestly laws, and ritual regulations. At the outset of the march, Moses persuades his father-in-law to help guide Israel through the wilderness. 29: Hobab son of Reuel the Midianite: In Exodus, the name of Moses' father-in-law appears as Reuel (2.18) or Jethro (18.1ff). One of those names, Reuel, may be his Midianite clan name (Gen. 36.17). Some scholars think that Hobab (Jethro), who was a priest of Midian, was a worshipper of the LORD and that Moses actually adopted this deity as Israel's God after learning of Him from his father-in-law. These scholars refer to the theophoric place-name YHW' in the Sinai which is mentioned in an Egyptian text (14th century), as well as biblical references that the LORD came from that region (Deut. 33.2; Judg. 5.4; Hab. 3.3). As a biblical prooftext they also use Jethro's exclamation to Moses that "the LORD is greater than all gods" (Exod. 18.11). This is highly hypothetical. In the latter statement, however, Jethro may simply be reacting in awe to Israel's redemption from Egypt. In any case, Hobab (Jethro) is welcome in the Israelite camp. 33–36: According to this JE tradition, the Ark travels in front of the Israelite camp rather than in its midst (cf. vv. 11–28). It is striking that the two different traditions about the place of the Ark are juxtaposed so closely to seek out a resting place for them;³⁴ and the LORD's cloud kept above them by day, as they moved on from camp.

³⁵When the Ark was to set out, Moses would say:

Advance, O LORD!

May Your enemies be scattered,
And may Your foes flee before You!

³⁶And when it halted, he would say:

^aReturn, O LORD,

You who are Israel's myriads of thousands!^a

11 The people took to complaining bitterly before the LORD. The LORD heard and was incensed: a fire of the LORD broke out against them, ravaging the outskirts of the camp. ²The people cried out to Moses. Moses prayed to the LORD, and the fire died down. ³That place was named Taberah,^b because a fire of the LORD had broken out against them.

⁴The riffraff in their midst felt a gluttonous craving; and then the Israelites wept and said, "If only we had meat to eat! ⁵We remember the fish that we used to eat free in Egypt, the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic. ⁶Now our gullets are shriveled. There is nothing at all! Nothing but this manna to look to!"

⁷Now the manna was like coriander seed, and in color it was like bdellium. ⁸The people would go about and gather it, grind it between millstones or pound it in a mortar, boil it in a pot, and make it into cakes. It tasted like rich cream.^c ⁹When the dew fell on the camp at night, the manna would fall upon it.

¹⁰Moses heard the people weeping, every clan apart, each person at the entrance of his tent. The LORD was very

each other, but this typifies the Torah (compare, e.g., the two conflicting creation accounts that open Genesis). Ibn Ezra and Ramban reconcile this contradiction by suggesting that initially, to alleviate Israel's fears, the Ark led the group. 35–36: The song of the Ark, evidently part of a Mosaic tradition, is a type of victory song praising God as a divine warrior, the defender of Israel. Its insertion here may be related to the first word of the song, "binsoa," which picks up on the key word of this subsection, "travel" (of the Ark). Here the Ark can be understood as God's chariot. This poem is preserved in Jewish tradition in the liturgy as part of the Torah service. 36: Myriads of thousands is an epithet of the LORD as a warrior similar to the more common biblical epithet LORD of Hosts (1 Sam. 17.45; Isa. 1.24; 21.10; Zeph. 2.9).

ness, they fall into a pattern of complaining. After each incident God reacts by punishing the people, essentially because the grievances reflect disloyalty to the Sinaitic covenant. Moses responds to God's action by interceding on Israel's behalf—this is a typical role of biblical prophets (see, e.g., Jer. 7.16; 11.14; 14.11). The biblical writer preserves the incident in the collective memory of Israel by naming the location after the event that occurred there. This cycle repeats in one form or another throughout the wanderings. Two complaint stories are found in this chapter. 1–3: The grievance in the first case is not specified, but God's punishment, deadly fire, is mentioned. The place name, Taberah, recalls the punishment by fire, and might be connected to the manifestation of God as fire in ch 9. Clearly, there is an intended lesson for Israel, but it is not heeded and the murmuring continues. 4–35: The second incident is far more detailed and complex. It originates from the camp's non-Israelite contingent which joined the Israelites in the exodus (Exod. 12.38). The people crave a more varied diet than just manna, like the one they claim was available in Egypt. As commonly happens, the complaints of a few are echoed by the entire group. This larger section seems to combine two originally independent stories concerning the quail and the seventy elders. 4–5: If only we had meat. . . we remember the fish: Meat may actually refer to fish, a cheap and ample food from the Nile. Why the Israelites do not slaughter animals from their herds (Exod. 12.38; Num. 32.1) is not explained in the text. 7–9: Manna is described here as a rich and tasty food suitable for various modes of preparation. This positive depiction of manna underscores the unjustified complaints of the people. Some scholars identify the manna with the edible sap of the tamarisk tree that forms flaky sweet pellets in conjunction with the activity of plant lice. Its description here differs from Exod. 16.31; this is recon-angry, and Moses was distressed. ¹¹ And Moses said to the LORD, "Why have You dealt ill with Your servant, and why have I not enjoyed Your favor, that You have laid the burden of all this people upon me? ¹² Did I conceive all this people, did I bear them, that You should say to me, 'Carry them in your bosom as a nurse carries an infant,' to the land that You have promised on oath to their fathers? ¹³ Where am I to get meat to give to all this people, when they whine before me and say, 'Give us meat to eat!' ¹⁴ I cannot carry all this people by myself, for it is too much for me. ¹⁵ If You would deal thus with me, kill me rather, I beg You, and let me see no more of my wretchedness!"

¹⁶ Then the LORD said to Moses, "Gather for Me seventy of Israel's elders of whom you have experience as elders and officers of the people, and bring them to the Tent of Meeting and let them take their place there with you. ¹⁷ I will come down and speak with you there, and I will draw upon the spirit that is on you and put it upon them; they shall share the burden of the people with you, and you shall not bear it alone. ¹⁸ And say to the people: "Purify yourselves" for tomorrow and you shall eat meat, for you have kept whining before the LORD and saying, 'If only we had meat to eat! Indeed, we were better off in Egypt!' The LORD will give you meat and you shall eat. ¹⁹ You shall eat not one day, not two, not even five days or ten or twenty, ²⁰ but a whole month, until it comes out of your nostrils and becomes loathsome to you. For you have rejected the LORD who is among you, by whining before Him and saying, 'Oh, why did we ever leave Egypt!' "

²¹ But Moses said, "The people ^bwho are with me ^bnumber six hundred thousand men; yet You say, 'I will give them enough meat to eat for a whole month.' ²² Could enough flocks and herds be slaughtered to suffice them? Or could all the fish of the sea be gathered for them to suffice them?" ²³ And the LORD answered Moses, "Is there a limit to the LORD's power? ^cYou shall soon see whether what I have said happens to you or not!"

²⁴ Moses went out and reported the words of the LORD to the people. He gathered seventy of the people's elders and stationed them around the Tent. ²⁵ Then the LORD came down in a cloud and spoke to him; He drew upon the spirit that was on him and put it upon the seventy elders. And when the spirit rested upon them, they ^dspoke in ecstasy, ^d but did not continue.

ciled in classical Jewish thought by suggesting that the manna could take on various flavors (see, e.g., m. Yoma 75a). 10-35: Utterly frustrated, Moses questions his heavy burden of leadership and his ability to succeed at it. He is ready to die if no relief comes. The point of this episode, including Moses' desire to satisfy the people, is to elicit divine solutions for the problems. Most important is the appointment of seventy elders to assist Moses. The judicial roles of Israel's elders are legitimated for all time because of their endowment with Moses' spirit. Simultaneously, this scene affirms Moses' human traits and limitations. God's solution to the meat crisis differs from an earlier rendition of the story. In Exod. ch 16, quail and manna are God's gift to Israel; here in Numbers the wording of their grievance bespeaks their desire to return to Egypt, clearly a rejection of God that warrants punishment. Therefore, when the quail finally arrive, many people become fatally ill from gorging themselves with meat. Appropriately, the place name for this event becomes Kibroth-hattaavah, "burials of the craving." 26-29: This account is connected to the broader story since both involve the transmission of some of Moses' "spirit" to other individuals (vv. 17, 26; cf. v. 31 which uses the same Hebrew word "ruah" in its other sense of "wind"). This story may reflect an ancient debate concerning whether there is only one legitimate prophet at a time, as assumed perhaps by Deut. 18.15-18, or if there may be many prophets in a single era.

had remained in camp; yet the spirit rested upon them—they were among those recorded, but they had not gone out to the Tent—and they “spoke in ecstasy” in the camp. ²⁷A youth ran out and told Moses, saying, “Eldad and Medad are acting the prophet in the camp!” ²⁸And Joshua son of Nun, Moses’ attendant from his youth, spoke up and said, “My lord Moses, restrain them!” ²⁹But Moses said to him, “Are you wrought up on my account? Would that all the LORD’s people were prophets, that the LORD put His spirit upon them!” ³⁰Moses then reentered the camp together with the elders of Israel.

³¹A wind from the LORD started up, swept quail from the sea and strewed them over the camp, about a day’s journey on this side and about a day’s journey on that side, all around the camp, and some two cubits deep on the ground. ³²The people set to gathering quail all that day and night and all the next day—even he who gathered least had ten homers—and they spread them out all around the camp. ³³The meat was still between their teeth, nor yet chewed,^b when the anger of the LORD blazed forth against the people and the LORD struck the people with a very severe plague. ³⁴That place was named Kibroth-hattaavah,^c because the people who had the craving were buried there.

12 When they were in Hazeroth, ¹Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses because of the Cushite woman he had married: “He married a Cushite woman!”

²They said, “Has the LORD spoken only through Moses? Has He not spoken through us as well?” The LORD heard it. ³Now Moses was a very humble man, more so than any other man on earth. ⁴Suddenly the LORD called to Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, “Come out, you three, to the Tent of Meeting.” So the three of them went out. ⁵The LORD came down in a pillar of cloud, stopped at the entrance of the Tent, and called out, “Aaron and Miriam!” The two of them came forward; ⁶and He said, “Hear these My words: ^dWhen a prophet of the LORD arises among you, I^d make Myself known to him in a vision, I speak with him in a dream. ⁷Not so with My ser-

12.1-16: Miriam and Aaron speak against Moses. Miriam and Aaron, like other Israelites, are subject to complaining. Their grievance against Moses is founded on two issues: his wife, and more seriously, his authority. This narrative continues the themes from the previous ch, namely, prophecy and the questioning of Moses’ leadership capabilities and his limitations. The first objection that Miriam and Aaron raise is to Moses’ marriage to a Cushite woman; the second questions his special role as a prophet. Moses remains silent in the face of these accusations so that God takes up his defense. The message of the narrative is clear: God chose Moses to be His unique prophet and no one, not even other key Israelite leaders, may challenge that decision. Miriam’s severe punishment underscores the point and makes clear that any other who arise to challenge Moses are doomed from the start.

1: He married a Cushite woman: Moses’ wife Zipporah is Midianite (Exod. 2.21). Two explanations are possible: (1) This reference is to Zipporah, “Cushan” being part of Midian (Hab. 3.7); (2) Moses married a second woman in Egypt, a Nubian (= Cush). The latter is more plausible since Nubia was part of the Egyptian empire and dark-skinned women were considered beautiful, as reflected in the Targum’s rendition of Cushite as “beautiful.” 3: Moses’ attribute of humility is underscored as praiseworthy. It stands in stark contrast to Miriam’s and Aaron’s arrogance. 6-8: These poetic vv. show an introverted, triangular-shaped, literary structure with v. 7 as the climax. God distinguishes Moses’ prophetic privileges from those accorded any other prophet. Moses can speak to God directly, in live dialogue rather than in dreams or visions. God is at His most anthropomorphic in these verses.

10: Snow-white scales: This disease is mentioned in Lev. ch 13 as one causing severe impurity that requires a seven-day purification process. It was previously identified as leprosy, but recent thinking vant Moses; he is trusted throughout My household.

 8 With him I speak mouth to mouth, plainly and not in riddles, and he beholds the likeness of the LORD. How then did you not shrink from speaking against My servant Moses!" 9 Still incensed with them, the LORD departed.

10 As the cloud withdrew from the Tent, there was Miriam stricken with snow-white scales!^a When Aaron turned toward Miriam, he saw that she was stricken with scales.
 11 And Aaron said to Moses, "O my lord, account not to us the sin which we committed in our folly. 12 Let her not be as one dead, who emerges from his mother's womb with half his flesh eaten away." 13 So Moses cried out to the LORD, saying, "O God, pray heal her!"

14 But the LORD said to Moses, "If her father spat in her face, would she not bear her shame for seven days? Let her be shut out of camp for seven days, and then let her be readmitted." 15 So Miriam was shut out of camp seven days; and the people did not march on until Miriam was readmitted. 16 After that the people set out from Hazereth and encamped in the wilderness of Paran.

rejects this in favor of curable skin diseases, since persons afflicted with this condition in the Bible are often cured after being quarantined. Furthermore, the symptoms of the disease do not correlate with leprosy (Hansen's disease). Disease, in general, was believed to be divine retribution for sin (2 Sam. 3.29). The Rabbis understood the name of the skin condition, "metzora," as indicative of its cause, the sin of slander, "motzi' shem ra'" ("uttering an evil name") (Lev. Rab. 16.1–6). They conclude that Miriam and not Aaron was punished because she instigated the gossip and vocalized it, as indicated by the feminine gender of the verb spoke in 12.1, and the placement of Miriam before Aaron. Ibn Ezra speculates that Aaron was silent or simply agreed. 13: "O God, pray heal her!": Moses' brief plea for Miriam is an example of biblical prose prayer. The terseness of Moses' prayer may reflect his disappointment with his siblings. Prayer expressed in poetic style, used for more public or ceremonial occasions, is far more common in the Bible; for example, Hannah's lengthy prayer of thanksgiving after Samuel's birth (1 Sam. ch 2). 14: If her father spat in her face: Apparently, this is an act of rebuke that entails shame plus seven days of banishment. Usually the purpose of spitting is to shame someone, but the custom of banishment is unknown (cf. Deut. 25.9). Seclusion outside the camp is undoubtedly related to a notion of impurity.

13.1–33: The scouts' expedition and report. The goal of this expedition is two-fold: to assess the strength of the indigenous population and the strongholds in which they reside, and to investigate the productivity of the land. This narrative is a conflation of at least two traditions that reflect different sources (JE and P). Discrepancies in the story revolve around two issues: What area of Canaan is scouted and how many scouts bring a positive report. In the earlier JE version the scouts reconnoiter the southern portion of Canaan (13.17); Caleb alone recommends that Israel proceed with the conquest (13.30). The Priestly account expands the scouting expedition over the entire land of Canaan (13.21); it adds Joshua as a spokesman for undertaking the conquest (14.6–9). 1–15: Moses

¹⁵ From the tribe of Gad, Geuel son of Machi.

¹⁷ When Moses sent them to scout the land of Canaan, he said to them, "Go up there into the Negeb and on into the hill country, ¹⁸ and see what kind of country it is. Are the people who dwell in it strong or weak, few or many?

¹⁹ Is the country in which they dwell good or bad? Are the towns they live in open or fortified? ²⁰ Is the soil rich or poor? Is it wooded or not? And take pains to bring back some of the fruit of the land."—Now it happened to be the season of the first ripe grapes.

²¹ They went up and scouted the land, from the wilderness of Zin to Rehob, at Lebo-hamath.^b ²² They went up into the Negeb and came to Hebron, where lived Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the Anakites.—Now Hebron was founded seven years before Zoan of Egypt.—²³ They reached the wadi Eshcol, and there they cut down a branch with a single cluster of grapes—it had to be borne on a carrying frame by two of them—and some pomegranates and figs. ²⁴ That place was named the wadi Eshcol^c because of the cluster that the Israelites cut down there.

²⁵ At the end of forty days they returned from scouting the land. ²⁶ They went straight to Moses and Aaron and the whole Israelite community at Kadesh in the wilderness of Paran, and they made their report to them and to the whole community, as they showed them the fruit of the land. ²⁷ This is what they told him: "We came to the land you sent us to; it does indeed flow with milk and honey, and this is its fruit. ²⁸ However, the people who inhabit the country are powerful, and the cities are fortified and very large; moreover, we saw the Anakites there. ²⁹ Amalekites dwell in the Negeb region; Hittites, Jebusites, and Amorites inhabit the hill country; and Canaanites dwell by the Sea and along the Jordan."

³² Thus they spread calumnies among the Israelites about the land they had scouted, saying, "The country that we traversed and scouted is one that devours its settlers. All chooses tribal leaders, presumably those trained for such a mission. Some rabbis take note of the fact that Moses chooses the scouts rather than asking God to do it (by lot). They attribute the ill-fated scouting expedition to Moses, assuming that God could foresee the scouts' sin (Num. Rab. 16.4).

16: Moses emends Joshua's name, Hosea (13.8), by adding the prefix "ye," possibly a theophoric element associated with the Israelite God. In the sources of the names of the tribal leaders, only Joshua's name bears such an element.

22: The gloss added to the mention of Hebron stresses the antiquity of that city which was David's capital for the first seven years of his reign (1 Kings 2.11). Zoan, the Egyptian capital city of Tanis, was (re)built at the same time as Jerusalem. 23: Grapes, pomegranates, and figs are late summer fruits.

24: This is an etiological account (origin story) for the name of the wadi, Eshcol—in Heb, a cluster of grapes. 22, 28, 33: Anakites, or giants, are mentioned in several texts (Deut. 2.11; Josh. 11.21–22).

An etiological account for the Nephilim is found in Gen. 6.1–4. The reference to Anakites in Joshua notes that even after the conquest some survived in Philistine cities (11.22). David's adversary Goliath, a Philistine from Gath, is depicted as a giant (1 Sam. 17.4) descended from a group of giants from Raphah (1 Chron. 20.5–6). The tall head-dresses of the Philistines may have contributed to their gigantic image. More importantly, the report of giants in the land makes the Canaanites more intimidating.

27: Flow with milk and honey: This biblical phrase describing the promised land (also Exod. 3.8, 17) has been preserved in Jewish tradition to modernity. Honey most likely refers to "honey" made of dates, since bee's honey was relatively rare (see Prov. 25.16). 29: For the indigenous population of Canaan, see the table of nations in Gen. 10.15–20; there is tremendous variability in the lists of these nations found in various texts.

the people that we saw in it are men of great size; ³³we saw the Nephilim^a there—the Anakites are part of the Nephilim—and we looked like grasshoppers to ourselves, and so we must have looked to them.”

14 The whole community broke into loud cries, and the people wept that night. ²All the Israelites railed against Moses and Aaron. “If only we had died in the land of Egypt,” the whole community shouted at them, “or if only we might die in this wilderness! ³Why is the LORD taking us to that land to fall by the sword? Our wives and children will be carried off! It would be better for us to go back to Egypt!” ⁴And they said to one another, “Let us ^bhead back for^b Egypt.”

⁵Then Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before all the assembled congregation of the Israelites. ⁶And Joshua son of Nun and Caleb son of Jephunneh, of those who had scouted the land, rent their clothes ⁷and exhorted the whole Israelite community: “The land that we traversed and scouted is an exceedingly good land. ⁸If the LORD is pleased with us, He will bring us into that land, a land that flows with milk and honey, and give it to us; ⁹only you must not rebel against the LORD. Have no fear then of the people of the country, for they are our prey:^c their protection has departed from them, but the LORD is with us. Have no fear of them!” ¹⁰As the whole community threatened to pelt them with stones, the Presence of the LORD appeared in the Tent of Meeting to all the Israelites.

¹¹And the LORD said to Moses, “How long will this people spurn Me, and how long will they have no faith in Me despite all the signs that I have performed in their midst? ¹²I will strike them with pestilence and disown them, and I will make of you a nation far more numerous than they!” ¹³But Moses said to the LORD, “When the Egyptians, from whose midst You brought up this people in Your might, hear the news, ¹⁴they will tell it to the inhabitants of that land. Now they have heard that You, O LORD, are in the midst of this people; that You, O LORD, appear in plain sight when Your cloud rests over them and when You go before them in a pillar of cloud by day and in a pillar of fire by night. ¹⁵If then You slay this people to a man, the nations who have heard Your fame will say, ¹⁶‘It must be because the LORD was powerless to bring that people into the land He had promised them on oath that He slaugh-

30: The place of Judah is again emphasized, as Caleb the Judean (see v. 6) is represented as the faithful scout. 32: Canaan as a country that devours its settlers may refer to the land’s infertility. More likely, however, the metaphor alludes to the results of frequent warfare (cf. Ezek. 36.13–14).

14.1–45: Aftermath of the scouting expedition. In the continuous cycle of rebellions, this one constitutes the most serious. The ten scouts who incite the populace advocate abandoning Israel’s ultimate goal, to settle the promised land. The fear they instill in the Israelites supersedes the memory of Egyptian oppression. This extreme display of faithlessness before God exacts the ultimate punishment, forty years of wandering in the desert and the death of the exodus generation. 4: Let us head back: This phrase can also be translated, “Let us appoint a leader,” indicating that the Israelites were ready to replace Moses and return to Egypt under new leadership. 6–10: Rending the garment is a sign of mourning that has survived in modern times, albeit a ribbon sometimes substitutes for an article of clothing. Joshua and Caleb are not only frustrated by the negative report of the other scouts but they fear God’s harsh punishment, as evidenced by their plea to the people not to rebel against God. The imminence of Israel’s rebellion is apparent by the people’s intent to stone Moses and Aaron, and probably also Joshua and Caleb (cf. Exod. 17.4). The Presence of the LORD (v. 10) is God’s typical manner of manifestation in Priestly material. 11–19: Here God is prepared to eradicate all Israel save Moses (cf. Exod. 32.10). He offers to create a new people from the descendants of Moses. Moses’ initial argument centers on preserving God’s reputation among the nations (cf. Ezek. 36.16–36; 39.21–29); his second argument appeals to God’s attribute of mercy (see Exod. 34.6–7 in the context of the second set of Decalogue tered them in the wilderness.’¹⁷ Therefore, I pray, let my Lord’s forbearance be great, as You have declared, saying,^a 18 ‘The LORD! slow to anger and abounding in kindness; forgiving iniquity and transgression; yet not remitting all punishment, but visiting the iniquity of fathers upon children, upon the third and fourth generations.’¹⁹ Pardon, I pray, the iniquity of this people according to Your great kindness, as You have forgiven this people ever since Egypt.”

²⁰ And the LORD said, “I pardon, as you have asked. ²¹ Nevertheless, as I live and as the LORD’s Presence fills the whole world, ²² none of the men who have seen My Presence and the signs that I have performed in Egypt and in the wilderness, and who have tried Me these many^b times and have disobeyed Me, ²³ shall see the land that I promised on oath to their fathers; none of those who spurn Me shall see it. ²⁴ But My servant Caleb, because he was imbued with a different spirit and remained loyal to Me—him will I bring into the land that he entered, and his offspring shall hold it as a possession. ²⁵ Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites occupy the valleys. Start out, then, tomorrow and march into the wilderness by way of the Sea of Reeds.”^c

²⁶ The LORD spoke further to Moses and Aaron, ²⁷ “How much longer shall that wicked community keep muttering against Me? Very well, I have heeded the incessant muttering of the Israelites against Me. ²⁸ Say to them: ‘As I live,’ says the LORD, ‘I will do to you just as you have urged Me. ²⁹ In this very wilderness shall your carcasses drop. Of all of you who were recorded in your various lists from the age of twenty years up, you who have muttered against Me, ³⁰ not one shall enter the land in which I swore^d to settle you—save Caleb son of Jephunneh and Joshua son of Nun. ³¹ Your children who, you said, would be carried off—these will I allow to enter; they shall know the land that you have rejected. ³² But your carcasses shall drop in this wilderness, ³³ while your children roam the wilderness for forty years, suffering for your faithlessness, until the last of your carcasses is down in the wilderness. ³⁴ You shall bear your punishment for forty years, corresponding to the number of days—forty days—that you scouted the land: a year for each day. Thus you shall know what it means to thwart Me. ³⁵ I the LORD have spoken: Thus will I do to all that wicked band that has banded together against Me: in this very wilderness they shall die to the last man.’ ” tablets). The long prayer of Moses after the entire nation sins grievously stands in marked contrast to his short prayer on behalf of his sister in 12.13.

18: Visiting the iniquity of fathers upon children, a quotation of the divine attributes found in the Decalogue (Exod. 20.5-6; Deut. 5.9-10) and in Exod. 34.6-7. 20-38: God reduces the people’s punishment: The entire nation will not be wiped out immediately, but the current generation will not inherit Canaan. The rebellious adult generation will perish in the desert according to their wish (14.2).

21, 28: As I live is an oath formula.

36-37: The ten scouts who incited the rebellion with their negative report die in a plague on the spot.

39-45: The people attempt to invade Canaan either because they regret their previous behavior and lack of trust in God, or because they hope to reverse God’s decree. In any case, the invasion fails and they are defeated. The writer’s message here is clear: Without God’s blessing and Presence (accompanying the Ark) conquest is impossible. The function of the Ark in the military camp is also emphasized in the passage.

³⁶As for the men whom Moses sent to scout the land, those who came back and caused the whole community to mutter against him by spreading calumnies about the land—³⁷those who spread such calumnies about the land died of plague, by the will of the LORD. ³⁸Of those men who had gone to scout the land, only Joshua son of Nun and Caleb son of Jephunneh survived.

³⁹When Moses repeated these words to all the Israelites, the people were overcome by grief. ⁴⁰Early next morning they set out toward the crest of the hill country, saying, “We are prepared to go up to the place that the LORD has spoken of, for we were wrong.” ⁴¹But Moses said, “Why do you transgress the LORD’s command? This will not succeed. ⁴²Do not go up, lest you be routed by your enemies, for the LORD is not in your midst. ⁴³For the Amalekites and the Canaanites will be there to face you, and you will fall by the sword, inasmuch as you have turned from following the LORD and the LORD will not be with you.”

⁴⁴Yet defiantly^a they marched toward the crest of the hill country, though neither the LORD’s Ark of the Covenant nor Moses stirred from the camp. ⁴⁵And the Amalekites and the Canaanites who dwelt in that hill country came down and dealt them a shattering blow at Hormah.

15 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

When you enter the land that I am giving you to settle in, ³and would present an offering by fire to the LORD from the herd or from the flock, be it burnt offering or sacrifice, in fulfillment of a vow explicitly uttered,^b or as a freewill offering, or at your fixed occasions, producing an odor pleasing to the LORD:

⁴The person who presents the offering to the LORD shall bring as a meal offering: a tenth of a measure of choice flour with a quarter of a hin of oil mixed in. ⁵You shall also offer, with the burnt offering or the sacrifice, a quarter of a hin of wine as a libation for each sheep.

⁶In the case of a ram, you shall present as a meal offering: two-tenths of a measure of choice flour with a third of a hin of oil mixed in; ⁷and a third of a hin of wine as a libation—as an offering of pleasing odor to the LORD.

⁸And if it is an animal from the herd that you offer to the LORD as a burnt offering or as a sacrifice, in fulfillment of a vow explicitly uttered or as an offering of well-being, ⁹there shall be offered a meal offering along with the animal: three-tenths of a measure of choice flour with half a

15.1–41: A variety of laws. The narrative of the forty years in the wilderness is interrupted here by the insertion of legal material. Medieval commentators suggest that the placement of the laws, immediately following the condemnation of the adult generation to death in the desert, reiterates God’s promise that the children will indeed inherit Canaan, thus the introduction to the first two sets of laws; When you enter the land (vv. 2, 18). The first set of laws deals with accompaniments to the sacrifices: meal, oil, and wine (vv. 1–16). These are followed by the bread dough offering, “halah” (vv. 17–21), and then by those sacrifices required for individual or communal inadvertent violations of any law (vv. 22–31). The delineation of laws is interrupted by a case study that contrasts the preceding type of violations. That case entails extreme, willful breaking of the law through the desecration of the Sabbath (vv. 32–36). The prescriptive passages resume with the commandment to wear fringes, tzitzit, on one’s garment (vv. 37–41). The purpose of the fringes, to remind the wearer of God’s laws, clearly ties into the previous case of the Sabbath breaker. Ibn Ezra maintains that the fringes are worn on the outer everyday garment, in addition to the prayer shawl, for that explicit purpose. 3–16: Animal burnt offerings and offerings of well-being are accompanied by a grain and oil mixture and wine (Lev. chs 1–3) reminiscent of a complete meal. In the case of sacrifices, the meal is for the deity. Although the Bible describes these offerings as producing an odor pleasing to the LORD, it never states that God actually eats them. 5: Hin is an Egyptian measure equal to approximately 4 liters (1 gal).

hin of oil mixed in; ¹⁰and as libation you shall offer half a hin of wine—these being offerings by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD.

¹¹Thus shall be done with each ox, with each ram, and with any sheep or goat, ¹²as many as you offer; you shall do thus with each one, as many as there are. ¹³Every citizen, when presenting an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD, shall do so with them.

¹⁴And when, throughout the ages, a stranger who has taken up residence with you, or one who lives among you, would present an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD—as you do, so ^ashall it be done by ¹⁵the rest of the congregation.^a There shall be one law for you and for the resident stranger; it shall be a law for all time throughout the ages. You and the stranger shall be alike before the LORD; ¹⁶the same ritual and the same rule shall apply to you and to the stranger who resides among you.

¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁸Speak to the Israelite people and say to them:

When you enter the land to which I am taking you ¹⁹and you eat of the bread of the land, you shall set some aside as a gift to the LORD: ²⁰as the first yield of your baking,^b you shall set aside a loaf as a gift; you shall set it aside as a gift like the gift from the threshing floor. ²¹You shall make a gift to the LORD from the first yield of your baking, throughout the ages.

²²If you unwittingly fail to observe any one of the commandments that the LORD has declared to Moses—²³anything that the LORD has enjoined upon you through Moses—from the day that the LORD gave the commandment and on through the ages:

²⁴If this was done unwittingly, through the inadvertence of the community, the whole community shall present one bull of the herd as a burnt offering of pleasing odor to the LORD, with its proper meal offering and libation, and one he-goat as a sin offering. ²⁵The priest shall make expiation for the whole Israelite community and they shall be forgiven; for it was an error, and for their error they have brought their offering, an offering by fire to the LORD and their sin offering before the LORD. ²⁶The whole Israelite community and the stranger residing among them shall be forgiven, for it happened to the entire people through error.

14–16: In most matters, including sacrificial matters (except for the paschal lamb, see Exod. 12.48), the resident alien must be treated as the native Israelite. 17–21: The dough offering is the first part of the dough prepared in the kneading basin, somewhat analogous to the first-fruits offering, though the latter is a once-a-year event (Lev. 19.24–25; 23.10–11). The dough is given to the priest; in turn, the homes of the Israelites are blessed (cf. Ezek. 44.30). According to the Rabbis in the Talmud, this “ḥalah” offering brings blessings to the nonfarmer as well because it constitutes his labor (b. Shab. 32b). The sweet Sabbath bread is called “ḥalah” after this custom. 22–31: This section continues the previous one. Sacrifices for inadvertent violations are applicable to all laws (for more details, see Lev. ch 4). 29: One ritual, more correctly, “one law” (“torah”) applies to both Israelites and alien residents. Breaking a law has a negative effect on the “terra sancta,” therefore an expiation is required of all inhabitants. 30–31: Defiant, willful violation of ritual law cannot be expiated in the manner of an inadvertent sin. “Karet,” the cutting off of a person, is a punishment enacted by the divine. What constitutes the punishment is not defined here but can be gleaned from other biblical passages which indicate punishments affecting both the sinner and his progeny (e.g., Mal. 2.12; Ps. 109.13). Traditional Jewish interpretation includes childlessness, early death, and/or the death of the soul together with the body at the time of death. 32–36: The case of the wood gatherer is distinct from the above. It illustrates a most severe violation of ritual law, the desecration of the Sabbath which is a capital offense, here punished by stoning (cf. Exod. 31.14). It is possible that Moses here asks God what to do because earlier legislative texts note that the punishment is death, but are unclear about whether it should be carried out by people or God (Exod. 31.14–15). 35–36: God

²⁸The priest shall make expiation before the LORD on behalf of the person who erred, for he sinned unwittingly, making such expiation for him that he may be forgiven.

²⁹For the citizen among the Israelites and for the stranger who resides among them—you shall have one ritual for anyone who acts in error.

³⁰But the person, be he citizen or stranger, who acts defiantly^a reviles the LORD; that person shall be cut off from among his people. ³¹Because he has spurned the word of the LORD and violated His commandment, that person shall be cut off—he bears his guilt.

³²Once, when the Israelites were in the wilderness, they came upon a man gathering wood on the sabbath day.

³³Those who found him as he was gathering wood brought him before Moses, Aaron, and the whole community. ³⁴He was placed in custody, for it had not been specified what should be done to him. ³⁵Then the LORD said to Moses, “The man shall be put to death: the whole community shall pelt him with stones outside the camp.” ³⁶So the whole community took him outside the camp and stoned him to death—as the LORD had commanded Moses.

³⁷The LORD said to Moses as follows: ³⁸Speak to the Israelite people and instruct them to make for themselves fringes on the corners of their garments throughout the ages; let them attach a cord of blue to the fringe at each corner. ³⁹That shall be your fringe; look at it and recall all the commandments of the LORD and observe them, so that you do not follow your heart and eyes in your lustful urge. ⁴⁰Thus you shall be reminded to observe all My commandments and to be holy to your God. ⁴¹I the LORD am your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God: I, the LORD your God.

Himself sentences the violator. Stoning signifies the serious nature of the infraction, which is an affront to the entire community.

37–41: The fringes or tassels on the corners of the outer garments

call the Israelites to action regarding the fulfillment of the commandments. Remembering, Heb “zakhar,” is often a verb of action rather than simply thought (e.g., Gen. 8.1; 30.22; Exod. 12.14). In antiquity, fringes were common on Canaanite and Mesopotamian dress. Prophets from the Babylonian city of Mari legitimated their oracles before the king by sending a fringe from their garment, which is a symbolic way of sending part of themselves, like a signature. The imprinting of fringes on clay tablets, like the touching of the fringe of the prayer shawl to the Torah today when one is called to the Torah during its reading, is a way of verifying or endorsing the written document. Like garments and hair, fringes are considered part of the individual’s identity, and by giving them to the ruler, a person is pledging his loyalty. It is no accident that the violet-blue wool cord that must be attached to the fringes (according to P) is identical to the cord that hangs from the priest’s headdress (Exod. 28.37). The tzitzit on the garments of Israelites identifies them as being holy to God and symbolically connects them to the priests. Thereby, Israelites pledge their loyalty to God as well as to the priests who oversee the laws (cf. the nonspecific garment fringes called “gedilim” [lit. “twisted threads”] in Deut. 22.12). Modern prayer shawls, tallit (sing.), and the small tallit, worn daily under the shirt by observant Jews, no longer require a violet-blue cord for their tzitzit. That aspect of the commandment was suspended in talmudic times because of the scarcity and expense of the blue dye derived from the murex snail. Most likely because of the reference “to observe all My commandments,” this paragraph came to be recited daily as part of the Shema prayer (see Deut. 6.4). 41: The redemption from Egyptian slavery is often employed as grounds for Israelite allegiance to God (Exod. 6.7; 20.2–3; Lev. 11.45; Deut. 26.17–19).

16.1–35: The rebellions of Korah and Dathan and Abiram. These rebellions against the divinely appointed leadership of Moses and Aaron constitute public defiance that requires swift and harsh retridred and fifty Israelites, chieftains of the community, chosen in the assembly, men of repute. ³They combined against Moses and Aaron and said to them, "You have gone too far! For all the community are holy, all of them, and the LORD is in their midst. Why then do you raise yourselves above the LORD's congregation?"

⁴When Moses heard this, he fell on his face. ⁵Then he spoke to Korah and all his company, saying, "Come morning, the LORD will make known who is His and who is holy, and will grant him access to Himself; He will grant access to the one He has chosen. ⁶Do this: You, Korah and all your^b band, take fire pans, ⁷and tomorrow put fire in them and lay incense on them before the LORD. Then the man whom the LORD chooses, he shall be the holy one. You have gone too far, sons of Levi!"

⁸Moses said further to Korah, "Hear me, sons of Levi. ⁹Is it not enough for you that the God of Israel has set you apart from the community of Israel and given you access to Him, to perform the duties of the LORD's Tabernacle and to minister to the community and serve them? ¹⁰Now that He has advanced you and all your fellow Levites with you, do you seek the priesthood too? ¹¹Truly, it is against the LORD that you and all your company have banded together. For who is Aaron that you should rail against him?"

¹²Moses sent for Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab; but they said, "We will not come! ¹³Is it not enough that you brought us from a land flowing with milk and honey to have us die in the wilderness, that you would also lord it over us? ¹⁴^cEven if you had^c brought us to a land flowing with milk and honey, and given us possession of fields and vineyards, should you gouge out those men's eyes?^d We will not come!" ¹⁵Moses was much aggrieved and he said to the LORD, "Pay no regard to their oblation. I have not taken the ass of any one of them, nor have I wronged any one of them."

¹⁶And Moses said to Korah, "Tomorrow, you and all your company appear before the LORD, you and they and Aaron. ¹⁷Each of you take his fire pan and lay incense on it, and each of you bring his fire pan before the LORD, two hundred and fifty fire pans; you and Aaron also [bring] your fire pans." ¹⁸Each of them took his fire pan, put fire in it, laid incense on it, and took his place at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, as did Moses and Aaron. ¹⁹Korah bution. Like other rebellions in the wilderness, these begin with a few individuals and spread to the community at large. At least two insurrection stories are interwoven by the redactor. One involves Korah, a Kohathite Levite who demands a share in the Aaronite priesthood; the second has three Reubenites, two brothers, Dathan and Abiram, and a third individual, On, questioning the authority of Moses. The rebel leaders assemble followers. Defiance of Moses is clearly tied to miseries of the wilderness experience and doubts surrounding the eventual settlement of Canaan. On the other hand, the challenge of Aaron deals with the legitimacy of the priests' exclusive position vis-à-vis the Levites, who had a secondary role in the cult that was much less prestigious than the priestly role. Both situations are resolved by divine wrath. In the case of Dathan and Abiram, they, their families, and all their possessions are literally swallowed up by the earth. In a twist of fate, they who had refused to come (up) to Moses (v. 12), went down into the earth (v. 33). Korah's contingent is first offered a test to settle the matter of the priesthood for all time. For their punishment, they who had sought the right to make fire for God's offerings are consumed themselves by divine fire.

1: Descendants of Reuben: This story may help to explain why the tribe of Reuben, the first-born, was supplanted by Judah. In fact, Ibn Ezra maintains that Reubenites challenged Moses because he did not give them their just due as descendants of Jacob's first-born. Instead he chose Joshua, an Ephraimite of the House of Joseph, as his assistant. 2: Two hundred and fifty Israelite chieftains join the uprising against Moses (v. 2), though later these chieftains are connected to the Levites who challenge Aaron (v. 35). This is a clear example of a redactor tightly weaving two separate accounts. 3: All the community are holy: Korah's group argues against the notion that only the priests are sanctified to perform religious rituals. The fact that Korah gathered the whole community against them at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting.

Then the Presence of the LORD appeared to the whole community,²⁰ and the LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying,²¹ “Stand back from this community that I may annihilate them in an instant!”²² But they fell on their faces and said, “O God, Source^a of the breath of all flesh! When one man sins, will You be wrathful with the whole community?”

²³The LORD spoke to Moses, saying,²⁴ “Speak to the community and say: Withdraw from about the abodes of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.”

²⁵Moses rose and went to Dathan and Abiram, the elders of Israel following him. ²⁶He addressed the community, saying, “Move away from the tents of these wicked men and touch nothing that belongs to them, lest you be wiped out for all their sins.” ²⁷So they withdrew from about the abodes of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

Now Dathan and Abiram had come out and they stood at the entrance of their tents, with their wives, their children, and their little ones. ²⁸And Moses said, “By this you shall know that it was the LORD who sent me to do all these things; that they are not of my own devising: ²⁹if these men die as all men do, if their lot be the common fate of all mankind, it was not the LORD who sent me. ³⁰But if the LORD brings about something unheard-of, so that the ground opens its mouth and swallows them up with all that belongs to them, and they go down alive into Sheol, you shall know that these men have spurned the LORD.” ³¹Scarcely had he finished speaking all these words when the ground under them burst asunder,³² and the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them up with their households, all Korah’s people and all their possessions. ³³They went down alive into Sheol, with all that belonged to them; the earth closed over them and they vanished from the midst of the congregation. ³⁴All Israel around them fled at their shrieks, for they said, “The earth might swallow us!”

³⁵And a fire went forth from the LORD and consumed the two hundred and fifty men offering the incense.

17 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Order Eleazar son of Aaron the priest to remove the fire pans—for they have become sacred—from among the charred remains; and scatter the coals abroad. ³^b[Remove] the fire pans of those who have sinned at the cost of their lives, and his followers are proven wrong demonstrates that popular holiness attached to the tzitzit (15.40) still renders wearers subordinate to priests. The people’s holiness derives from their obligation to follow the commandments (Lev. 19.2). 8–11: Moses rebukes Korah and the Levites for not being satisfied with their God-appointed positions as guardians of the Tabernacle. Their sin is challenging God’s authority rather than that of Aaron. 13–14: The rebels call Egypt a land flowing with milk and honey, thus attributing the bounty of the promised land to Egypt, the land of enslavement. 15: Moses defends his conduct as an honorable leader. The prophet Samuel responds similarly when the Israelites demand that a king replace him (1 Sam. 12.3). The prayer for their punishment sharply contrasts with Moses’ other prayers for the nation’s forgiveness. 16–18: It is not specified that the fire which burnt the incense in the Levites’ fire pans was taken from the altar. Thus, their sin may be compounded by the use of unauthorized fire (cf. Nadab and Abihu, Lev. 10.1–2). 20–22: Apparently God is ready to annihilate Israel. Moses and Aaron appeal to God as creator of humanity (v. 22a) and appeal to His sense of justice: Sin must be punished individually rather than communally (v. 22b; see Ezek. ch 18). 33: Sheol is the underworld, the place where the dead, both the righteous and the sinners, dwell (1 Kings 2.6; Isa. 14.9–20). 35: Korah is not mentioned as having died in the LORD’s fire, although it is implied that he did (cf. 26.10, Korah perishes with Dotham and Amiram). The phrase a fire went forth from the LORD and consumed is used in Lev. 10.2 as well, in reference to Nadab and Abihu, thereby connecting these two units that focus on improper worship of God.

17.1–18.7: The aftermath of Korah’s insurrection. This ch continues the previous story, tying up some loose ends. First, the copper fire pans of the Levites, which and let them be made into hammered sheets as plating for the altar—for once they have been used for offering to the LORD, they have become sacred—and let them serve as a warning to the people of Israel. ⁴Eleazar the priest took the copper fire pans which had been used for offering by those who died in the fire; and they were hammered into plating for the altar, ⁵as the LORD had ordered him through Moses. It was to be a reminder to the Israelites, so that no outsider—one not of Aaron's offspring—should presume to offer incense before the LORD and suffer the fate of Korah and his band.

⁶Next day the whole Israelite community railed against Moses and Aaron, saying, "You two have brought death upon the LORD's people!" ⁷But as the community gathered against them, Moses and Aaron turned toward the Tent of Meeting; the cloud had covered it and the Presence of the LORD appeared.

⁸When Moses and Aaron reached the Tent of Meeting, ⁹the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ¹⁰"Remove yourselves from this community, that I may annihilate them in an instant." They fell on their faces. ¹¹Then Moses said to Aaron, "Take the fire pan, and put on it fire from the altar. Add incense and take it quickly to the community and make expiation for them. For wrath has gone forth from the LORD: the plague has begun!" ¹²Aaron took it, as Moses had ordered, and ran to the midst of the congregation, where the plague had begun among the people. He put on the incense and made expiation for the people; ¹³he stood between the dead and the living until the plague was checked. ¹⁴Those who died of the plague came to fourteen thousand and seven hundred, aside from those who died on account of Korah. ¹⁵Aaron then returned to Moses at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, since the plague was checked.

¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁷Speak to the Israelite people and take from them—from the chieftains of their ancestral houses^a—one staff for each chieftain of an ancestral house: twelve staffs in all. Inscribe each man's name on his staff, ¹⁸there being one staff for each head of an ancestral house; also inscribe Aaron's name on the staff of Levi. ¹⁹Deposit them in the Tent of Meeting before the Pact, where I meet with you. ²⁰The staff of the man whom I choose shall sprout, and I will rid^b Myself of the incessant mutterings of the Israelites against you.

²¹Moses spoke thus to the Israelites. Their chieftains

were exposed to divine fire, must be preserved since they are sacred. Second, the Israelites who question the fate of their rebel leaders are punished by plague. Third, the absolute divinely ordained authority of the Aaronide Levites is confirmed in the test of the staffs. Fourth, the Aaronide priests and their Levite subordinates take all sanctuary responsibilities and consequences of misconduct upon themselves. 17.3–5: The fire pans rescued from the conflagration become copper plating for the altar, thereby serving as a warning sign, a visible reminder, aimed at stopping future would-be encroachers on the Tabernacle. The same Heb terms are used to describe the function of the tefillin (phylacteries) in Exod. 13.9, and the rainbow at the end of the flood story, though in that account God is the one being reminded (Gen. 9.12–17). These words refer to an action or object that is of symbolic rather than intrinsic significance. 6–15: The Israelite community blames Moses and Aaron for the death of their leaders, here called the LORD's people, so Moses and Aaron must act to show that God is responsible. It is thus Aaron's expiation ritual that halts the plague. Similarly, David stops a plague by building an altar and offering a sacrifice on it (2 Sam. 24.18–25). The efficacy of ritual is apparent in both accounts. 16–26: By collecting a staff from each tribal chieftain, the election of the tribe of Levi for sanctuary duties and the Aaronides as priests is reconfirmed. Aaron's name is inscribed on the staff of Levi, thus affirming his clan's status among the Levites. The contest, however, is not to determine who among the Levites can function as priests, as that issue was already settled with the death of Korah's group. 19: In the Tent of Meeting before the Pact: The staffs are placed in front of the deity, or more correctly at His throne, the Ark. 23: Aaron's staff not only sprouts but it produces blossoms which in turn develop into almonds overnight. The sprouting of a staff or pillar for the gave him a staff for each chieftain of an ancestral house, twelve staffs in all; among these staffs was that of Aaron. ²²Moses deposited the staffs before the LORD, in the Tent of the Pact. ²³The next day Moses entered the Tent of the Pact, and there the staff of Aaron of the house of Levi had sprouted: it had brought forth sprouts, produced blossoms, and borne almonds. ²⁴Moses then brought out all the staffs from before the LORD to all the Israelites; each identified and recovered his staff.

²⁵The LORD said to Moses, "Put Aaron's staff back before the Pact, to be kept as a lesson to rebels, so that their mutterings against Me may cease, lest they die." ²⁶This Moses did; just as the LORD had commanded him, so he did.

²⁷But the Israelites said to Moses, "Lo, we perish! We are lost, all of us lost! ²⁸Everyone who so much as ventures near the LORD's Tabernacle must die. Alas, we are doomed to perish!"

18 The LORD said to Aaron: You and your sons and the ancestral house under your charge shall bear any guilt connected with the sanctuary; you and your sons alone shall bear any guilt connected with your priesthood. ²You shall also associate with yourself your kinsmen the tribe of Levi, your ancestral tribe, to be attached to you and to minister to you, while you and your sons under your charge are before the Tent of the Pact.^a ³They shall discharge their duties to you and to the Tent as a whole, but they must not have any contact with the furnishings of the Shrine or with the altar, lest both they and you die. ⁴They shall be attached to you and discharge the duties of the Tent of Meeting, all the service of the Tent; but no outsider shall intrude upon you ⁵as you discharge the duties connected with the Shrine and the altar, that wrath may not again strike the Israelites.

⁶I hereby take your fellow Levites from among the Israelites; they are assigned to you in dedication to the LORD, to do the work of the Tent of Meeting; ⁷while you and your sons shall be careful to perform your priestly duties in everything pertaining to the altar and to what is behind the curtain. I make your priesthood a service of dedication; any outsider who encroaches shall be put to death.

⁸The LORD spoke further to Aaron: I hereby give you charge of My gifts, all the sacred donations of the Israelites; I grant them to you and to your sons as a perquisite,^b purpose of identifying a hero or priest is also known from Herodotus (IV.67–68). Almonds are considered among the choicest products of Canaan (Gen. 43.11).

25: Aaron's staff is placed in the sanctuary as a warning sign, like the copper plating of fire pans on the altar. Alternatively, Aaron's staff was kept as a memorial attesting God's choice of Aaron (Rashi). 27–28: The people fear that even approaching the Tabernacle could constitute encroachment and result in death. 18.1: God speaks to Aaron directly rather than through Moses (only in this ch and in Lev. 10.8). The priests are responsible to keep other priests who are in a state of cultic impurity out of the sanctuary (Exod. 28.43; 30.20; Lev. 10.9; 16.2; 21.23). 2–5: Levite guard duties concerning the Tabernacle and its contents protect the Israelites from the consequences of encroachment. These verses also contain a popular or folk etymology of Levites: They are the cultic functionaries who are attached to (vv. 2 and 4, from the root "l-v-h") the priests.

18.8–32: Compensation for the priests and Levites. This section, which by and large repeats Priestly legislation found in other books of the Torah, continues the subject of the previous section by delineating a system of compensation for priestly and Levitic services. In their responsibilities vis-à-vis the Tabernacle, religious functionaries work on behalf of the people, who, in turn, support them and their families. Regular tax revenues designated for the sanctuary satisfy those needs. Naturally, those holding the highest status and charged with the most sacred duties, the priests, are allocated the most desirable gifts, those marked "holy to the LORD, for the priests" (Lev. 23.20). Priestly portions are divided into two categories most sacred and sacred, and accordingly, are designated for consumption by only pure males in the sacred precinct, and by their female relatives living at home, rea due for all time.⁹ This shall be yours from the most holy sacrifices, ^athe offerings by fire:^a every such offering that they render to Me as most holy sacrifices, namely, every meal offering, sin offering, and guilt offering of theirs, shall belong to you and your sons.¹⁰ You shall partake of them as most sacred donations: only males may eat them; you shall treat them as consecrated.^b

¹¹ This, too, shall be yours: the gift offerings^c of their contributions, all the elevation offerings of the Israelites, I give to you, to your sons, and to the daughters that are with you, as a due for all time; everyone of your household who is clean may eat it.

¹² All the best of the new oil, wine, and grain—the choice parts that they present to the LORD—I give to you.¹³ The first fruits of everything in their land, that they bring to the LORD, shall be yours; everyone of your household who is clean may eat them.¹⁴ Everything that has been proscribed in Israel^d shall be yours.¹⁵ The first issue of the womb of every being, man or beast, that is offered to the LORD, shall be yours; but you shall have the first-born of man redeemed, and you shall also have the firstling of unclean animals redeemed.¹⁶ Take as their redemption price,^e from the age of one month up, the money equivalent of five shekels by the sanctuary weight, which is twenty gerahs.¹⁷ But the firstlings of cattle, sheep, or goats may not be redeemed; they are consecrated. You shall dash their blood against the altar, and turn their fat into smoke as an offering by fire for a pleasing odor to the LORD.¹⁸ But their meat shall be yours: it shall be yours like the breast of elevation offering and like the right thigh.

¹⁹ All the sacred gifts that the Israelites set aside for the LORD I give to you, to your sons, and to the daughters that are with you, as a due for all time. It shall be an everlasting covenant of salt^f before the LORD for you and for your offspring as well.²⁰ And the LORD said to Aaron: You shall, however, have no territorial share among them or own any portion in their midst; I am your portion and your share among the Israelites.

spectively. A statement regarding these priestly emoluments is found in the writings of the prophet Ezekiel, himself a priest (44.29–30). The Levites, on the other hand, receive the tithes.

9–10: Most sacred includes that part of purification (NJPS “sin”) and guilt offerings which is not burnt (see Lev. 6.1–7.10).

11–18: “Sacred” is a much larger category which includes the following: portions of nonsacrificial gifts and elevation offerings (see Lev. 7.11–38); offerings of first fruits, grain, wine, and oil (see Exod. 23.16–19; Lev. 2.14; 23.17–18; Deut. 18.4; 26.1–11); anything proscribed or dedicated that becomes the property of the LORD under the law of “herem” (the ban; see Lev. 27.21, 28–29; Deut. 7.26; Josh. chs 6–7); all human and animal first-born males, both those to be redeemed—man and animals unfit for sacrifice—and those animals sacrificed (see Exod. 13.2, 11–13; 22.28; 34.19–20; Lev. 27.1–13; Deut. 12.17; 14.23; 15.19–23). 16: For the values of the sanctuary weight, the shekel, and “gerah” see 3.47 n.

19: An everlasting covenant of salt: Salt, a valuable food preservative, is symbolic of the permanence of the covenant agreement. It is used with sacrifices (Lev. 2.13; 2 Chron. 13.5). Based on this v., the Rabbis maintain that the covenant between the priests and God is eternal, even following the destruction of the Temple and the end of the sacrificial system (Lev. Rab. 24.2). This explains why in some contemporary groups of Judaism, the priests retain certain privileges, such as blessing the congregation (see 6.22–27) or being called first to the Torah. 20: I am your portion: The personal name Hilkiyah, “Yah (the LORD) is my portion,” which is the name of several priests (2 Kings 22.10; Ezra 7.1; 1 Chron. 5.39; and on the personal seal of a priest), reflects the sense of this phrase. 21–24: Laws concerning tithes are outlined in Lev. 27.30–32 and Deut. 12.17–19; 14.22–29. 25–32: Levites are compensated for their service by the tithes. They are required to donate to the vices of the Tent of Meeting; others^a would incur guilt. It is the law for all time throughout the ages. But they shall have no territorial share among the Israelites;²⁴ for it is the tithes set aside by the Israelites as a gift to the LORD that I give to the Levites as their share. Therefore I have said concerning them: They shall have no territorial share among the Israelites.

²⁵The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²⁶Speak to the Levites and say to them: When you receive from the Israelites their tithes, which I have assigned to you as your share, you shall set aside from them one-tenth of the tithe as a gift to the LORD. ²⁷This shall be accounted to you as your gift. As with the new grain from the threshing floor or the flow from the vat, ²⁸so shall you on your part set aside a gift for the LORD from all the tithes that you receive from the Israelites; and from them you shall bring the gift for the LORD to Aaron the priest. ²⁹You shall set aside all gifts due to the LORD from everything that is donated to you, from each thing its best portion, the part thereof that is to be consecrated.

³⁰Say to them further: When you have removed the best part from it, you Levites may consider it the same as the yield of threshing floor or vat. ³¹You and your households may eat it anywhere, for it is your recompense for your services in the Tent of Meeting. ³²You will incur no guilt through it, once you have removed the best part from it; but you must not profane the sacred donations of the Israelites, lest you die.

19 The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying: ²This is the ritual law that the LORD has commanded:

Instruct the Israelite people to bring you a red cow without blemish, in which there is no defect and on which no yoke has been laid. ³You shall give it to Eleazar the priest. It shall be taken outside the camp and slaughtered in his priests one-tenth of the tithes that they collect, however. Thus, Levites are obligated to pay tithes like other Israelites; only priests are exempt. This final section of the ch is an addition or amendment to the law in Leviticus.

19.1–22: Ritual of purification with the ashes of a red cow. Contamination through contact with a corpse, or any part thereof, whether by actual touch or through proximity in an enclosed space, is considered a severe impurity (cf. 5.1–4) requiring a complex purification process. While impurities in general are discussed elsewhere (Lev. chs 11–15), the process of erasing corpse pollution is delineated only here (and briefly in 31.19–24 in connection with combat). Contaminated persons or objects must be cleansed lest they communicate their contagious state to other humans or objects within the camp and ultimately defile the sanctuary. Classical Judaism understands the term "ḥukah" (NJPS ritual law, v. 2), as a law that defies rational explanation. However, the types of procedures described here have parallels in ancient Near Eastern literature, and may be understood using anthropological understandings of how rituals function. The seven-day purification process involves a type of "ḥata't," a purification offering. The affected person or object is sprinkled on the third and seventh day with a prepared mixture of fresh water and the ashes of a red cow, cedar wood, hyssop plant, and red dye. Essentially on the principle of sympathetic magic, the red-colored ash mixture absorbs the corpse pollution. (Note also how blood functions as a type of "ritual detergent" in Lev. ch 16.) This particular rite renders this ritual unique in biblical practices, one reason being that those officiating at the cleansing contract a measure of impurity in the process of performing it. Ch 19 consists of two subsections. The first, vv. 1–13, contains instructions on the preparation of the ashes and the mixture. It also details the purification procedure for persons preparing the concoction. The second part, vv. 14–22, details conditions that qualify persons or objects to undergo this rite and the actual sprinkling ritual. Failure to undergo this process is subject to "karet," divine retribution (vv. 13, 20). 2: Ritual law: The Rabbis derive justification for this seemingly peculiar rite, over which the nations of the world taunt Israel, by this reference to law, "Torah." A red cow: Red, symbolic of blood, ensures the efficacy of the rite. The ashes of a cow rather than a bull are used for individuals (cf. Deut. 21.1–9); the bull "ḥata't" is used for the high priest and the community (Lev. 4.1–21; 16.11). Generations have puzzled over the color of this cow. The best explanation is that it is a brown, or red-presence. ⁴ Eleazar the priest shall take some of its blood with his finger and sprinkle it seven times toward the front of the Tent of Meeting. ⁵ The cow shall be burned in his sight—its hide, flesh, and blood shall be burned, its dung included—⁶ and the priest shall take cedar wood, hyssop, and crimson stuff, and throw them into the fire consuming the cow. ⁷ The priest shall wash his garments and bathe his body in water; after that the priest may reenter the camp, but he shall be unclean until evening. ⁸ He who performed the burning shall also wash his garments in water, bathe his body in water, and be unclean until evening. ⁹ A man who is clean shall gather up the ashes of the cow and deposit them outside the camp in a clean place, to be kept for water of lustration^a for the Israelite community. It is for cleansing. ¹⁰ He who gathers up the ashes of the cow shall also wash his clothes and be unclean until evening.

This shall be a permanent law for the Israelites and for the strangers who reside among you.

¹¹ He who touches the corpse of any human being shall be unclean for seven days. ¹² He shall cleanse himself with it^b on the third day and on the seventh day, and then be clean; if he fails to cleanse himself on the third and seventh days, he shall not be clean. ¹³ Whoever touches a corpse, the body of a person who has died, and does not cleanse himself, defiles the LORD's Tabernacle; that person shall be cut off from Israel. Since the water of lustration was not dashed on him, he remains unclean; his uncleanness is still upon him.

¹⁴ This is the ritual: When a person dies in a tent, whoever enters the tent and whoever is in the tent shall be unclean seven days; ¹⁵ and every open vessel, with no lid fastened down, shall be unclean. ¹⁶ And in the open, anyone who touches a person who was killed^c or who died naturally, or human bone, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days. ¹⁷ Some of the ashes^d from the fire of cleansing shall be taken for the unclean person, and fresh water shall be added to them in a vessel. ¹⁸ A person who is clean shall take hyssop, dip it in the water, and sprinkle on the tent and on all the vessels and people who were there, or on him who touched the bones or the person who was killed or died naturally or the grave. ¹⁹ The clean person shall sprinkle it upon the unclean person on the third day and on the seventh day, thus cleansing him by the seventh day. He^e shall then wash his clothes and bathe in water, and at dish-brown cow with no spots of other color on it. 6–10: The priest who oversees the incineration of the cow, and the persons who conduct the various tasks associated with it, become unclean. 9: It is for cleansing: The translation of "ḥata't" reflects the fact that this is not a sacrifice in the true sense of a sin offering which is made on the altar inside the camp. 14: Pollution from a corpse seems to be airborne. 16: Any portion of a corpse is defiling. Contact with sacred objects defiles them permanently. King Josiah used human ashes to desecrate illegitimate altars and other cult objects and to invalidate sacred space in perpetuity (2 Kings chs 22–23). 17: Fresh water, lit. "living water," is water running from its source rather than taken from a storage unit (cf. Lev. 14.5, 50). In postbiblical Jewish law such running water must be used in the mikveh or ritual bath. 20: The sin of defiling the sanctuary only applies if a contaminated Israelite or foreign resident does not undergo this cleansing process. Priests, on the other hand, are restricted to contact with a corpse of immediate family members (Lev. 21.1–4). The consequences of defiling the sanctuary are severe: God will abandon it when it becomes sufficiently defiled (see Ezek. chs 1–11). The biblical Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. ch 16) is a purification ritual, which cleanses the sanctuary from accumulated impurities or pollution.

nightfall he shall be clean. ²⁰If anyone who has become unclean fails to cleanse himself, that person shall be cut off from the congregation, for he has defiled the LORD's sanctuary. The water of lustration was not dashed on him: he is unclean.

²¹That shall be for them a law for all time. Further, he who sprinkled the water of lustration shall wash his clothes; and whoever touches the water of lustration shall be unclean until evening. ²²Whatever that unclean person touches shall be unclean; and the person who touches him shall be unclean until evening.

20 The Israelites arrived in a body at the wilderness of Zin on the first new moon,⁹ and the people stayed at Kadesh. Miriam died there and was buried there.

²The community was without water, and they joined against Moses and Aaron. ³The people quarreled with Moses, saying, "If only we had perished when our brothers perished at the instance of the LORD! ⁴Why have you brought the LORD's congregation into this wilderness for us and our beasts to die there? ⁵Why did you make us leave Egypt to bring us to this wretched place, a place with no grain or figs or vines or pomegranates? There is not even water to drink!"

⁶Moses and Aaron came away from the congregation to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and fell on their faces. The Presence of the LORD appeared to them, ⁷and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ⁸"You and your brother Aaron take the rod and assemble the community, and before their very eyes order the rock to yield its water. Thus you shall produce water for them from the rock and provide drink for the congregation and their beasts."

⁹Moses took the rod from before the LORD, as He had commanded him. ¹⁰Moses and Aaron assembled the congregation in front of the rock; and he said to them, "Listen, you rebels, shall we get water for you out of this rock?"

n Of the fortieth year; cf. Num. 33.36–38.

20.1–13: The sin of Moses and Aaron. Chs 20–21 continue the wilderness narrative. This section opens with the Israelites at Kadesh. According to the Priestly writer(s) this marks the end of the 40-year period in the desert, which was spent primarily in northern Sinai. In contrast, the JE tradition places this stop early in the 40-year march, claiming that Israel traveled only one to two years in the Sinai, with the balance of the 40 years being spent in the wilderness of Edom and Moab en route to the crossing at the Jordan River. (32.8 states that the spies were distracted from Kadesh; 13.26 records the spies' return to the Israelite camp at Kadesh. The punishment of 40 years of wandering follows their report. Num. 14.25 instructs the Israelites to head for the Red Sea immediately, then cross into the wilderness of Edom.) Vv. 1–13 comprise the first of three subsections of ch 20. This part recounts Miriam's death, Israel's murmuring to Moses and Aaron over a water shortage, Moses' and Aaron's handling of the crisis, and their tragic banning from entering Canaan. Actually, the incident involving water is the second of its kind, explained as either P's version of the JE account of a water shortage at Massah and Meribah (Exod. 17.1–7) or simply a second crisis over water. In the Exodus narrative God instructs Moses to hit the rock with his rod to bring forth water. In the Priestly version in Numbers, Moses and Aaron are to speak to the rock in front of the Israelites (v. 8). When Moses strikes the rock instead of speaking to it, God, in an unexpected move, hands down the ultimate punishment to His appointed leaders. Puzzled by the apparent harshness of God's verdict, biblical scholars past and present as well as students of the Bible have tried to reconcile Moses' and Aaron's punishment with their sin (see v. 10). The deaths of Aaron and, especially, Moses in Transjordan overlooking the promised land have become a symbol epitomizing the human condition. 1: On the first new moon: This is the first month of the fortieth year according to 33.38, which places Kadesh before Aaron's death in the fifth month of that year. Some rabbinic traditions connect Miriam to water, and find significance in the juxtaposition of Miriam's death (v. 1) to the absence of water (Song of Songs Rab. 4.12). 10: "Shall we get water for you out of this rock?": Striking the rock, as in the Exodus version, does not seem to account for the gravity of Moses' sin, even though according to some interpretations, it constitutes public disobedience of God's instructions, which in itself is punishable. Another, more plausible, interpretation is found among medieval commentators who focus on the pronoun "we" in "shall we get water." By attributing the act of drawing water from a rock to him-

¹¹And Moses raised his hand and struck the rock twice with his rod. Out came copious water, and the community and their beasts drank.

¹²But the LORD said to Moses and Aaron, "Because you did not trust Me enough to affirm My sanctity in the sight of the Israelite people, therefore you shall not lead this congregation into the land that I have given them."

¹³Those are the Waters of Meribah^a—meaning that the Israelites quarrelled with the LORD—through which He affirmed His sanctity.

¹⁴From Kadesh, Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom: "Thus says your brother Israel: You know all the hardships that have befallen us; ¹⁵that our ancestors went down to Egypt, that we dwelt in Egypt a long time, and that the Egyptians dealt harshly with us and our ancestors. ¹⁶We cried to the LORD and He heard our plea, and He sent a messenger^b who freed us from Egypt. Now we are in Kadesh, the town on the border of your territory. ¹⁷Allow us, then, to cross your country. We will not pass through fields or vineyards, and we will not drink water from wells. We will follow the king's highway, turning off neither to the right nor to the left until we have crossed your territory."

¹⁸But Edom answered him, "You shall not pass through us, else we will go out against you with the sword." ¹⁹"We will keep to the beaten track," the Israelites said to them; "and if we or our cattle drink your water, we will pay for it. We ask only for passage on foot—it is but a small matter." ²⁰But they replied, "You shall not pass through!" And Edom went out against them in heavy force, strongly armed. ²¹So Edom would not let Israel cross their territory, and Israel turned away from them.

²²Setting out from Kadesh, the Israelites arrived in a body at Mount Hor. ²³At Mount Hor, on the boundary of the land of Edom, the LORD said to Moses and Aaron, a i.e., "Quarrel"; cf. Exod. 17.7 and note b there. b Or "angel."

self and Aaron, Moses, standing before Israel, fails to credit the miracle to God; this is particularly significant because in vv. 4–5 the nation seems to attribute the exodus to Moses and Aaron rather than to God. The distinction carries theological implications in light of the Bible's need to show the superiority of Israel's God over Pharaoh and the gods of Egypt (Exod. ch 5–12). Of significance is an Egyptian inscription on a roadside rock temple in the eastern desert dedicated by Pharaoh Seti I (late 14th century) to his gods: "He (god) has made water come forth for me from the mountain."

20.14–21: Confrontation with Edom. Since the Israelites fail to enter Canaan from the south (14.40–45) they now plan to cut through the territory of Edom, follow the main road north to Moab, and then cross the Jordan from the east. Moses twice petitions the ruler of Edom for permission to cross his country, emphasizing Israel's misfortunes as he appeals for sympathy. But the Edomites deny Israel access to their territory and confront them with a large military force. Israel must circumvent the entire region of Edom by detouring south to the Red Sea and marching around the eastern border of Edom. It is this detour that according to the JE tradition took thirty-eight years to complete. A variant version in Deuteronomy recalls that Israel did indeed march through Edom (2.1–8). 14: Your brother Israel may refer to Edom's relationship to Jacob (Gen. 25.24–26), a legacy reflected in certain laws (Deut. 23.8). On the other hand, in the ancient Near East "brother" signifies someone of equal status. Here Moses may be indicating that the two groups, the Edomites and Israelites, are essentially of equal status and should therefore practice a "brother" relationship when dealing with each other. 17: The king's highway is an important ancient trade route leading from Damascus to the delta in Egypt via Elath.

20.22–29: Aaron's death. The Priestly narrative continues with the transference of the office of high priest to Eleazar and the death of Aaron on Mount Hor. Mount Hor is also the site of Aaron's death according to 33.38 and Deut. 32.50; but in Deut. 10.6 he dies at Moserah. The two geographical names, both of disputed locales, may actually refer to the same site. For P it is important to record in detail Eleazar's inheritance of his father's priestly garments along with his office. The fact that all Israel mourned Aaron for thirty days, instead of the customary seven (Gen. 50.10; 1 Sam. 31.13), reflects his stature in the community. Moses is also mourned for thirty days (Deut. 34.8). In later Jewish law, these are reconciled by having a more stringent period of seven

24 “Let Aaron be gathered to his kin: he is not to enter the land that I have assigned to the Israelite people, because you disobeyed my command about the waters of Meribah. 25 Take Aaron and his son Eleazar and bring them up on Mount Hor. 26 Strip Aaron of his vestments and put them on his son Eleazar. There Aaron shall be gathered ^aunto the dead.”^a

27 Moses did as the LORD had commanded. They ascended Mount Hor in the sight of the whole community. 28 Moses stripped Aaron of his vestments and put them on his son Eleazar, and Aaron died there on the summit of the mountain. When Moses and Eleazar came down from the mountain, 29 the whole community knew that Aaron had breathed his last. All the house of Israel bewailed Aaron thirty days.

21 When the Canaanite, king of Arad, who dwelt in the Negeb, learned that Israel was coming by the way of Atharim,^b he engaged Israel in battle and took some of them captive. 2 Then Israel made a vow to the LORD and said, “If You deliver this people into our hand, we will proscribe^c their towns.” 3 The LORD heeded Israel’s plea and delivered up the Canaanites; and they and their cities were proscribed. So that place was named Hormah.^d

4 They set out from Mount Hor by way of the Sea of Reeds^e to skirt the land of Edom. But the people grew restive on the journey, 5 and the people spoke against God and against Moses, “Why did you make us leave Egypt to days of mourning followed by a period of moderate mourning that lasts for an additional twenty-three days. According to a mid-rashic tradition, Aaron was loved by the people because he was a harbinger of peace, especially between husband and wife (Avot R. Nat. 12).

21.1–22.1: The final events of the wilderness experience. This ch consists of four subsections. The first and last focus on Israel’s encounters with different ethnic groups that inhabit the eastern Negev and Transjordan; the middle two recount events on this part of the journey. These travels end the wilderness period bringing the Israelites from Kadesh-barnea to the eastern bank of the Jordan River in Moab just opposite Canaan. The Deuteronomistic History calculates that period as thirty-eight years (Deut. 2.13–15). Previously, Israel had met an armed group of indigenous people when attempting to invade Canaan from the south, but without success (14.43–45); a fruitless encounter with Edomites is also mentioned (20.14–21). In this ch, the confrontations with the inhabitants on the borders of Canaan proper mark a turning point in Israel’s fortunes. With God at their side, their victories preview coming events during the conquest of Canaan. Two ancient poems are preserved in this section. 1–3: This encounter with Canaanites in the northern Negev in the region of Arad seems to be an alternate tradition concerning the naming of Hormah (14.43–45). In this version, God ends up by championing Israel’s cause after the people vow to proscribe the enemy as “herem,” utter destruction with the booty dedicated to the sanctuary. 1: King of Arad: Archeological excavations show no evidence of a settlement at Arad in the second millennium. Probably, a writer living at a later time, when Israelite Arad was inhabited, assumed that during the exodus period a Canaanite king resided there. On Hormah, see 14.45. 4–9: This incident is the final recurrence of wilderness murmuring. Complaints again center around a lack of water and poor food. The bronze serpent as an apotropaic (evil-averting, from Greek “turn from”) symbol seems to be the etiological account for the bronze serpent, Nehushtan, which was worshipped in Jerusalem until the late 8th century when King Hezekiah destroyed it (2 Kings 18.4). Winged serpents associated with the divine are attested in Isaiah (6.6–7; 14.20–30) and elsewhere in the ancient Near East. In Egypt, the uraeus, an amulet of an upreared cobra, symbolized kingship and divinity. It was worn on the pharaoh’s forehead and was believed to protect him with its fiery saliva. A serpent attached to a staff brings to mind the caduceus symbol of the modern medical profession. 4: This verse continues 20.21; from Mount Hor is a Priestly interpolation. The Sea of Reeds here must refer to the Red Sea (see map on p. 130). 5: Once again, the people revolt against God and Moses.

die in the wilderness? There is no bread and no water, and we have come to loathe this miserable food.”⁶ The LORD sent seraph^a serpents against the people. They bit the people and many of the Israelites died.⁷ The people came to Moses and said, “We sinned by speaking against the LORD and against you. Intercede with the LORD to take away the serpents from us!” And Moses interceded for the people.⁸ Then the LORD said to Moses, “Make a seraph^a figure and mount it on a standard. And if anyone who is bitten looks at it, he shall recover.”⁹ Moses made a copper serpent and mounted it on a standard; and when anyone was bitten by a serpent, he would look at the copper serpent and recover.

¹⁰The Israelites marched on and encamped at Oboth.¹¹ They set out from Oboth and encamped at Iye-abarim, in the wilderness bordering on Moab to the east.¹² From there they set out and encamped at the wadi Zered.¹³ From there they set out and encamped beyond the Arnon, that is, in the wilderness that extends from the territory of the Amorites. For the Arnon is the boundary of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.¹⁴ Therefore the Book of the Wars of the LORD speaks of “Waheb in Suphah, and the wadis: the Arnon”¹⁵ with its tributary wadis, stretched along the settled country of Ar, hugging the territory of Moab . . .”

¹⁶And from there to Beer,^c which is the well where the LORD said to Moses, “Assemble the people that I may give them water.”¹⁷ Then Israel sang this song:

Spring up, O well—sing to it—

¹⁸ The well which the chieftains dug,
Which the nobles of the people started
With maces, with their own staffs.

And from Midbar^d to Mattanah,¹⁹ and from Mattanah to Nahaliel, and from Nahaliel to Bamoth,²⁰ and from Bamoth to the valley that is in the country of Moab, at the peak of Pisgah, overlooking the wasteland.^e

²¹Israel now sent messengers to Sihon king of the Amorites, saying,²² “Let me pass through your country. We will not turn off into fields or vineyards, and we will not drink water from wells. We will follow the king’s highway until we have crossed your territory.”²³ But Sihon would not let Israel pass through his territory. Sihon gathered all his people and went out against Israel in the wilderness. He came

This miserable food refers to the manna. 6: Seraph serpents, based on the verb, means “burning serpents,” because of their poisonous bite. 9: A copper serpent more likely refers to one made of bronze, a copper-tin alloy. Heb. “neḥoshet” (copper) resembles the word for snake, “naḥash.” Rabbinic interpreters were disturbed by the magical nature of this cure, and suggested that it was the glance of the afflicted to their father in heaven, rather than the snake, which effected the cure (b. Rosh Hash. 29a, cited in Rashi).

10–20: This subsection summarizes Israel’s trek through Transjordan (cf. 33.41–49); another similar list is found in 33.1–49. 14: Book of the Wars of the LORD is a reference to an ancient collection, not extant, probably epic poems describing Israel’s battles (cf. Book of Jashar in Josh. 10.13; 2 Sam. 1.18).

17–18: The song of the well celebrates God providing Israel with water (cf. Song at the Sea, Exod. 15.1–18; Song of Deborah, Judg. ch 5). It is an etymology for the toponym Beer, “well” (v. 16).

21.21–22.1: The conquest narrative actually begins here with Israel’s triumph over two Amorite kinglets in Transjordan. Accounts of victories in Transjordan provide the backdrop for settlement in that region by the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh. 21.21–32: Israel must conquer the Amorite king Sihon in order to advance. The territory ruled by Sihon is in Moab; apparently it has changed hands.

to Jahaz and engaged Israel in battle. ²⁴ But Israel put them to the sword, and took possession of their land, from the Arnon to the Jabbok, as far as [Az] of the Ammonites, for Az^a marked the boundary of the Ammonites. ²⁵ Israel took all those towns. And Israel settled in all the towns of the Amorites, in Heshbon and all its dependencies.

²⁶ Now Heshbon was the city of Sihon king of the Amorites, who had fought against a former king of Moab and taken all his land from him as far as the Arnon. ²⁷ Therefore the bards would recite:

^b "Come to Heshbon; firmly built
And well founded is Sihon's city.
²⁸ For fire went forth from Heshbon, Flame from Sihon's city,
Consuming Ar of Moab,
The lords of Bamoth^c by the Arnon.
²⁹ Woe to you, O Moab!
You are undone, O people of Chemosh!
His sons are rendered fugitive
And his daughters captive
By an Amorite king, Sihon."
^{30d} Yet we have cast them down utterly,
Heshbon along with Dibon;
We have wrought desolation at Nophah,
Which is hard by Medeba.

³¹ So Israel occupied the land of the Amorites. ³² Then Moses sent to spy out Jazer, and they captured its dependencies and dispossessed the Amorites who were there.

³³ They marched on and went up the road to Bashan, and King Og of Bashan, with all his people, came out to Edrei to engage them in battle. ³⁴ But the LORD said to Moses, "Do not fear him, for I give him and all his people and his land into your hand. You shall do to him as you did to Sihon king of the Amorites who dwelt in Heshbon."

a Septuagint "Jazer," cf. v. 32. Others "for the boundary of the Ammonites was strong."

b The meaning of several parts of this ancient poem is no longer certain.

c Cf. vv. 19 and 20 and Num. 22.21.

d Meaning of verse uncertain. Alternatively:

"Their dominion is at an end
From Heshbon to Dibon
And from Nashim to Nophah,
Which is hard by Medeba."

27-30: The ballad of Heshbon celebrates Sihon's conquest of Moabite territory. Various theories have been proposed as to why it is preserved in the Bible. According to the Rabbis, it justifies Israel's defeat of Sihon (Num. Rab. 19.30). Israel was prohibited from provoking the Moabites to battle (Deut. 2.9). 29: Chemosh is the national god of the Moabites. 33-35: The record of the victory over Og king of the Bashan region (see map on p. 498) parallels Deut. 3.1-2. In this encounter God directs the military action. 22.1: This v., which also contextualizes the subsequent Balaam pericope, is a postscript to ch 21.

³Moab was alarmed because that people was so numerous. Moab dreaded the Israelites, ⁴and Moab said to the elders of Midian, “Now this horde will lick clean all that is about us as an ox licks up the grass of the field.”

Balak son of Zippor, who was king of Moab at that time, ⁵sent messengers to Balaam son of Beor in Pethor, which is by the Euphrates,^a in the land of his kinsfolk, to invite him, saying, “There is a people that came out of Egypt; it hides the earth from view, and it is settled next to me. ⁶Come then, put a curse upon this people for me, since they are too numerous for me; perhaps I can thus defeat them and drive them out of the land. For I know that he whom you bless is blessed indeed, and he whom you curse is cursed.”

⁷The elders of Moab and the elders of Midian, ^bversed in divination,^b set out. They came to Balaam and gave him Balak’s message. ⁸He said to them, “Spend the night here, and I shall reply to you as the LORD may instruct me.” So the Moabite dignitaries stayed with Balaam.

a Lit. “the River.”

22.2–24.25: The story of the seer Balaam. Inserted into the narrative of Israel’s final preparation to enter Canaan is the story of the Moabite king Balak and the prophet Balaam whom he hires to curse Israel into oblivion. This independent composition, possibly originating from a different scribal circle than those associated with other portions of Numbers, is composed of narrative and poetry. It is inserted at this juncture, the beginning of Israel’s period of encampment in Moab, because the outcome of Balak’s scheme determines if Israel will inherit the promised land. The account is a contest in the divine realm between the God of Israel and those supernatural elements available to Balak. At times amusing, and somewhat mocking of the non-Israelite prophet, the message of this pericope is serious: The intent of the LORD reigns supreme and cannot be superseded. Even the powers of a well-known non-Israelite prophet are ultimately controlled by God. In the end nothing in Balaam’s four oracles exacts a curse upon Israel; in fact, his prophecies function in reverse, blessing Israel and cursing her enemies. The biblical traditions are not consistent in their assessment of Balaam’s intentions. In Deuteronomy (23.4–7) and Joshua (24.9–10) it is God who reverses Balaam’s actual intent. Num. 31.16 blames Balaam for Israel’s apostasy at Baal-peor (ch 25), implying that he previously sought to curse them. The memory preserved in the writings of the 8th-century BCE prophet Micah (6.5) is more compatible with most of the favorable Num. chs 22–24 accounts. Postbiblical literature is divided as well in evaluations of Balaam (cf. Tg. Num. chs 22–24; Num. Rab. 14.20). A visionary named Balaam is attested outside the Bible, on a fragmentary inscription on wall plaster (late 9th to 8th century) from a temple at Deir ‘Alla in Transjordan, which records the night vision of a certain Balaam. The seer Balaam may have been a legendary character of antiquity or a real person well known in the region.

The complete biblical story of Balaam is composed of several subsections: (1) Balak hires Balaam to curse Israel (22.2–40). Within this narrative is inserted the tale of Balaam and his talking she-ass (22.21–35). (2) Balaam’s first oracle (22.41–23.10); (3) Balak’s response and Balaam’s second oracle (23.11–24); (4) Balak’s response and Balaam’s third oracle (23.25–24.9); (5) Balak’s response and Balaam’s fourth oracle; their departure (24.10–25). Each subsection containing an oracle is composed of narrative followed by a poem (the oracle). If read detached from the narrative, the four poems connect to tell the story in poetic form. The entire poem may thus derive from an older independent source. Like much biblical poetry, this poem contains many words and phrases that are obscure or possibly have become corrupted over time.

22.2–40: Balak hires Balaam to curse Israel. 4: The elders of Midian refers to the leaders of Midianite groups who lived in Moab (cf. Gen. 36.35). 5: Balaam son of Beor in Pethor: The seer of the Deir ‘Alla inscription bears the same name and patronymic. The place name Pethor, Balaam’s home, is identified as a site on the Sajur River in Aram (Syria) some 400 miles from Moab. 6–7: Balaam apparently has a reputation not only as a seer, but also as a diviner who can effectuate curses. The elders of Moab and Midian, sent to fetch him, are versed in divinatory techniques. Excretion texts on pottery cursing rulers of Canaanite cities are known from Egypt (early 2nd millennium). Prophets from the same period are mentioned in letters from the Mesopotamian city-state of Mari. 8–21: The biblical writer

⁹God came to Balaam and said, “What do these people want of you?” ¹⁰Balaam said to God, “Balak son of Zippor, king of Moab, sent me this message: ¹¹Here is a people that came out from Egypt and hides the earth from view. Come now and curse them for me; perhaps I can engage them in battle and drive them off.” ¹²But God said to Balaam, “Do not go with them. You must not curse that people, for they are blessed.”

¹³Balaam arose in the morning and said to Balak’s dignitaries, “Go back to your own country, for the LORD will not let me go with you.” ¹⁴The Moabite dignitaries left, and they came to Balak and said, “Balaam refused to come with us.”

¹⁵Then Balak sent other dignitaries, more numerous and distinguished than the first. ¹⁶They came to Balaam and said to him, “Thus says Balak son of Zippor: Please do not refuse to come to me. ¹⁷I will reward you richly and I will do anything you ask of me. Only come and damn this people for me.” ¹⁸Balaam replied to Balak’s officials, “Though Balak were to give me his house full of silver and gold, I could not do anything, big or little, contrary to the command of the LORD my God. ¹⁹So you, too, stay here overnight, and let me find out what else the LORD may say to me.” ²⁰That night God came to Balaam and said to him, “If these men have come to invite you, you may go with them. But whatever I command you, that you shall do.”

²¹When he arose in the morning, Balaam saddled his ass and departed with the Moabite dignitaries. ²²But God was incensed at his going; so an angel of the LORD placed himself in his way as an adversary.

He was riding on his she-ass, with his two servants alongside, ²³when the ass caught sight of the angel of the LORD standing in the way, with his drawn sword in his hand. The ass swerved from the road and went into the fields; and Balaam beat the ass to turn her back onto the road. ²⁴The angel of the LORD then stationed himself in a lane between the vineyards, with a fence on either side. ²⁵The ass, seeing the angel of the LORD, pressed herself against the wall and squeezed Balaam’s foot against the wall; so he beat her again. ²⁶Once more the angel of the LORD moved forward and stationed himself on a spot so narrow that there was no room to swerve right or left. ²⁷When the ass now saw the angel of the LORD, she lay down under Balaam; and Balaam was furious and beat the ass with his stick.

²⁸Then the LORD opened the ass’s mouth, and she said to Balaam, “What have I done to you that you have beaten makes it clear that the Israelites are a blessed people. In this account, which views Balaam positively, his words and actions are bound to God’s will and no reward of riches can enable him to counter it.

22–35: This episode of Balaam and the she-ass derives from a different tradition that contradicts the favorable view of Balaam expressed by the main story (contrast esp. v. 20). In this version God is angry with the prophet (v. 22) and in turn depicts the donkey as the actual visionary. Balaam becomes the object of mockery: He is portrayed as being blind to divine will; it is the ass that sees what the seer cannot. 22: As an adversary: In the Bible the term “satan” is used attributively (1 Sam. 29.4), or when personified it refers to a divine being who answers to God (Job 1.6–12; 1 Chron. 21.1), rather than to an independent entity who is God’s adversary (“Satan”). The concept only later developed into the “Devil.”

me these three times?" ²⁹Balaam said to the ass, "You have made a mockery of me! If I had a sword with me, I'd kill you." ³⁰The ass said to Balaam, "Look, I am the ass that you have been riding all along until this day! Have I been in the habit of doing thus to you?" And he answered, "No."

³¹Then the LORD uncovered Balaam's eyes, and he saw the angel of the LORD standing in the way, his drawn sword in his hand; thereupon he bowed ^aright down to the ground.^a ³²The angel of the LORD said to him, "Why have you beaten your ass these three times? It is I who came out as an adversary, for the errand is obnoxious^b to me. ³³And when the ass saw me, she shied away because of me those three times. If she had not shied away from me, you are the one I should have killed, while sparing her." ³⁴Balaam said to the angel of the LORD, "I erred because I did not know that you were standing in my way. If you still disapprove, I will turn back." ³⁵But the angel of the LORD said to Balaam, "Go with the men. But you must say nothing except what I tell you." So Balaam went on with Balak's dignitaries.

³⁶When Balak heard that Balaam was coming, he went out to meet him at Ir-moab, which is on the Arnon border, at its farthest point. ³⁷Balak said to Balaam, "When I first sent to invite you, why didn't you come to me? Am I really unable to reward you?" ³⁸But Balaam said to Balak, "And now that I have come to you, have I the power to speak freely? I can utter only the word that God puts into my mouth."

³⁹Balaam went with Balak and they came to Kiriath-huzoth.

⁴⁰Balak sacrificed oxen and sheep, and had them served to Balaam and the dignitaries with him. ⁴¹In the morning Balak took Balaam up to Bamoth-baal. From there he could see a portion of the people.

23 Balaam said to Balak, "Build me seven altars here and have seven bulls and seven rams ready here for me." ²Balak did as Balaam directed; and Balak and Balaam offered up a bull and a ram on each altar. ³Then Balaam said to Balak, "Stay here beside your offerings while I am gone. Perhaps the LORD will grant me a manifestation, and whatever He reveals to me I will tell you." And he went off alone.^c

22.41–23.10: Balaam's first oracle.

23.1: Seven is a magical number in the Bible, often signaling complete perfection (cf. Josh. 6.4; 1 Kings 18.43; 2 Kings 5.10, 14), and is frequent in Northwest Semitic literature. In connection with sacrifices the number seven corresponds to the seven bulls and seven rams which God commands Job's friends to offer (Job 42.8). Balaam's offerings seem to invoke the deity's message. Ibn Ezra notes the frequency of the number seven in the cultic calendar.

a-a Lit. "and prostrated himself to his nostrils."

b Precise meaning of Heb. uncertain.

c Others "to a bare height"; exact meaning of Heb. shephi uncertain.

⁴God manifested Himself to Balaam, who said to Him, "I have set up the seven altars and offered up a bull and a ram on each altar." ⁵And the LORD put a word in Balaam's mouth and said, "Return to Balak and speak thus."

⁶So he returned to him and found him standing beside his offerings, and all the Moabite dignitaries with him. ⁷He took up his theme, and said:

From Aram has Balak brought me,
Moab's king from the hills of the East:
Come, curse me Jacob,
Come, tell Israel's doom!

⁸How can I damn whom God^a has not damned,
How doom when the LORD has not doomed?
⁹As I see them from the mountain tops,
Gaze on them from the heights,
There is a people that dwells apart,
Not reckoned among the nations,
¹⁰Who can count the dust^b of Jacob,
Number^c the dust-cloud of Israel?
May I die the death of the upright,^d
May my fate be like theirs!

¹¹Then Balak said to Balaam, "What have you done to me? Here I brought you to damn my enemies, and instead you have blessed them!" ¹²He replied, "I can only repeat faithfully what the LORD puts in my mouth." ¹³Then Balak said to him, "Come with me to another place from which you can see them—you will see only a portion of them; you will not see all of them—and damn them for me from there." ¹⁴With that, he took him to Sedehzophim,^e on the summit of Pisgah. He built seven altars and offered a bull and a ram on each altar. ¹⁵And [Balaam] said to Balak, "Stay here beside your offerings, while I seek a manifestation yonder."

¹⁶The LORD manifested Himself to Balaam and put a word in his mouth, saying, "Return to Balak and speak thus." ¹⁷He went to him and found him standing beside his offerings, and the Moabite dignitaries with him. Balak asked him, "What did the LORD say?" ¹⁸And he took up his theme, and said:

Up, Balak, attend,
Give ear unto me, son of Zippor!

8: The deity name "El," probably short for "Elohim," God, appears in parallel construction to the Tetragrammaton (YHWH). Some scholars believe that the designations refer to two separate deities, El being the Canaanite high God also worshipped by Israel. 8: This is a poetic variant of the idea expressed in prose in 22.18. More extensive prose and poetic variants of the same story are found in Exod. chs 14–15 and Judg. chs 4–5. 10: Balak's fear that the Israelite multitude will be triumphant (22.3) is confirmed already in Balaam's first oracle. Who can count the dust of Jacob reverberates the patriarchal blessing (Gen. 13.16). This English translation assumes a textual error, that the single Heb word "umispār" ("and the number of") should be read as two words: "umiy safar" ("[who can] number"). The parallelism of the verse supports this emendation.

23.11–24: The second oracle.

11–17: Sandwiched between the poems of the first and second oracles is a narrative section containing reactions to the initial poem. In a dialogue between Balak and Balaam, Balak expresses shock at Balaam's blessing of Israel; Balaam responds with a disclaimer to his own words. Balak then attempts to elicit a curse from Balaam by having the prophet view the Israelite camp from a less threatening angle. Fresh sacrifices need to be offered to attain another vision. The narrator is mocking Balak, who fails to understand that God's desire may not be contravened in this manner. 18–24: The poem of the second oracle underscores the message of the first. Emphasis is placed on God's constancy in general and specifically in connection with His devotion to Israel's welfare. Other gods may be capricious, subject to human manipulation through magic, but the LORD is not.

^a Heb. El, as often in these poems. ^b Cf. Gen. 13.16. ^c Lit. "and the number of."

^d Heb. yesharim, a play on yeshurun (Jeshurun in Deut. 32.15), a name for Israel.

^e Or "Lookout Point."

19 God is not man to be capricious,
Or mortal to change His mind.
Would He speak and not act,
Promise and not fulfill?
20 My message was to bless:
When He blesses, I cannot reverse it.
21 No harm is in sight for Jacob,
No woe in view for Israel.
The LORD their God is with them,
And their King's acclaim in their midst.
22 God who freed them from Egypt
Is for them like the horns^a of the wild ox.
23 Lo, there is no augury in Jacob,
No divining in Israel:^b
Jacob is told at once,
Yea Israel, what God has planned.^c
24 Lo, a people that rises like a lion,
Leaps up like the ^dking of beasts,^d
Rests not till it has feasted on prey
And drunk the blood of the slain.

²⁵ Thereupon Balak said to Balaam, "Don't curse them and don't bless them!" ²⁶ In reply, Balaam said to Balak, "But I told you: Whatever the LORD says, that I must do." ²⁷ Then Balak said to Balaam, "Come now, I will take you to another place. Perhaps God will deem it right that you damn them for me there." ²⁸ Balak took Balaam to the peak of Peor, which overlooks the wasteland.^e ²⁹ Balaam said to Balak, "Build me here seven altars, and have seven bulls and seven rams ready for me here." ³⁰ Balak did as Balaam said: he offered up a bull and a ram on each altar.

24 Now Balaam, seeing that it pleased the LORD to bless Israel, did not, as on previous occasions, go in search of omens, but turned his face toward the wilderness. ² As Balaam looked up and saw Israel encamped tribe by tribe, the spirit of God came upon him. ³ Taking up his theme, he said:

¶ Word of Balaam son of Beor,
Word of the man whose eye is true,^g

22: The redemption from Egypt is cited as evidence of God's power and allegiance to Israel. 24: The simile of a lion previews Israel's military victories and kingdom in Canaan (cf. Gen. 49.9–10).

23.25–24.9: The third oracle.

23.25–24.2: In this second narrative segment between oracles, Balak, in distress, wants to abandon cursing Israel if that will nullify the blessing. The foolish Moabite king, in contrast to the seer, is not resigned to God's will as a fait accompli. Sacrifices are offered for the third time from yet another location. This time Balaam does not search for omens in the process of seeking divine spirit, implying that he did so previously. 2: For the first time Balaam views the entire Israelite camp (cf. 22.41; 23.13). 3–4: Balaam opens this oracle with self-praise. He considers himself a true prophet of God.

- 4 Word of him who hears God's speech,
Who beholds visions from the Almighty,
Prostrate, but with eyes unveiled:
- 5 How fair are your tents, O Jacob,
Your dwellings, O Israel!
- 6 Like palm-groves that stretch out,
Like gardens beside a river,
Like aloes planted by the LORD,
Like cedars beside the water;
- 7 Their boughs drip with moisture,
Their roots^a have abundant water.
Their king shall rise above Agag,
Their kingdom shall be exalted.
- 8 God who freed them from Egypt
Is for them like the horns^b of the wild ox.
They shall devour enemy nations,
Crush their bones,
And smash their arrows.
- 9 They crouch, they lie down like a lion,
Like the king of beasts;^c who dare rouse them?
Blessed are they who bless you,
Accursed they who curse you!

¹⁰Enraged at Balaam, Balak struck his hands together. "I called you," Balak said to Balaam, "to damn my enemies, and instead you have blessed them these three times! ¹¹Back with you at once to your own place! I was going to reward you richly, but the LORD has denied you the reward." ¹²Balaam replied to Balak, "But I even told the messengers you sent to me, ¹³Though Balak were to give me his house full of silver and gold, I could not of my own accord do anything good or bad contrary to the LORD's command. What the LORD says, that I must say." ¹⁴And now, as I go back to my people, let me inform you of what this people will do to your people in days to come." ¹⁵He took up his theme, and said:

- Word of Balaam son of Beor,
Word of the man whose eye is true,
- 16 Word of him who hears God's speech,
Who obtains knowledge from the Most High,
And beholds visions from the Almighty,
Prostrate, but with eyes unveiled:
- 17 What I see for them is not yet,
What I behold will not be soon:

4: The Almighty (also v. 16): Heb "shadai" is an epithet of God common in the patriarchal stories (e.g., Gen. 17.1; 28.3; 35.11). Its likely meaning, "high," is related to the Akkadian term for mountain. 5: This idyllic portrayal of the Israelites in their homes is noted in the midrash. In Jewish liturgy this line begins the daily morning service, since tents and dwellings are understood to refer to the synagogue. 6-7: The depiction of lush vegetation contrasts with the wilderness background of Balaam's view of Israel's encampment (24.1). 7: Agag is the king of Amalek at the time of Saul's reign (1 Sam. 15.8). Saul's victory is foretold here, suggesting to many scholars a date for the text in the monarchic period. 8-9: The oracle ends by returning to the lion imagery at the end of the previous oracle (23.24), and reiterating the promise to the patriarchs that anyone who blesses Israel will be blessed in turn, but anyone who curses her is himself cursed (Gen. 12.3; 27.29).

24.10-25: The fourth oracle.

10-14: Balak's reaction to Balaam's third oracle is one of outrage, no doubt exacerbated by the pronouncement that he who curses Israel will be cursed in turn. Balak sends Balaam home. 10: Balak struck his hands together: This is a gesture of anguish and anger (cf. Ezek. 6.11; 21.19, 22; 22.13; Lam. 2.15). 15-25: Before returning to his home, Balaam utters one more oracle, this one containing a prophecy about Moab's future and that of Israel's other enemies. A very common pattern in biblical literature, followed here, is the 3-4 pattern, where the fourth element is climactic. 17: This v. predicts the destruction of Moab by an Israelite king. Either David or Omri qualifies (2 Sam. 8.2; the Mesha [or Moabite] Stone). This v. played a significant role in the 2nd century CE, when the star (Heb "kokhav") was connected by some to Bar Kosba, a Jewish leader who headed an unsuccessful revolt against Rome in 132-35. Based on

^c Heb. labi, another word for "lion"; cf. note at 23.24.

A star rises from Jacob,
A scepter comes forth from Israel;
It smashes the brow of Moab,
The foundation of^a all children of Seth.

18 Edom becomes a possession,
Yea, Seir a possession of its enemies;
But Israel is triumphant.

19 A victor issues from Jacob
To wipe out what is left of Ir.

20 He saw Amalek and, taking up his theme, he said:
A leading nation is Amalek;
But its fate is to perish forever.

21 He saw the Kenites and, taking up his theme, he said:
Though your abode be secure,
And your nest be set among cliffs,
22 Yet shall Kain^b be consumed,
When Asshur takes you captive.

23 He took up his theme and said:
Alas, who can survive except God has willed it!
24 Ships come from the quarter of Kittim;
They subject Asshur, subject Eber.
They, too, shall perish forever.

25 Then Balaam set out on his journey back home; and Balak also went his way.

25 While Israel was staying at Shittim, the people^c profaned themselves by whoring^c with the Moabite women, ² who invited the people to the sacrifices for their god. The people partook of them and worshiped that god. ³ Thus Israel attached itself to Baal-peor, and the LORD was incensed with Israel. ⁴ The LORD said to Moses, this verse, some sages renamed this leader as Bar Kokhba, "the son of the star," and viewed him as a messianic figure (see esp. y.Ta'an. 68d). The revolt was a miserable failure. 18–24: Balaam predicts the conquest of several national or ethnic groups, including Edomites, Amalekites, and Midianites. Kittim, people from Cyprus, are mentioned as invaders into the region of Syria and Mesopotamia; the historical setting for this is unclear. In the Dead Sea Scrolls, "Kittim" represents the Romans. 25: The narrative ends with Balaam and Balak returning home, the latter's mission having failed.

25.1–19: Worship of Baal-peor and its aftermath. Ch 25 continues the narrative begun in 22.1, which was interrupted by the insertion of the story of Balak and Balaam. While encamped on the plains of Moab awaiting crossing into Canaan, Israelite men mingle with local, non-Israelite women. As predicted in warnings to Israel (Exod. 34.16; cf. 1 Kings 11.1–6), marriage with idolaters leads to idolatry, in this case worship of the local god Baal-peor. This chapter can be divided into three smaller segments: vv. 1–5, 6–9, and 10–19. Scholars often attribute the latter two segments to a Priestly expansion of the first five verses, a JE account. In P's rendition, the role of Phinehas, Aaron's grandson, is central in the expiation process of the sin (vv. 7–18), even superseding that of Moses. Furthermore, it offers historical support for the divine appointment of the Aaronide priesthood. Memory of Israel's apostasy of Baal-peor and subsequent punishment is preserved in several biblical accounts outside the book of Numbers (cf. Deut. 4.3; Josh. 22.17; Hos. 9.10; Ps. 106.28). 1: Ramban suggests that it was Balaam's evil advice that provoked the incident. Otherwise, he reasons, why would the Israelites have killed Balaam (31.8)? 2–3: Ps. 106 identifies the sacrificial feast as a ritual associated with a funerary cult. Baal-peor is the local manifestation of the fertility storm-god Baal, the high god of Canaanite religion; Peor is a geographic name previously mentioned in the Balaam saga (23.28; also Deut. 3.29). The calf image that Israel fashioned of gold and then worshipped at Sinai (Exod. ch 32) is a common representation of the deity Baal, apparently, as well as the LORD in the sanctuaries of Dan and Bethel (see 1 Kings 12.28–29). 4: Take all the ringleaders and have them publicly impaled. Ringleaders is an interpretive translation of the Heb. A literal understanding, "all the heads of the people," implies that the leadership, both guilty individuals and innocent ones, are liable for the people's action. Their execution and subsequent public impalement is to serve as expiation for

“Take all the ringleaders^a and have them publicly^b impaled before the LORD, so that the LORD’s wrath may turn away from Israel.”⁵ So Moses said to Israel’s officials, “Each of you slay those of his men who attached themselves to Baal-peor.”

⁶Just then one of the Israelites came and brought a Midianite woman over to his companions, in the sight of Moses and of the whole Israelite community who were weeping at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting.⁷ When Phinehas, son of Eleazar son of Aaron the priest, saw this, he left the assembly and, taking a spear in his hand,⁸ he followed the Israelite into the chamber and stabbed both of them, the Israelite and the woman, through the belly. Then the plague against the Israelites was checked.⁹ Those who died of the plague numbered twenty-four thousand.

¹⁰The LORD spoke to Moses, saying,¹¹ “Phinehas, son of Eleazar son of Aaron the priest, has turned back My wrath from the Israelites by displaying among them his passion for Me, so that I did not wipe out the Israelite people in My passion.¹² Say, therefore, ‘I grant him My pact of friendship.’¹³ It shall be for him and his descendants after him a pact of priesthood for all time, because he took impassioned action for his God, thus making expiation for the Israelites.’”

¹⁴The name of the Israelite who was killed, the one who was killed with the Midianite woman, was Zimri son of Salu, chieftain of a Simeonite ancestral house.¹⁵ The name of the Midianite woman who was killed was Cozbi daughter of Zur; he was the tribal head of an ancestral house in Midian.

¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses, saying,¹⁷ “Assail the Midianites and defeat them—¹⁸for they assailed you by the trickery they practiced against you—because of the affair of Peor and because of the affair of their kinswoman Cozbi, daughter of the Midianite chieftain, who was killed at the time of the plague on account of Peor.”

26¹⁹When the plague was over,¹ the LORD said to Moses and to Eleazar son of Aaron the priest,² “Take a census of the whole Israelite community from

Israel’s violation of the Sinaitic covenant, which prohibits foreign worship. Similarly, Saul’s sons are executed and publicly impaled for their father’s violation of a treaty with the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21.1–14). In that case, a drought, attributed to the violation of the oath, ends when the princes’ deaths appease the deity. In both cases, extreme measures need to be taken to control the divine wrath. 5: Moses seems to intercede here (cf. 11.2; 14.13–19; 16.22), instructing Israel’s officials to slay only the guilty (cf. the role of the Levites in Exod. 32.25–29). 6–9: The Israelite man is later identified as Zimri son of Salu, a chieftain of Simeon (v. 14); the woman is Cozbi daughter of Zur, a Midianite chief (v. 15). Thus, both are influential members of their respective communities. 6: For the association of Midianites and Moabites (v. 1), see 22.4 n. 8: The chamber, Heb “ha-kubah,” probably refers to a tent (also in Arabic) that is part of the cultic area, rendering the transgression as pagan worship. No evidence exists, however, for any act of cultic prostitution. 9: Those who died in the plague would have included any remnant of the exodus generation (26.64–65). 10–13: God rewards Phinehas’s zealous act, which appeases His wrath and makes expiation for Israel (cf. Aaron’s act, 17.11–12), with a pact of friendship guaranteeing divine protection (cf. Isa. 54.10; Ezek. 34.25; 37.26). A pact of priesthood for all time reiterates the eternal and exclusive election of the Aaronides to the priesthood (chs 16–17). 16–19: God’s command that Israel take vengeance on the Midianites for their part in the apostasy of Baal-peor is realized in the continuation of this account in ch 31, where v. 1 completes the verse fragment of 25.19 (for the association of Midianites and Moabites, see 22.4 n.). Thus, chs 26–30 have been placed here secondarily.

26.1–65: The second census. Initially, the Israelites were counted at Sinai prior to their forty-year wilderness trek (ch 1). That population consisted of the exodus generation. This second census takes place after the death of that entire population (26.64). Levites are again numbered separately (cf. 3.14–39). The statistics of the second census are necessary for determining the allotment of the land of Canaan (see Josh. chs 14–19), the the age of twenty years up, by their ancestral houses, all Israelites able to bear arms.”³ So Moses and Eleazar the priest, on the steppes of Moab, at the Jordan near Jericho, gave instructions about them, namely,⁴ those from twenty years up, as the LORD had commanded Moses.

The descendants of the Israelites who came out of the land of Egypt were:

⁵Reuben, Israel’s first-born. Descendants of Reuben: [Of] Enoch,^b the clan of the Enochites; of Pallu, the clan of the Palluites; ⁶of Hezron, the clan of the Hezronites; of Carmi, the clan of the Carmites. ⁷Those are the clans of the Reubenites. The persons enrolled came to 43,730.

¹²Descendants of Simeon by their clans: Of Nemuel, the clan of the Nemuelites; of Jamin, the clan of the Jaminites; of Jachin, the clan of the Jachinites; ¹³of Zerah, the clan of the Zerahites; of Saul,^d the clan of the Saulites. ¹⁴Those are the clans of the Simeonites; [persons enrolled:] 22,200.

¹⁵Descendants of Gad by their clans: Of Zephon, the clan of the Zephonites; of Haggi, the clan of the Haggites; of Shuni, the clan of the Shunites; ¹⁶of Ozni, the clan of the Oznites; of Eri, the clan of the Erites; ¹⁷of Arod, the clan of the Arodites; of Areli, the clan of the Arelites. ¹⁸Those are the clans of Gad’s descendants; persons enrolled: 40,500.

²⁰Descendants of Judah by their clans: Of Shelah, the clan of the Shelanites; of Perez, the clan of the Perezites; of Zerah, the clan of the Zerahites. ²¹Descendants of Perez: of Hezron, the clan of the Hezronites; of Hamul, the clan of the Hamulites. ²²Those are the clans of Judah; persons enrolled: 76,500.

²³Descendants of Issachar by their clans: [Of] Tola, the clan of the Tolaites; of Puvah, the clan of the Punites; ²⁴of Jashub, the clan of the Jashubites; of Shimron, the clan of the Shimronites. ²⁵Those are the clans of Issachar; persons enrolled: 64,300.

subject of the end of this chapter (vv. 52–56). This chapter also precedes a major battle, the war against the Midianites (ch 31), since a count of military-age males is required in preparation for this battle and for others planned in the conquest of Canaan. 1–4: The instructions for the second census, like the first, come directly from God who addresses both Moses and the current high priest (cf. 1.1–3). 5–51: The Israelites are numbered by tribes, excluding Levi. Each tribe’s total is derived from the sum of its clans. Whereas clan chieftains are named in connection with the first census (1.5–15), the names of the clans appear in the account of the second census. Some scholars attempt to understand these vast, unrealistic numbers symbolically. 9–11: These verses recall the fate of the Reubenites Dathan and Abiram who were part of the Korah rebellion (chs 16–17). Similar short notices are sometimes placed in the genealogies that open Chronicles.

²⁸The sons of Joseph were Manasseh and Ephraim—by their clans.

⁴⁸Descendants of Naphtali by their clans: Of Jahzeel, the clan of the Jahzeelites; of Guni, the clan of the Gunites;

29–34: The tribe of Manasseh increases in size more than any other tribe (five tribes decrease in number), almost doubling its population (cf. 1.34–35). Five Manassite clan names (Iezer [= Abiezer], Helek, Asriel, Shechem, and Shemida) and two names of Zelophehad's daughters (Noah and Hoglah) appear as place names on the Samaria Ostraca pottery sherds from the 8th century BCE inscribed as receipts for wine and oil, which were excavated in the remains of the palace complex at Samaria. Thus, it is possible that the names mentioned in this chapter do not refer to actual individuals, but to geographical regions whose connection is expressed through genealogical language. 33: The legal implications of the inheritance of Zelophehad's daughters are discussed in 27.1–11; 36.1–12.

⁵¹This is the enrollment of the Israelites: 601,730.

⁵²The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ⁵³“Among these shall the land be apportioned as shares, according to the listed names: ⁵⁴with larger groups increase the share, with smaller groups reduce the share. Each is to be assigned its share according to its enrollment. ⁵⁵The land, moreover, is to be apportioned by lot; and the allotment shall be made according to the listings of their ancestral tribes. ⁵⁶Each portion shall be assigned by lot, whether for larger or smaller groups.”

⁶³These are the persons enrolled by Moses and Eleazar the priest who registered the Israelites on the steppes of Moab, at the Jordan near Jericho. ⁶⁴Among these there was not one of those enrolled by Moses and Aaron the priest when they recorded the Israelites in the wilderness of Sinai. ⁶⁵For the LORD had said of them, “They shall die in the wilderness.” Not one of them survived, except Caleb son of Jephunneh and Joshua son of Nun.

27 The daughters of Zelophehad, of Manassite family—son of Hephher son of Gilead son of Machir son of Manasseh son of Joseph—came forward. The names of the daughters were Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. ²They stood before Moses, Eleazar the priest, the 51: The total of 601,730 indicates a net loss of 1,820 males aged 20 and up (cf. 603,550 in 1.46).

52–56: Here are the directions for apportioning the land of Canaan.

The size of each tribal territory is determined by the population of the tribe; the geographical area, however, is assigned to the tribes by lot. Casting lots is a common ancient Near Eastern divination practice; according to several biblical passages, God controls the results (Josh. 18.8; 19.51; 1 Sam. 10.20–24; 14.41).

26.57–62: The Levites are numbered for the third time (cf. chs 3–4). They are listed separately because they do not serve in the military, nor do they receive a portion of land. They are, however, assigned Levitical towns (see 35.1–8), the number of which is determined by the size of the group.

58–59: These verses trace the genealogy of Moses and Aaron, Israel’s leaders. 61: For the episode surrounding the death of Nadab and Abihu, see Lev. 10.1–3. 63–65: The chends by stating that God’s punishment of the wilderness generation was fulfilled, preparing the way for the death of Moses and the conquest of the land.

27.1–11: The case of Zelophehad’s daughters. A specific case is used here to introduce a revision to the laws of inheritance. The special case of Zelophehad, who died leaving daughters but no sons, already appears in 26.33 in the census record of his clan. The detailed account that follows in ch 27 and continues in ch 36 addresses questions surrounding this case and uses it to explore more generally female inheritance of property in Israel, a patriarchal society. In contrast, ancient texts from Mesopotamia, Syria, and Egypt attest to inheritance rights of women even in the presence of male heirs. Underlying the discussion in Numbers is the biblical precept that the ancestral lands in question are divinely granted in perpetuity and may not be alienated from their original tribes or families (see Lev. 25.25–34; 1 Kings 21.1–19). 1–4: Zelophehad’s daughters present the arguments for their case. 2: At the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, a location in the camp analogous to the city gate of permanent settlements where courts convened (cf. chieftains, and the whole assembly, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and they said, ³“Our father died in the wilderness. He was not one of the faction, Korah’s faction, which banded together against the LORD, but died for his own sin; and he has left no sons. ⁴Let not our father’s name be lost to his clan just because he had no son! Give us a holding among our father’s kinsmen!”

⁵Moses brought their case before the LORD.

⁶And the LORD said to Moses, ⁷“The plea of Zelophehad’s daughters is just: you should give them a hereditary holding among their father’s kinsmen; transfer their father’s share to them.

¹²The LORD said to Moses, “Ascend these heights of Abarim and view the land that I have given to the Israelite people. ¹³When you have seen it, you too shall be gathered to your kin, just as your brother Aaron was. ¹⁴For, in the wilderness of Zin, when the community was contentious, you disobeyed My command to uphold My sanctity in their sight by means of the water.” Those are the Waters of Meribath-kadesh,^a in the wilderness of Zin.

¹⁵Moses spoke to the LORD, saying, ¹⁶“Let the LORD, Source of the breath of all flesh, appoint someone over the community ¹⁷^bwho shall go out before them and come in before them, and who shall take them out and bring them in,^b so that the LORD’s community may not be like sheep that have no shepherd.” ¹⁸And the LORD answered Moses, “Single out Joshua son of Nun, an inspired man, and lay your hand upon him. ¹⁹Have him stand before El-with the person gathering stubble on the Sabbath (15.32–36).

8–11: Granting the women’s request is a divine decision, and this presents an opportunity to expand on the particular case by offering a hierarchical list of potential heirs, thereby establishing a legal principle. Num. 36.1–13 will further clarify that since the women actually transfer the patrimony to future male heirs, they are bound by certain marriage requirements.

27.12–23: The transfer of leadership to Joshua. Key to the success of Israel’s inheritance of Canaan is the succession of Moses by a competent and worthy leader. The role is filled by Joshua, one of two spies who gave a positive report claiming that Canaan can be conquered (chs 13–14). Certain other texts as well (e.g., Exod. 17.9–14; 24.13; Num. 11.28) also prepare the reader for the role that Joshua would play as Moses’ successor.

12–14: The beginning of the narrative suggests that Moses is about to die in fulfillment of God’s punishment (20.12; cf. Aaron’s death and Eleazar’s assumption of leadership of the priesthood, 20.22–29). His death, however, is postponed to Deut. ch 34. 12: Mount Nebo, the site of Moses’ death (Deut. ch 34) is part of the heights of Abarim (33.47; Deut. 32.49).

15–17: Moses requests that God appoint his successor. In this period, national leadership, unlike the priesthood, is not hereditary. Moses’ own descendants were not suitable for leadership (see Judg. 18.30 n.). 18–23: Joshua’s investiture is witnessed by Eleazar the priest and the entire community, probably to avoid challenges to the legitimacy of his authority. 18: An inspired man, lit. “a man in whom there is spirit,” anticipates the transfer of Mosaic attributes to Joshua. Lay your hand [hands, v. 23] upon him, for the purpose of transferring authority (v. 20). The spirit may refer to prophetic ability (see 1 Kings 22.21–23), and the ritual may express Moses’ transferring his prophetic abilities to Joshua. The rite of laying hands is em-

[Zelophehad] died for his own sin, difficult to interpret. It may refer to the condemnation of Zelophehad as part of the entire sinful exodus generation (14.29) or imply an assumed transgression explaining his lack of male heirs (cf. 1 Kings 1.17–18). Traditional Jewish commentary makes the latter connection. 4: Let not our father’s name be lost: Preserving a person’s name is of tantamount importance and clearly connected to his estate (Deut. 25.5–6) 5: Moses brings this difficult case before God (Deut. 1.17), as he did earlier eleazar the priest and before the whole community, and commission him in their sight. ²⁰Invest him with some of your authority, so that the whole Israelite community may obey. ²¹But he shall present himself to Eleazar the priest, who shall on his behalf seek the decision of the Urim before the LORD. By such instruction they shall go out and by such instruction they shall come in, he and all the Israelites, the whole community.”

²²Moses did as the LORD commanded him. He took Joshua and had him stand before Eleazar the priest and before the whole community. ²³He laid his hands upon him and commissioned him—as the LORD had spoken through Moses.

28 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Command the Israelite people and say to them: Be punctilious in presenting to Me at stated times ^athe offerings of food due Me,^a as offerings by fire of pleasing odor to Me.

³Say to them: These are the offerings by fire that you are to present to the LORD:

As a regular burnt offering every day, two yearling lambs without blemish. ⁴You shall offer one lamb in the morning, and the other lamb you shall offer at twilight. ⁵And as a meal offering, there shall be a tenth of an ephah of choice flour with a quarter of a hin of beaten oil mixed in—⁶the regular burnt offering instituted at Mount Sinai^b—an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD.

⁷The libation with it shall be a quarter of a hin for each lamb, to be poured in the sacred precinct as an offering of fermented drink^c to the LORD. ⁸The other lamb you shall offer at twilight, preparing the same meal offering and libation as in the morning—an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD.

⁹On the sabbath day: two yearling lambs without blemish, together with two-tenths of a measure^d of choice flour with oil mixed in as a meal offering, and with the proper libation—¹⁰a burnt offering for every sabbath, in addition to the regular burnt offering and its libation.

ployed for animals as well as persons (Lev. 16.21; Num. 8.10). Contrast the transfer of power from Elijah to Elisha (2 Kings 2.9–15). Jewish tradition refers to the ceremony of rabbinic ordination as “semikhah,” the laying of hands. 21: Seek the decision of the Urim:

The Urim and Thummim (here abbreviated) are consulted as an oracle (1 Sam. 14.41 [LXX]; 28.6). According to the Priestly tradition, they fit into a pouch of the breastplate worn by the high priest (Exod. 28.30; Lev. 8.8), many scholars believe that they were cast like dice to answer yes-or-no questions. Clearly, Joshua cannot commune directly with God as does Moses.

28.1–30.1: Calendar of the public cult.

Chs 28–29 are an insertion into the narrative consisting of ritual prescriptions that delineate the daily, Sabbath, new moon, and festival schedule of offerings. The variety and number of sacrificial animals vary, but all are males: bulls, rams, lambs, and goats. Meal offerings and wine libations are also part of the formulas. Num. 28.1–15 deals with daily, weekly, and monthly sacrifices. Num. 28.16–29.38 is an outline of the annual cycle of festivals, beginning with Passover in the first month and ending with Sukkot in the seventh month. The Numbers calendar expands on the calendar in Lev. ch 23, also a product of the Priestly tradition, by adding the daily and new moon rituals. A third, non-Priestly calendar, Deut. 16.1–17, describes the three main pilgrimage festivals (Passover, Feast of Weeks, Feast of Booths) in conjunction with the requirement of a central sanctuary. The Numbers complete cultic calendar is a guide for ritual observances required of a settled community, especially those rites pertaining to harvest festivals. Therefore, it is included in the text at a point prior to the Israelite crossing into Canaan. 28.2: Offerings of food due Me, lit. “My food,” designates sacrifices as divine food. This notion pervades the ancient Near East, where food was placed daily at mealtime before statues of deities. Vestiges of such beliefs appear in the Bible (Gen. 8.20–21). In Priestly writings, however, anthropomorphic concepts of God are generally absent, although the pleasing odor of offerings to the Lord is commonly mentioned (Lev. 21.6; Num. 15.3–13); it is unclear if this should be understood literally, or is vestigial, and should be understood metaphorically. 3–8: The daily offering, “tamid,” is the standard to which the special holy day sacrifices are added. 9–10: The Sabbath

¹¹On your new moons you shall present a burnt offering to the LORD: two bulls of the herd, one ram, and seven yearling lambs, without blemish. ¹²As meal offering for each bull: three-tenths of a measure of choice flour with oil mixed in. As meal offering for each ram: two-tenths of a measure of choice flour with oil mixed in. ¹³As meal offering for each lamb: a tenth of a measure of fine flour with oil mixed in. Such shall be the burnt offering of pleasing odor, an offering by fire to the LORD. ¹⁴Their libations shall be: half a hin of wine for a bull, a third of a hin for a ram, and a quarter of a hin for a lamb. That shall be the monthly burnt offering for each new moon of the year. ¹⁵And there shall be one goat as a sin offering to the LORD, to be offered in addition to the regular burnt offering and its libation.

¹⁶In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month, there shall be a passover sacrifice to the LORD, ¹⁷and on the fifteenth day of that month a festival. Unleavened bread shall be eaten for seven days. ¹⁸The first day shall be a sacred occasion: you shall not work at your occupations. ¹⁹You shall present an offering by fire, a burnt offering, to the LORD: two bulls of the herd, one ram, and seven yearling lambs—^asee that they are^a without blemish. ²⁰The meal offering with them shall be of choice flour with oil mixed in: prepare three-tenths of a measure for a bull, two-tenths for a ram; ²¹and for each of the seven lambs prepare one-tenth of a measure. ²²And there shall be one goat for a sin offering, to make expiation in your behalf. ²³You shall present these in addition to the morning portion of the regular burnt offering. ²⁴You shall offer the like daily for seven days as food, an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD; they shall be offered, with their libations, in addition to the regular burnt offering. ²⁵And the seventh day shall be a sacred occasion for you: you shall not work at your occupations.

offering doubles the daily one. Cf. the larger Sabbath offering described by the prophet Ezekiel (46.4–5). The Sabbath labor prohibition is mentioned in Leviticus (23.3) but not in Numbers. 11–15: The sacrificial animals offered on the new moon parallel those offered on other festivals, though their number varies (cf. Ezekiel 46.6–7). They include a goat purification (NJPS “sin”) offering, which the Rabbis connect to the purification of the sanctuary (m. Shevu'ot 1.4–5). 16–25: Passover is the first festival of the cultic calendar (Exod. 12.2) and marks the beginning of the barley harvest. The holy day on which the Passover sacrifice (“pesah”) is offered is distinct from the seven-day Festival of Unleavened Bread (“matzot”); in other words, we have a festival complex of an evening festival (Pesah) followed immediately by a seven-day Matzot festival. Neither here nor in Leviticus (23.5–8) is the commemoration of the exodus from Egypt mentioned, though it is noted elsewhere (Exod. 23.15; Deut. 16.1–3). Biblical records of Passover celebrations in the preexilic period are associated with the reigns of two Judean kings, Hezekiah (2 Chron. 30.1–27) and Josiah (2 Kings 23.21–23; 2 Chron. 35.1–19); Ezra the scribe notes that the returning exiles in the Persian period celebrated Passover (Ezra 6.19–22). 26–31: The Feast of Weeks, celebrated seven weeks from Passover, marks the wheat harvest. No calendrical date is given here (contrast Lev. 23.15–21), perhaps because the new grain might ripen at different times in different years. In Priestly writings, including Ezekiel, it is not considered a pilgrimage festival. The Deuteronomist, however, does count the Feast of Weeks as one of three pilgrimage festivals (Deut. 16.16). 26: First fruits refers to the new crop of wheat and perhaps the grapes and olives used in preparation of the offering (Lev. 23.17).

a-a Lit. “they shall be to you.”

29 In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, you shall observe a sacred occasion: you shall not work at your occupations. You shall observe it as ^a“a day when the horn is sounded.”² You shall present a burnt offering of pleasing odor to the LORD: one bull of the herd, one ram, and seven yearling lambs, without blemish.³ The meal offering with them—choice flour with oil mixed in—shall be: three-tenths of a measure for a bull, two-tenths for a ram,⁴ and one-tenth for each of the seven lambs.⁵ And there shall be one goat for a sin offering, to make expiation in your behalf—⁶in addition to the burnt offering of the new moon with its meal offering and the regular burnt offering with its meal offering, each with its libation as prescribed, offerings by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD.

⁷On the tenth day of the same seventh month you shall observe a sacred occasion when you shall practice self-denial. You shall do no work.⁸ You shall present to the LORD a burnt offering of pleasing odor: one bull of the herd, one ram, seven yearling lambs; see that they are^b without blemish.⁹ The meal offering with them—of choice flour with oil mixed in—shall be: three-tenths of a measure for a bull, two-tenths for the one ram,¹⁰ one-tenth for each of the seven lambs.¹¹ And there shall be one goat for a sin offering, in addition to the sin offering of expiation and the regular burnt offering with its meal offering, each with its libation.

29.1–6: The new moon of the seventh month is like a sabbath of new moon celebrations. According to the earlier covenant collection in Exodus, the seventh month marks the transition between the end and the beginning of the agricultural year (Exod. 23.16). Jewish tradition adopted the new moon of the seventh month as the start of the new year, Rosh Ha-Shanah. The oddity of having the new year begin in the seventh month comes from the fact that two calendrical systems are reflected in the Bible: one in which the year begins in the fall (Tishri), and one beginning in the spring (Nisan), as the Babylonian year did. We have here a hybrid: the year beginning in the fall but the month named according to the spring beginning. The sounding of the horn (v. 1), the shofar, is still practiced on Rosh Ha-Shanah. The shofar differs from the metal trumpets sounded by the priests (10.2–10). 7–11: In Leviticus (23.27) the tenth day of the seventh month is called “yom ha-kippurim,” the Day of Atonement. It is designated as a Sabbath of complete rest (Lev. 16.31; 23.32). For the priestly expiation rites associated with it, see Lev. 16.29–34. 7: Self-denial elsewhere refers to fasting (Isa. 58.3–5; Ps. 35.13), as observed by Ibn Ezra. 12–34: This festival, lasting from the fifteenth to the twenty-first day of the seventh month is also known by more descriptive names: Feast of Booths, “sukkot” (Lev. 23.34; Deut. 16.13) and Feast of Ingathering (Exod. 23.16; 34.22). A far larger amount of livestock is offered on this festival than on any other, perhaps reflecting its importance. For the nonsacrificial rituals, like that of the “lulav,” palm bough, see Lev. 23.33–36, 39–43. King Solomon celebrated Sukkot, called “the Feast,” at the time he dedicated the Temple (2 Chron. 7.8–10). Judeans in the Persian period observed Sukkot at the bidding of Ezra (Neh. 8.14–18). In more modern times, the Pilgrims modeled their thanksgiving celebration in the New World after this biblical harvest festival.

²⁰Third day: Eleven bulls, two rams, fourteen yearling lambs, without blemish; ²¹the meal offerings and libations for the bulls, rams, and lambs, in the quantities prescribed; ²²and one goat for a sin offering—in addition to the regular burnt offering, its meal offering and libation.

²³Fourth day: Ten bulls, two rams, fourteen yearling lambs, without blemish; ²⁴the meal offerings and libations for the bulls, rams, and lambs, in the quantities prescribed; ²⁵and one goat for a sin offering—in addition to the regular burnt offering, its meal offering and libation.

²⁶Fifth day: Nine bulls, two rams, fourteen yearling lambs, without blemish; ²⁷the meal offerings and libations for the bulls, rams, and lambs, in the quantities prescribed; ²⁸and one goat for a sin offering—in addition to the regular burnt offering, its meal offering and libation.

²⁹Sixth day: Eight bulls, two rams, fourteen yearling lambs, without blemish; ³⁰the meal offerings and libations for the bulls, rams, and lambs, in the quantities prescribed; ³¹and one goat for a sin offering—in addition to the regular burnt offering, its meal offering and libations.

³⁵On the eighth day you shall hold a solemn gathering;^a you shall not work at your occupations. ³⁶You shall present a burnt offering, an offering by fire of pleasing odor to the LORD; one bull, one ram, seven yearling lambs, without blemish; ³⁷the meal offerings and libations for the bull, the ram, and the lambs, in the quantities prescribed; ³⁸and one goat for a sin offering—in addition to the regular burnt offering, its meal offering and libation.

³⁹All these you shall offer to the LORD at the stated times, in addition to your votive and freewill offerings, be 30 they burnt offerings, meal offerings, libations, or offerings of well-being. ¹So Moses spoke to the Israelites just as the LORD had commanded Moses.

³If a man makes a vow to the LORD or takes an oath imposing an obligation^b on himself, he shall not break his pledge; he must carry out all that has ^ccrossed his lips.^c

35–38: An eighth day of Sukkot, characterized as a concluding solemn gathering, may have been originally a distinct holy day, as indicated by the contradiction between v. 12, seven days, and v. 35, On the eighth day. This gives rise to significant confusion in Jewish legal texts concerning the nature and status of the eighth day. 39: A Priestly summary verse. Public cult observances are required in addition to private votive or freewill offerings. Examples of the latter include Elkanah's family sacrifice at the Shiloh shrine (1 Sam. 1.3–6) and Absalom's fulfillment of a vow in Hebron (2 Sam. 15.7–8). 30.1: This subscript statement, common in Priestly literature, attests to the fact that the LORD's instructions were carried out (cf. 5.4).

30.2–17: Annuling women's vows and oaths. The section of cult regulations begun in ch 28 ends with the subject of the annulment of vows and oaths. This topic connects to the aforementioned votive and freewill offerings (29.39), which most often constitute the pledge. A sworn statement in the name of God defines the seriousness of the pledge (Exod. 20.7; Deut. 5.11). Vow and oath obligations differ from each other in that a vow is conditional. It binds the devotee only after God fulfills the requested blessing. For example, Jacob vows to erect a shrine at Bethel if God delivers him safely from the wrath of his brother (Gen. 28.20, 22); Jephthah vows to sacrifice whatever comes out first from his house if he returns having defeated the Ammonites (Judg. 11.30–31); and Hannah vows to dedicate her son to sanctuary service if she conceives (1 Sam. 1.11). 3: This initial statement affirms the obligation of men to any vows and oaths they take (Deut. 23.22–24). This case is simple: Since all men are independent, they are thus responsible for their vows. The rest of the chapter deals with women's vows; the status of these depends on the status of the woman, particularly if she is de-

⁷If she should marry while her vow or the commitment^a to which she bound herself is still in force, ⁸and her husband learns of it and offers no objection on the day he finds out, her vows shall stand and her self-imposed obligations shall stand. ⁹But if her husband restrains her on the day that he learns of it, he thereby annuls her vow which was in force or the commitment^a to which she bound herself; and the LORD will forgive her.—¹⁰The vow of a widow or of a divorced woman, however, whatever she has imposed on herself, shall be binding upon her.—¹¹So, too, if, while in her husband's household, she makes a vow or imposes an obligation on herself by oath, ¹²and her husband learns of it, yet offers no objection—thus failing to restrain her—all her vows shall stand and all her self-imposed obligations shall stand. ¹³But if her husband does annul them on the day he finds out, then nothing that has crossed her lips shall stand, whether vows or self-imposed obligations. Her husband has annulled them, and the LORD will forgive her. ¹⁴Every vow and every sworn obligation of self-denial may be upheld by her husband or annulled by her husband. ¹⁵If her husband offers no objection from that day to the next, he has upheld all the vows or obligations she has assumed: he has upheld them by offering no objection on the day he found out. ¹⁶But if he annuls them after [the day] he finds out, he shall bear her guilt.

¹⁷Those are the laws that the LORD enjoined upon Moses between a man and his wife, and as between a father and his daughter while in her father's household by reason of her youth.

31 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Avenge the Israelite people on the Midianites; then you shall be gathered to your kin."

³Moses spoke to the people, saying, "Let men be picked out from among you for a campaign, and let them fall upon Midian to wreak the LORD's vengeance on Midian.

pendent on a man, that is, under his legal authority, specifically her father or husband. 4-13: The discussion turns to the responsibility of women regarding such promises. Four cases are presented: (1) The vow or oath of a young woman (but presumably not a minor) living in her father's house and under his authority (vv. 4-6); (2) The vow or oath of a married woman made while still in her father's house but now under the authority of her husband (vv. 7-9); (3) The vow of a widow or divorced woman (v. 10); (4) The vow or oath of a widowed or divorced woman made prior to her husband's death or before their divorce (vv. 11-13). Nullification of a woman's vows and oaths is only possible if the woman is in a state of dependency, either on her father or husband. Independent women, such as widows or divorcees, who take on these obligations are bound to them in the same way as men. These laws suggest that a woman's vows and oaths required validation by a male if she was legally dependent on him. The Dead Sea Scrolls, however, placed almost equal weight on the oaths of adult females and limited a husband's or father's right of annulment to oaths and vows which transgress the laws of the Torah (CD 16.10-12). 14-16: A husband (or father) who annuls a woman's vow or oath outside the prescribed parameters bears the woman's guilt and is liable for punishment. Problems arising from vows made in error or haste prompted the Rabbis to assert that four kinds of vows were not binding: vows of incitement; vows of exaggeration; vows made in error; and vows of constraint (m. Ned. 3.1). 17: This v. formally concludes these legal prescriptions.

31.1-54: War of vengeance against the Midianites. Ch 31 consists of narrative that picks up from the end of ch 25 (see 25.19 n.). The divine command to defeat the Midianites in retaliation for their seduction of the Israelites at Baal-peor (25.17-18) is realized in this

¹³Moses, Eleazar the priest, and all the chieftains of the community came out to meet them outside the camp. ¹⁴Moses became angry with the commanders of the army, the officers of thousands and the officers of hundreds, who had come back from the military campaign. ¹⁵Moses said to them, “You have spared every female! ¹⁶Yet they are the very ones who, at the bidding of Balaam, induced^b the Israelites to trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, so that the LORD’s community was struck by the plague. ¹⁷Now, therefore, slay every male among the children, and slay also every woman who has known a man carnally; ¹⁸but spare every young woman who has not had carnal relations with a man.

¹⁹“You shall then stay outside the camp seven days; every one among you or among your captives who has slain a person or touched a corpse shall cleanse himself on the third and seventh days. ²⁰You shall also cleanse every cloth, every article of skin, everything made of goats’ hair, and every object of wood.”

²¹Eleazar the priest said to the troops who had taken part in the fighting, “This is the ritual law that the LORD has enjoined upon Moses: ²²Gold and silver, copper, iron, tin, and lead—²³any article that can withstand fire—these you ch, which opens with a call to battle (for the association of Midianites and Moabites, see 22.4 n.). The brevity and somewhat legendary nature of the war account point to several issues of real concern underlying the lengthy chapter, which integrates several laws mentioned in the book, and adduces some new ones. Clearly evident is the Priestly writer’s agenda: the key military role of the priesthood; the fate of male and female captives in a holy war; ritual purification of soldiers and booty; and the taxation of spoils for the sanctuary. Thus, the main focus is not the battle, but the legal precedents that it sets. 4: A thousand from every one of the tribes: The term “elef” can also refer to “division” (a military unit), hence twelve divisions. 6: Phinehas son of Eleazar the high priest serves as the military priest (cf. 25.7–8; Deut. 20.2–4). According to the midrash (Num. Rab. 22.4), Phinehas was assigned this role so that he could finish the sacred task he began when he smote the Midianite woman in the affair of Baal-peor (25.1–9). The sacred utensils are not specified but probably include the Ark (1 Sam. 4.3–11) and the Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. 14.41; 28.6). The trumpets are mentioned earlier in 10.1–10. 7: Slew every male: Total annihilation is an expression of victory not to be taken literally. It is a common propagandistic statement in ancient Near Eastern battle accounts. 8: Put Balaam son of Beor to the sword: According to this tradition (also v. 16) he is killed for his association with the Midianites, through whom he incited the Israelites to the apostasy of Baal-peor (see 22.2–24.25 n.). 15–18: Only young girls who are virgins are left alive and presumably taken captive (Deut. 20.14; 21.10–14). shall pass through fire and they shall be clean, except that they must be cleansed with water of lustration; and anything that cannot withstand fire you must pass through water. ²⁴On the seventh day you shall wash your clothes and be clean, and after that you may enter the camp.”

²⁵The LORD said to Moses: ²⁶“You and Eleazar the priest and the family heads of the community take an inventory of the booty that was captured, man and beast, ²⁷and divide the booty equally between the combatants who engaged in the campaign and the rest of the community. ²⁸You shall exact a levy for the LORD: in the case of the warriors who engaged in the campaign, one item in five hundred, of persons, oxen, asses, and sheep, ²⁹shall be taken from their half-share and given to Eleazar the priest as a contribution to the LORD; ³⁰and from the half-share of the other Israelites you shall withhold one in every fifty human beings as well as cattle, asses, and sheep—all the animals—and give them to the Levites, who attend to the duties of the LORD’s Tabernacle.”

³¹Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the LORD commanded Moses. ³²The amount of booty, other than the spoil that the troops had plundered, came to 675,000 sheep, ³³72,000 head of cattle, ³⁴61,000 asses, ³⁵and a total of 32,000 human beings, namely, the women who had not had carnal relations.

³⁶Thus, the half-share of those who had engaged in the campaign [was as follows]: The number of sheep was 337,500, ³⁷and the LORD’s levy from the sheep was 675; ³⁸the cattle came to 36,000, from which the LORD’s levy was 72; ³⁹the asses came to 30,500, from which the LORD’s levy was 61. ⁴⁰And the number of human beings was 16,000, from which the LORD’s levy was 32. ⁴¹Moses gave the contributions levied for the LORD to Eleazar the priest, as the LORD had commanded Moses.

⁴²As for the half-share of the other Israelites, which Moses withdrew from the men who had taken the field, ⁴³that half-share of the community consisted of 337,500 sheep, ⁴⁴36,000 head of cattle, ⁴⁵30,500 asses, ⁴⁶and 16,000 human beings. ⁴⁷From this half-share of the Israelites, Moses withheld one in every fifty humans and animals; and he gave them to the Levites, who attended to the duties of the LORD’s Tabernacle, as the LORD had commanded Moses.

⁴⁸The commanders of the troop divisions, the officers of thousands and the officers of hundreds, approached Moses. ⁴⁹They said to Moses, “Your servants have made a check of the warriors in our charge, and not one of us is missing. ⁵⁰So we have brought as an offering to the LORD their metal implements must be cleansed by fire, a new law.

22–23: This process of cleansing vessels and other objects is perpetuated, with adaptations, in the Jewish tradition of preparing kitchen utensils for Passover.

25–30: A similar practice concerning distribution of booty is noted in 1 Sam. 30.22–31; both cases, by different authors, are intended as illustrative precedents.

28–30: A form of the laws concerning tithing, detailed in ch 18, is carried out. 31–47: The amount of booty recorded here, including the share designated for the sanctuary, is fantastic by any standards.

48–54: Conducting a census not initiated by God was believed to provoke divine anger (see 2 Sam. ch 24 where God in anger incites David to take a census that results in a plague). To avert that possibility, the army commanders donate precious articles of gold to God as a ransom for the Israelites (cf. Exod. 30.12). 54: As a reminder: The gold ransom is used in the Tent of Meeting as a continual ritual reminder (Exod. 30.16). This recalls the earlier fire pans, which serve the same purpose (17.5).

such articles of gold as each of us came upon: armlets, bracelets, signet rings, earrings, and pendants,^a that expiation may be made for our persons before the LORD.”⁵¹ Moses and Eleazar the priest accepted the gold from them, all kinds of wrought articles.⁵² All the gold that was offered by the officers of thousands and the officers of hundreds as a contribution to the LORD came to 16,750 shekels.—⁵³ But in the ranks, everyone kept his booty for himself.—⁵⁴ So Moses and Eleazar the priest accepted the gold from the officers of thousands and the officers of hundreds and brought it to the Tent of Meeting, as a reminder in behalf of the Israelites before the LORD.

32 The Reubenites and the Gadites owned cattle in very great numbers. Noting that the lands of Jazer and Gilead were a region suitable for cattle,² the Gadites and the Reubenites came to Moses, Eleazar the priest, and the chieftains of the community, and said,³ “Ataroth, Dibon, Jazer, Nimrah, Heshbon, Elealeh, Sebam, Nebo, and Beon—⁴the land that the LORD has conquered for the community of Israel is cattle country, and your servants have cattle.⁵ It would be a favor to us,” they continued, “if this land were given to your servants as a holding; do not move us across the Jordan.”

⁶Moses replied to the Gadites and the Reubenites, “Are your brothers to go to war while you stay here?⁷ Why will you turn the minds of the Israelites from crossing into the land that the LORD has given them?⁸ That is what your fathers did when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to survey the land.⁹ After going up to the wadi Eshcol and surveying the land, they turned the minds of the Israelites from invading the land that the LORD had given them.¹⁰ Thereupon the LORD was incensed and He swore,¹¹ ‘None of the men from twenty years up who came out of Egypt shall see the land that I promised on oath to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, for they did not remain loyal to Me—¹²none except Caleb son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite and Joshua son of Nun, for they remained loyal to the LORD.’¹³ The LORD was incensed at Israel, and for forty years He made them wander in the wilderness, until the whole generation that had provoked the LORD’s displeasure was gone.¹⁴ And now you, a breed of sinful men, have replaced your fathers, to add still further to the LORD’s wrath against Israel.¹⁵ If you turn away from Him and He abandons them once more in the wilderness, you will bring calamity upon all this people.”

32.1–42: Settlement of Transjordan. The settlement process begins. Since the Israelites had already routed a number of their enemies in Transjordan (21.21–35; 31.1–12), the tribes of Reuben and Gad consider it prudent to settle that land with their families and livestock. Subsequently, half the tribe of Manasseh also settles east of the Jordan River. The narrative in this ch primarily serves to legitimate Israelite occupation of land outside Canaan proper (see also Josh. ch 22). A nonbiblical text, the Mesha (Moabite) Stone (9th century BCE), confirms Gadite occupation of Ataroth—a town assigned to that tribe in 32.34—since antiquity. 1–5: These introductory vv. provide a backdrop for the narrative. 3: The cities of Gad and Reuben are more fully discussed in vv. 34–38; variant traditions about each tribe’s holdings are found elsewhere (cf. Josh. 13.17–23). 6–15: Moses interprets Gad’s and Reuben’s request as a sign that they are unwilling to fight in the conquest of Canaan, comparing them with the ten scouts who disheartened Israel in the wilderness (chs 13–14). 15: Moses fears for the fate of Israel on account of the actions of Gad and Reuben (cf. Josh. 22.16–19; Judg. 5.16–17); this v. assumes corporate responsibility, where a serious infraction by part of the nation endangers the nation as a whole.

¹⁶Then they stepped up to him and said, “We will build here sheepfolds for our flocks and towns for our children. ¹⁷And we will hasten^a as shock-troops in the van of the Israelites until we have established them in their home, while our children stay in the fortified towns because of the inhabitants of the land. ¹⁸We will not return to our homes until every one of the Israelites is in possession of his portion. ¹⁹But we will not have a share with them in the territory beyond the Jordan, for we have received our share on the east side of the Jordan.”

²⁰Moses said to them, “If you do this, if you go to battle as shock-troops, at the instance of the LORD, ²¹and every shock-fighter among you crosses the Jordan, at the instance of the LORD, until He has dispossessed His enemies before Him, ²²and the land has been subdued, at the instance of the LORD, and then you return—you shall be clear before the LORD and before Israel; and this land shall be your holding under the LORD. ²³But if you do not do so, you will have sinned against the LORD; and know that your sin will overtake you. ²⁴Build towns for your children and sheepfolds for your flocks, but do what you have promised.”

²⁵The Gadites and the Reubenites answered Moses, “Your servants will do as my lord commands. ²⁶Our children, our wives, our flocks, and all our other livestock will stay behind^b in the towns of Gilead; ²⁷while your servants, all those recruited for war, cross over, at the instance of the LORD, to engage in battle—as my lord orders.”

²⁸Then Moses gave instructions concerning them to Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the family heads of the Israelite tribes. ²⁹Moses said to them, “If every shock-fighter among the Gadites and the Reubenites crosses the Jordan with you to do battle, at the instance of the LORD, and the land is subdued before you, you shall give them the land of Gilead as a holding. ³⁰But if they do not cross over with you as shock-troops, they shall receive holdings among you in the land of Canaan.”

³¹The Gadites and the Reubenites said in reply, “Whatever the LORD has spoken concerning your servants, that we will do. ³²We ourselves will cross over as shock-troops, at the instance of the LORD, into the land of Canaan; and we shall keep our hereditary holding across the Jordan.”^c

³³So Moses assigned to them—to the Gadites, the Reubenites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh son of Joseph—the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites and the kingdom

The modern Heb “halutz,” a pioneer who settled the land of Israel in the early 20th century, is derived from this word, specifically from the idea that they are the vanguard of settling the land. 20–22: At the instance of the LORD, lit. “before the LORD”: Moses repeats this phrase emphasizing Gad’s and Reuben’s commitment to march in front of the Ark. In the wilderness the Ark leads (cf. 10.33). 22: You shall be clear before the LORD: Freedom from obligation in legal terms indicates that the Gadites and Reubenites took an oath (Gen. 24.8). 28: Moses instructs Joshua about the obligation of the Transjordanian tribes because the conquest will take place under Joshua’s leadership. 31–32: The Gadites and Reubenites repeat their acceptance of the terms. 33: Moses assigns Gad, Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh the lands of conquered kings (21.21–35) as their inheritance (see map on p. 498). Settlement of Manasseh in Transjordan first appears here, perhaps indicating a secondary addition, although one attested elsewhere (Deut. 3.12–16; Josh. 13.29–31).

33 These were the marches of the Israelites who started out from the land of Egypt, troop by troop, in the charge of Moses and Aaron. ²Moses recorded the starting points of their various marches as directed by the LORD. Their marches, by starting points, were as follows:

³They set out from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month. It was on the morrow of the passover offering that the Israelites started out defiantly,^d in plain view of all the Egyptians. ⁴The Egyptians meanwhile were burying those among them whom the LORD had struck down, every first-born—whereby the LORD executed judgment on their gods.

⁵The Israelites set out from Rameses and encamped at Succoth. ⁶They set out from Succoth and encamped at Etham, which is on the edge of the wilderness. ⁷They set out from Etham and turned about toward Pi-hahiroth, which faces Baal-zephon, and they encamped before Migdol. ⁸They set out from Pene'-hahiroth and passed through the sea into the wilderness; and they made a three-days' journey in the wilderness of Etham and encamped at Marah. ⁹They set out from Marah and came to Elim. There were twelve springs in Elim and seventy palm trees, so they encamped there. ¹⁰They set out from Elim and encamped by the Sea of Reeds.^f ¹¹They set out from the Sea of Reeds and encamped in the wilderness of Sin. ¹²They set out from the wilderness of Sin and en-

39–42: In contrast to other tribes, Manassites conquer a portion of their inheritance on their own. A tradition in Judg. 10.4 ascribes the origin of Havvoth-jair to a later period.

33.1–49: A comprehensive wilderness itinerary. This record encompasses the itinerary of Israel's travels from their point of departure in Egypt to their final encampment in Transjordan (42 stations; see map on p. 130). Notably, some toponyms appear here for the first time, being absent from accounts of the exodus in other biblical texts (see Deut. chs 1–3 for another summary). The literary style of the itinerary, the repetition of campsite names, and the highlighting of events in those places closely resemble extant military records from the ancient Near East, especially from Assyria. Accordingly, the notation in this Priestly source that Moses recorded the starting points of their various marches (v. 2) fits the genre. Some scholars, however, consider ch 33 a composite text extracted from other portions of Numbers, Exodus, and Deuteronomy. As in the census in ch 26, at some points small expansions appear here (e.g., vv. 38–39). 3–5: On Rameses, see Exod. 12.37. 6–7: For Succoth and Etham (= Shur in Exod. 15.22), see Exod. 13.20. 8: For the incident at Marah, see Exod. 15.23–25. 9–10: For Elim, see Exod. 15.27. 11–12: For the story of the manna in the wilderness of Sin, see Exod. ch 16.

Wherever the lot falls for anyone, that shall be his. You shall have your portions according to your ancestral tribes. ⁵⁵But if you do not dispossess the inhabitants of the land, those whom you allow to remain shall be stings in your eyes and thorns in your sides, and they shall harass you in the land in which you live; ⁵⁶so that I will do to you what I planned to do to them.

34 The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Instruct the Israelite people and say to them: When you enter the land of Canaan, this is the land that shall fall to you as your portion, the land of Canaan with its various boundaries:

³Your southern sector shall extend from the wilderness of Zin alongside Edom. Your southern boundary shall start on the east from the tip of the Dead Sea. ⁴Your boundary shall then turn to pass south of the ascent of Akrabbim and continue to Zin, and its limits shall be south of Kadesh-barnea, reaching Hazar-addar and continuing to Azmon. ⁵From Azmon the boundary shall turn toward the Wadi of Egypt and terminate at the Sea.^b

33.50–35.8: Instructions on the conquest and division of Canaan.

The final task before crossing into Canaan is to delineate the boundaries of the land so that it can be divided among the nine-and-a-half tribes that will inhabit it. The Levites, who are not allotted tribal territory, are provided with towns and pastureland within the holdings of the other tribes. A repetition of the method by which the land will be apportioned (26.52–56) and, more importantly, the command to utterly destroy the indigenous Canaanite population together with its religious objects and shrines (33.50–56) precede instructions relating to the division of Canaan. 33.50–56: The eradication of the Canaanites and their cult is a divine command. Failure to do so will result in the demise of Israel (cf. Deut. 7.16; Josh. 23.13). 52: Figured objects may refer to stone images in relief (cf. Lev. 26.1). Such objects have been uncovered in archeological excavations from Syria to Israel. Their cult places, Heb “bamah,” high place, is difficult to define but probably refers to a shrine smaller than a full-scale temple with an elevated cult platform, like those uncovered in archeological excavations at Megiddo and Tel Dan.

34.1–15: The exact boundaries of the promised land are delineated from south to north, the direction corresponding to the scouting account (13.21). Scholars have observed a correlation between the Levantine territory under Egyptian control at the end of the 13th century and the borders as defined in vv. 3–12 (cf. Josh. 15.1–12; Ezek. 47.13–20). The large size of Israel’s domain is clearly idealized.

3–5: Israel’s territory begins at the southern tip of the Dead Sea, extending in a southern arc through Kadesh-barnea and west to the Mediterranean Sea at the Brook of Egypt, Wadi El-‘Arish (see map on p. 469). 6–9: From the west it extends northward. The northernmost border, at Hazar-enan, is tentatively identified with the oasis of Qayatein 70 miles northeast of Damascus. 7–8: Mount Hor is not ¹⁰For your eastern boundary you shall draw a line from Hazar-enan to Shepham. ¹¹From Shepham the boundary shall descend to Riblah on the east side of Ain; from there the boundary shall continue downward and abut on the eastern slopes of the Sea of Chinnereth.^a ¹²The boundary shall then descend along the Jordan and terminate at the Dead Sea.

That shall be your land as defined by its boundaries on all sides.

¹³Moses instructed the Israelites, saying: This is the land you are to receive by lot as your hereditary portion, which the LORD has commanded to be given to the nine and a half tribes. ¹⁴For the Reubenite tribe by its ancestral houses, the Gadite tribe by its ancestral houses, and the half-tribe of Manasseh have already received their portions: ¹⁵those two and a half tribes have received their portions across the Jordan, opposite Jericho, on the east, the orient side.

²⁹It was these whom the LORD designated to allot portions to the Israelites in the land of Canaan.

35 The LORD spoke to Moses in the steppes of Moab at the Jordan near Jericho, saying: ²Instruct the Israelite people to assign, out of the holdings apportioned to them, towns for the Levites to dwell in; you shall also assign to the Levites pasture land around their towns. ³The towns shall be theirs to dwell in, and the pasture shall be for the cattle they own and all their other beasts. ⁴The the site in the region of Edom where Aaron died (20.22; 33.38).

10-12: The border then extends south around the eastern banks of the Sea of Galilee and further southward along the Jordan River to the Dead Sea. 14-15: These vv. serve as a reminder that Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh received land in Transjordan.

16-29: New tribal chieftains, with the exception of Caleb (13.6), are appointed to assist Eleazar the priest and Joshua in allotting portions of land to the nine-and-a-half remaining tribes. The tribal chieftains are listed here more or less in an order corresponding to the geographical tribal distribution in Canaan, from south to north. For the delineation of each tribe's territory, see Josh. chs 15-19. 35.1-8: Each tribe must allocate land from its holdings for the Levites. The towns and pastureland apportioned to the Levites by each tribe is proportional to the size of its tribal territory. These instructions diverge from the division of the 48 Levitical towns among the tribes in Joshua (21.1-40), where nine of the tribes allocate four towns each, Judah gives eight, Simeon one, and Naphtali three. 4-5: Pastureland extends from the town 1000 cubits (1 cubit = approximately .5 meter [18 in]) in all directions, thereby forming a square of at least 2000 × 2000 cubits, depending on the town size. 6: The mention of cities of refuge serves as a bridge to the following unit.

town pasture that you are to assign to the Levites shall extend a thousand cubits outside the town wall all around. ⁵You shall measure off two thousand cubits outside the town on the east side, two thousand on the south side, two thousand on the west side, and two thousand on the north side, with the town in the center. That shall be the pasture for their towns.

⁶The towns that you assign to the Levites shall comprise the six cities of refuge that you are to designate for a manslayer to flee to, to which you shall add forty-two towns. ⁷Thus the total of the towns that you assign to the Levites shall be forty-eight towns, with their pasture. ⁸In assigning towns from the holdings of the Israelites, take more from the larger groups and less from the smaller, so that each assigns towns to the Levites in proportion to the share it receives.

⁹The LORD spoke further to Moses: ¹⁰Speak to the Israelite people and say to them: When you cross the Jordan into the land of Canaan, ¹¹you shall provide yourselves with places to serve you as cities of refuge to which a manslayer who has killed a person unintentionally may flee. ¹²The cities shall serve you as a refuge from the avenger,^a so that the manslayer may not die unless he has stood trial before the assembly.

¹³The towns that you thus assign shall be six cities of refuge in all. ¹⁴Three cities shall be designated beyond the Jordan, and the other three shall be designated in the land of Canaan: they shall serve as cities of refuge. ¹⁵These six cities shall serve the Israelites and the resident aliens among them for refuge, so that anyone who kills a person unintentionally may flee there.

¹⁶Anyone, however, who strikes another with an iron object so that death results is a murderer; the murderer must be put to death. ¹⁷If he struck him with a stone tool^b that could cause death, and death resulted, he is a murderer; the murderer must be put to death. ¹⁸Similarly, if the object with which he struck him was a wooden tool^b that could cause death, and death resulted, he is a murderer; the murderer must be put to death. ¹⁹The blood-avenger himself shall put the murderer to death; it is he who shall put him to death upon encounter. ²⁰So, too, if he pushed him in hate or hurled something at him on purpose and death resulted, ²¹or if he struck him with his hand in enmity and death resulted, the assailant shall be Different traditions concerning accidental homicide and the cities of refuge are found in Exod. 21.12-14; Deut. 4.41-43; 19.1-13, and Josh. ch. 20. 9-15: Levitical towns also serve another purpose. Six (of the 48) designated towns, three in Transjordan and three in Canaan, function as places of asylum for perpetrators of involuntary manslaughter. 12: The avenger, lit. "redeemer," is a kinsman of the victim who is obligated (vv. 19-27) to avenge (or restore) the lost blood of the slain family member with the blood of the murderer. 15: Aliens are offered asylum like Israelites. These laws, while protecting persons from unjustified vengeance, clearly reflect the Priestly concern over bloodshed as a source of defilement of the land (vv. 33-34). 16-23: Listed are concrete examples that distinguish intentional from unintentional homicide; as is typical of the Bible and ancient Near Eastern law, specific cases rather than general principles are adduced.

put to death; he is a murderer. The blood-avenger shall put the murderer to death upon encounter.

²² But if he pushed him without malice aforethought or hurled any object at him unintentionally, ²³ or inadvertently^a dropped upon him any deadly object of stone, and death resulted—though he was not an enemy of his and did not seek his harm—²⁴ in such cases the assembly shall decide between the slayer and the blood-avenger. ²⁵ The assembly shall protect the manslayer from the blood-avenger, and the assembly shall restore him to the city of refuge to which he fled, and there he shall remain until the death of the high priest who was anointed with the sacred oil. ²⁶ But if the manslayer ever goes outside the limits of the city of refuge to which he has fled, ²⁷ and the blood-avenger comes upon him outside the limits of his city of refuge, and the blood-avenger kills the manslayer, there is no bloodguilt on his account. ²⁸ For he must remain inside his city of refuge until the death of the high priest; after the death of the high priest, the manslayer may return to his land holding.

³⁰ If anyone kills a person, the manslayer may be executed only on the evidence of witnesses; the testimony of a single witness against a person shall not suffice for a sentence of death. ³¹ You may not accept a ransom for the life of a murderer who is guilty of a capital crime; he must be put to death. ³² Nor may you accept ransom in lieu of flight to a city of refuge, enabling one to return to live on his land before the death of the priest. ³³ You shall not pollute the land in which you live; for blood pollutes the land, and the land can have no expiation for blood that is shed on it, except by the blood of him who shed it. ³⁴ You shall not defile the land in which you live, in which I Myself abide, for I the LORD abide among the Israelite people.

36 The family heads in the clan of the descendants of Gilead son of Machir son of Manasseh, one of the Josephite clans, came forward and appealed to Moses and the chieftains, family heads^b of the Israelites. ² They said, “The LORD commanded my lord to assign the land to the Israelites as shares by lot, and my lord was further commanded by the LORD to assign the share of our kinsman Zelophehad to his daughters. ³ Now, if they marry persons from another Israelite tribe, their share will be cut off from our ancestral portion and be added to the portion of

25: Apparently, court is not held in cities of refuge. The death of the high priest seems to atone accidental homicide. Cf. other purgings of impurity and sin by the high priest in his lifetime (Lev. 16.16–22). For the ritual of anointing the high priest, see Lev. 21.10. 26–28: The perpetrator of involuntary manslaughter is only protected from the blood avenger inside the city of refuge. 30–34: These vv., only loosely connected to the preceding, outline the procedure for convicting and punishing persons guilty of intentional homicide.

30: At least two witnesses are required in capital cases (cf. Deut. 17.6). 31: In cases of intentional homicide monetary compensation is explicitly prohibited. It does not compensate for the victim’s lost blood as does the death of the killer (cf. Deut. 21.1–9). Biblical law differs in this respect from practices among other ancient Near Eastern societies, especially the Hittites, where monetary restitution to the family of the victim was an option. Thus, murder in the Bible was seen as a crime beyond an offense against the family of the deceased. 33–34: The notion that bloodshed and other transgressions pollute the land, thereby endangering its inhabitants with divine wrath, is common in the Bible (see Gen. 4.10–12; Lev. 18.28; 2 Sam. 21.1–14; Ezek. 36.17–19; Hos. 4.2–3).

36.1–13: Marriage of Zelophehad’s daughters. Previously, the case of Zelophehad’s daughters elicited divine permission for females to inherit in the absence of male heirs (27.1–11). This ch, which completes the third unit of Numbers as well as of the entire book, addresses practical issues arising from female inheritance of land. It balances two important, but potentially conflicting principles: the right of women to inherit land in certain special circumstances and the idea of not alienating land from its original tribe or clan. The narrative provides legal the tribe into which they marry; thus our allotted portion will be diminished. ⁴And even when the Israelites observe the jubilee, their share will be added to that of the tribe into which they marry, and their share will be cut off from the ancestral portion of our tribe.”

⁵So Moses, at the LORD’s bidding, instructed the Israelites, saying: “The plea of the Josephite tribe is just. ⁶This is what the LORD has commanded concerning the daughters of Zelophehad: They may marry anyone they wish, provided they marry into a clan of their father’s tribe. ⁷No inheritance of the Israelites may pass over from one tribe to another, but the Israelites must remain bound each to the ancestral portion of his tribe. ⁸Every daughter among the Israelite tribes who inherits a share must marry someone from a clan of her father’s tribe, in order that every Israelite may keep his ancestral share. ⁹Thus no inheritance shall pass over from one tribe to another, but the Israelite tribes shall remain bound each to its portion.”

mandment. In cases where a woman is already married to a man from a different tribe, any property she stands to inherit from her father subsequently must go to another relative. 5: The validity of the clan elders’ case evokes divine justice, as did the case of Zelophehad’s daughters (27.6). 10–12: The narrative concludes with the marriage of Zelophehad’s daughters according to the conditions of the law. 13: This v. is a postscript to the preceding laws, those commanded by God while Israel was encamped in Moab (22.1), and is not a concluding formula encompassing the book as a whole. Its form is typical of Priestly literature (e.g., Lev. 26.46; 27.34).

instruction for heiresses so that their marriage will not result in the transfer of ancestral tribal lands from one tribe to another. Some scholars, citing the marriage of Zelophehad’s daughters to their first cousins, maintain that originally the real concern centered on the preservation of clan holdings, rather than those of the larger tribal unit. The discussion of the distribution of permanent tribal holdings in chs 32 and 34 may account for the placement of this explanatory text to 27.1–11 following ch 34. 1–4: These vv. outline the potential problem surrounding female inheritance of property. 1: The opening of the narrative parallels that of 27.1–11. 3–4: The property still passes through the male line, the daughter’s possession being interim. As a result of Israel’s patrilineal and patrilocal system, a consequence of the daughter’s marriage is that the property permanently passes to the husband’s tribe via the inheritance of her sons. 4: Jubilee: According to the Priestly system, every fiftieth year all sold land reverts to its original owner (see Lev. 25.8–16; 27.16–24). The jubilee law does not apply in this case since the land is inherited, not sold. 5–9: These vv. contain broader stipulations for heiress marriages that preserve tribal holdings. The redundancy in vv. 7 and 9 pertaining to the inviolability of tribal estates prompted Ramban to view v. 9 as a separate com-

DEUTERONOMY MAY WELL BE the first book to pose the problem of modernity. Its authors struggled with issues conventionally viewed as exclusively modern ones, such as the historical distance between past and present, the tension between tradition and the needs of the contemporary generation, and the distinction between divine revelation and human interpretation. Seen from this perspective, ancient Israel's Deuteronomy becomes a remarkably contemporary text, one that challenges its readers to rethink their assumptions about time, about Scripture, and about religion. Of course, Deuteronomy is also a deeply traditional text that, more than any other book of the Bible, provides the foundation of Judaism. The religious conviction that God made a covenant with Israel at Sinai and that the Torah embodies the terms of that covenant originates with Deuteronomy. Many familiar Jewish ritual objects, like the mezuzah, the tefillin, and the tzitzit (fringed garment), come from Deuteronomy, as does Judaism's most important prayer, the Shema (6.4–9). But the Shema is more than a prayer. Judaism understands its recitation to be a binding legal act in which individuals pledge their commitment to Torah. By reciting the Shema, the congregation in the synagogue brings the plot of Deuteronomy to life in the present, as it enacts and renews that oath of allegiance to God that, it believes, Israel first vowed on the plains of Moab.

The story begins just as the Israelites, encamped on the plains of Moab, stand poised finally to enter the promised land. The entry into Canaan would provide the long-awaited climax of the story that had begun with the promises to the ancestors in Genesis, and whose fulfillment had been delayed by the enslavement in Egypt and the wandering in the wilderness. Now, on the eve both of his death and of the nation's entry into the land without him, Moses, portrayed as Deuteronomy's speaker, arrests the narrative action in order to deliver a series of three speeches, grouped together as a long valedictory address. He reviews the nation's history, expounds upon their laws, and instructs them about the importance of loyalty to God. He also adjures the nation to uphold this combination of law and theological instruction as a covenant upon the plains of Moab, one that supplements the one previously sworn at Horeb (Deuteronomy's name for Sinai; 28.69). Only after the conclusion of these discourses and a following appendix (chs 31–34) does the overall narrative line resume with the account of the nation's entry into Canaan in Joshua and Judges.

The Historical Context and Literary Background

THE ENGLISH NAME OF THE BOOK, based on the Septuagint (see 17.18 n.), means “second law.” That title reflects the perspective that Deuteronomy is a Mosaic rehearsal of law that was previously given in Exod. chs 19–23. Despite this perspective and the text’s own self-presentation, Deuteronomy is likely not Mosaic in origin. More probably, the core of the book was written sometime during the 7th century BCE by educated scribes associated with Jerusalem’s royal court. It has been long recognized that there are very striking similarities between the distinctive religious and legal requirements of Deuteronomy and the account of the major religious reform carried out by King Josiah in 622 BCE. That reform had been inspired by the discovery in the Temple of a “scroll of the Teaching” (2 Kings 22.8). Josiah’s reform restricted all sacrificial worship of God to Jerusalem and removed foreign elements from the system of worship (technically, the “cultus”); it culminated in the celebration of the first nationally centralized Passover at the Temple in Jerusalem (2 Kings chs 22–23). So strongly do these royal initiatives correspond to the distinctive requirements of Deuteronomy that scholars have long identified the “scroll of the Torah” discovered in Josiah’s Temple as Deuteronomy, and thus have assigned the book a 7th-century date.

Josiah’s reform, with some form of Deuteronomy as its catalyst, was much more a revolution than a simple return to older forms of worship. Previously, it was entirely legitimate to sacrifice to God throughout the land, as did Abraham at Shechem and Bethel (Gen. 12.7–8); Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 35.1–7); Samuel at Mitzpah, Ramah, Gilgal, and Bethlehem (1 Sam. 7.9, 17; 9.11–14; 10.8; 16.1–5); and Elijah upon Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18.20–46). Indeed, even earlier biblical law, associated with the revelation at Sinai, stipulated that God would grant blessing “in every place where I cause My name to be mentioned” (Exod. 20.21). Deuteronomy challenged that older norm, prohibiting sacrifice “at any [or, every] place” and restricting it to a single site, understood to be Jerusalem (Deut. 12.13–14). In this way, Deuteronomy’s self-presentation, whether as an explication of (1.1–5) or as a supplement to (28.69) the prior covenant, does not address the extent to which Deuteronomy actually challenges and revises earlier law.

The historical background of Josiah’s reforms was the increasing threat of imperial domination. The Northern Kingdom of Israel had fallen under the Neo-Assyrian invasion a scant century before (722 BCE; 2 Kings ch 17). Continuing Assyrian incursions down the coastal littoral had all but reduced Judah to a rump-state (2 Kings 18.13). In a desperate bid to preserve the nation’s autonomy, Hezekiah had already made a pact with Assyria (2 Kings 18.13–18). Subsequently, Judah’s political and religious independence seemed to hover uncertainly between the threats presented by Assyria and resurgent Babylon (2 Kings 20.12–15). The resulting military allegiances led to religious syncretism, as Judean officials introduced various foreign forms of worship into the Temple (2 Kings 16.10–20; 21.1–6).

tural, political, and religious autonomy. The monarch extended his reforms into the area of the former Northern Kingdom of Israel and thus implicitly into territory under Assyrian control (2 Kings 23.15–20). Deuteronomy, apparently written sometime during this historical crisis, likewise reflects the desire to preserve Judean cultural and religious integrity. Its authors had the conviction that older conventions of worship and social organization were no longer viable. If the religion of YHVH was to survive the crisis, renewal and adaptation were necessary. Deuteronomy's legal corpus (chs 12–26) provides a comprehensive program for cultural renewal. It addresses worship; the festival calendar; the major institutions of public life (justice, kingship, priesthood, prophecy); criminal, family, and civil law; and ethics. The law is presented as a covenant between God and nation, which the people take an oath to uphold, upon penalty of sanctions, while maintaining unconditional loyalty to their God. That covenant structure closely corresponds to the Neo-Assyrian state treaties that have been recovered from this period, the most famous of which is the Vassal Treaty of Esarhaddon (672 BCE). At a number of points, the authors of Deuteronomy seem consciously to have patterned their covenant after this treaty tradition, which they could have known either directly or in Aramaic translation. From this perspective, Deuteronomy represents a counter-treaty: Its authors turned the weapon of imperialism into a bid for freedom, shifting its oath of loyalty from the Assyrian overlord to their divine sovereign.

Thus tutored in international treaty conventions, the authors of Deuteronomy elsewhere reveal their knowledge of two additional important literary genres from the ancient Near East: the legal collection (15.1–18 n.; 17.8–13 n., 14–20 n.; 22.13–23.1 n.) and wisdom literature (1.13 n.; 4.2 n.). Moreover, they also employed a convention of authorship familiar in their time. They did not directly attach their name to their composition or write in their own voice. Instead, they attributed their composition to a prestigious figure from the past. By employing “Moses” as their spokesperson, they established a link with tradition at precisely the time when tradition, for the sake of survival, had to be transformed. This convention of ascribing a text to an ancient personage, called “pseudepigraphy,” is well known in the literature of the Second Temple period; examples include Jubilees, 4 Ezra, the Testament of Abraham, and (among the Dead Sea Scrolls) the Temple Scroll.

The Layers of Tradition

DEUTERONOMY PRESERVES SEVERAL LAYERS of tradition within itself: The structure of three different discourses with an appendix already suggests a process of literary growth. That growth is closely connected to the gradual formation of the Hebrew Bible. To appreciate what is involved, it helps imaginatively to turn the clock back to the time before there was an assembled, complete Bible as we now know it.

1. When Deuteronomy was first promulgated, it would not have been part of any larger whole. Instead, it would have been complete by itself as a “scroll of the torah” (i.e., the “scroll of the Teaching” in 2 Kings 22.8). It would have consisted primarily of some form of most of the laws of chs 12–26, framed by a relatively simple introduction and conclusion. This form of Deuteronomy presented itself as a treaty concluded between the nation and its God in a formal ceremony whereby each citizen took an oath of loyalty under penalty of strict sanctions (28.1–46). This was very likely the preexilic form of Deuteronomy.

2. At a later stage, presumably sometime during the exile (586–538 BCE), Deuteronomy would have been incorporated into the Deuteronomistic History (Joshua through 2 Kings) to serve as its introduction. At this point, the “Deuteronomistic” editors would have given the book its present literary frame (1.1–4.40, chs 31–34), while also adding to the legal corpus, selectively tying its promises or expectations to the later historical material (see 12.8 n.). Expansions in Deuteronomy that reflect the Babylonian exile may derive from this stage (i.e., 4.25–31; 28.47–56; 30.1–10).
3. At a still later point, in the postexilic period, Priestly editors appended Deuteronomy to the newly formed Pentateuch, to serve as its conclusion. Ironically, the decision to conclude the Pentateuch with Deuteronomy separated the overall narrative plan of Genesis through Numbers from its logical fulfillment in an account of the conquest of the land. This narrative climax was delayed until Joshua.

The insertion of Deuteronomy into these larger literary units makes an important theological statement. Following the insertion of Deuteronomy into the story of the promise of the land to the patriarchs, the enslavement in Egypt, the exodus, and the wilderness wandering, Deuteronomy’s last chapter (ch 34) brings to a close both the book and the Torah. But that formal conclusion now separates not only Moses but also the reader from access to the land whose covenantal promise was the basis of the entire narrative (Gen. 12.1). Early on, from the vantage point of the Judean hills, Abram viewed the panorama of that promised land, as it extended in every direction of the compass (Gen. 13.14–17). But at the end of his life he was constrained to bargain for a small plot of land where he might bury his wife, Sarah (Gen. 23.1–20): poignant testimony that Abraham never gained possession of the land promised him. So too, now, closing the circle, does the Torah conclude with a panorama that symbolizes dislocation and loss, as Moses looks out over Canaan from the heights of Mount Pisgah. Prohibited from entering the very promised land to which he successfully led his people, he finds his only access in that forlorn prospect.

As with Abraham and Moses, so, too, the reader. Ancient editors have deliberately defined the Torah as a literary unit so as, first, to accommodate the addition of Deuteronomy and, second, to sever it from its logically expected fulfillment. The possession of the land is diverted instead into the next literary unit, which is to say, into the future. So profound a reconfiguration both of the patriarchal promise and of the overall plot is conceivable only in light of the historical experience of exile, which profoundly called the possession of the land into question. Had possession of the land remained central to the covenant, Israelite religion would have collapsed. The fulfillment of the Torah is thus redactionally redefined as obedience to the requirements of covenantal law rather than the acquisition of a finite possession.

The Transformation of Deuteronomy in the Second Temple Period

IN BIBLICAL NARRATIVE, THE TORAH crosses the symbolic geographic divide of the Jordan, carried, in the Ark of the Covenant, upon the shoulders of the Levitical priests (Deut. 31.25; Josh. 3.14–17). So did the text of Deuteronomy cross the historical divide of the Babylonian exile, borne on the shoulders of the multiple Jewish communities that survived the exile and that developed their distinct identities thereafter. This crucial transition from the First Temple to the Second Temple periods, from preexilic Israelite religion to postexilic religion, represents a major pivot in the history of Israelite literature, thought, and belief. The wrenching force of that transition, as institutions and assumptions underwent profound transformations, created “stress fractures” in the text of Deuteronomy. In many cases, preexilic religious and legal norms became unintelligible to these postexilic communities. Therefore in the process of teaching and translating Deuteronomy, they were forced to translate not only the language of the text but also its ideas: from one language into another, from one historical period into another, from one set of assumptions into another. Sometimes this overlay of postexilic ideas may interfere with understanding the original meaning of the text, even though that overlay now represents the conventional way that Deuteronomy has come to be read and understood. Such cases require attention in the annotations.

As a broader model for understanding such issues, it would be helpful to view the religion of Israel reflected by Deuteronomy in the preexilic period as in many ways a “Near Eastern” religion. This applies preeminently to the original theology of the text, which, like all religions of its time and place, viewed its god as presiding over a “divine council” of lesser deities (5.7 n.; 6.4 n.). From this perspective, texts like the Shema called for exclusive loyalty to God, without thereby denying the existence of other deities, just as Near Eastern treaties required that a vassal swear allegiance to a single political monarch (6.4–9 n.). But once radical monotheism became the Jewish norm in the Second Temple period, under the influence of exilic prophecy, the original “Israelite” view gradually became “foreign” and unintelligible. The Shema could only be understood as affirming the later “truth” of Jewish monotheism. This authentically Israelite religious language seems to have become so alien that the Hebrew text was “corrected” in several cases to bring it into conformity with later Jewish theology (32.8 n.; 32.43 n.).

The same issue applies to law. In certain cases, the preexilic authors of Deuteronomy clearly followed Near Eastern procedures. For example, they required the immediate, summary execution of those disloyal to God, as if under the emergency conditions of martial law (13.10 n.). In the Second Temple period, however, this breach of Deuteronomy’s own requirement for due process (17.2–7 n.) was understandably seen as contradicting the norms of Jewish law! The text was therefore read and taught as if the requirement for execution were to take place only after the due process that, in fact, it originally bypassed. As a next step, this originally oral legal interpretation of the law was introduced into the text of the law, when Deuteronomy was translated into Greek for the Jewish community of Alexandria (in the Septuagint, ca. 225 BCE). The conscientious translator could do no less, since that revision of the law was what the law “had” to mean, lest the Torah here contradict Jewish law!

Just as the Septuagint updates the Hebrew in light of later Jewish law, elsewhere the reverse may hold true. On occasion, the Greek version retains classical views of preexilic Israelite religion that have been updated or corrected in the standardized Masoretic Text of the Bible (see notes at 28.69; 32.8; 32.43). In such cases, the Septuagint or the Dead Sea Scrolls may open a window into the original meaning of a passage that has been lost in the Masoretic Text. The commentary will therefore take these ancient textual “witnesses” to the text into account, in the hope of recovering what Deuteronomy’s original authors sought to say. Since the NJPS translation follows the Masoretic Hebrew version, which is familiar from synagogue worship, it should simply be pointed out that these additional versions are themselves part of Jewish history. Unfortunately, at the level of popular culture, it is often no longer recognized that the Septuagint was a Jewish translation, one prepared for the thriving Jewish community of Alexandria. In translating the Bible into their living language of Greek, that community saw the Torah as also telling their story. Thus, where Deuteronomy’s Hebrew refers to the “horror” of foreign invasion as punishment for national wrongdoing, the Septuagint reinterprets that punishment as the contemporary truth of “diaspora” (28.25 n.). The multiple Judaisms of the Second Temple period each had their own way of reading Deuteronomy, and thus of having Moses include them in his oration.

Deuteronomy and Interpretation

DEUTERONOMY REWARDS THE ATTENTION of contemporary readers and thinkers, whether religiously committed or secular, whether Jewish or non-Jewish. The modernity of Deuteronomy is that it does not permit itself to be read literally or passively. It challenges its readers actively to confront the problem of the relation between divine revelation and human interpretation, even as it breaks down the conventional boundaries between Scripture and tradition. It makes paradox central to its structure. As the book narrates the story of its formation, it also anticipates its prior existence as a complete literary work (31.1–34.12 n.). Interpretation is directly and indirectly a theme of Deuteronomy (1.5 n.). At many points, the authors of Deuteronomy reinterpret earlier laws and narratives (6.1–3 n.). Moreover, the process of the book’s editing intentionally preserves conflicting perspectives on a full range of key issues central to Israelite religion: on whether the revelation of the Decalogue at Sinai/Horeb was direct or required the mediation of Moses (5.5 n.); on the stature of Moses relative to other prophets (34.10 n.); on the nature of divine punishment for sin (5.9–10 n.; 7.10 n.); on whether God rules as head of a pantheon or is the only God who exists (see notes at 4.15–31, 35; and 32.8); and even on Deuteronomy’s own setting in time and place (see notes at 1.1; 2.12; and 3.11). There is no facile “air-brushing” away of this interplay of perspectives, which in effect reflects an ongoing ancient debate about fundamental religious assumptions. There is finally, for Deuteronomy, no access to God in the covenant without joining this debate. The reader of Deuteronomy must become, like the authors of Deuteronomy, an interpreter.

1 These are the words that Moses addressed to all Israel on the other side of the Jordan.—^aThrough the wilderness, in the Arabah near Suph, between Paran and Tophel, Laban, Hazeroth, and Di-zahab, ²it is eleven days from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea by the Mount Seir route.—³It was in the fortieth year, on the first day of the eleventh month, that Moses addressed the Israelites in accordance with the instructions that the LORD had given him for them, ⁴after he had defeated Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and King Og of Bashan, who dwelt at Ashtaroth [and^b] Edrei. ⁵On the other side of the Jordan, in the land of Moab, Moses undertook to expound this Teaching. He said:

a The rest of this verse and v. 2 are unclear; cf. v. 19 and Num. 33.16–36.

b Cf. Josh. 12.4; 13.12, 31.

1.1–4.43: The first discourse of Moses. This first of Deuteronomy's three discourses has two subsections: an historical retrospective (1.6–3.29) and a sermon on the importance of obeying Torah (4.1–40). An editorial headnote (1.1–5) and appendix (4.41–43) frame the discourse. 1.1–5: Editorial headnote. Refers to Moses in the third person, attributes the book to him, and locates the book historically and geographically. 1: On the other side of the Jordan, designating the land east of the Jordan River (Transjordan), where the Israelites have stopped, awaiting entry to the land. That geographical frame of reference places the speaker west of the Jordan and thus already in Canaan. According to the narrative line, however, the Israelites have not yet reached the promised land and Moses never does. From this and similar anachronisms, a small number of medieval Jewish commentators already recognized that not all of the Torah could be attributed to Moses (see also 2.12 n.; 3.11 n.); this is the modern consensus as well. The Arabah, the rift valley that includes the Jordan River and stretches south from the Dead Sea through Eilat and the Red Sea into Africa. The places mentioned cannot be identified with certainty. 2: Eleven days implies a scathing indictment of the nation. As a result of their rebellion in the desert (Num. chs 13–14), it actually took them thirty-eight years, eight months, and twenty days to reach this point after they first broke camp (Num. 10.11). Horeb (Exod. 3.1; 17.6; 33.6) is Deuteronomy's term for the mount of revelation. "(Mount) Sinai," in contrast, is the more standard term used by the Yahwistic and Priestly writers elsewhere in the Torah (see Exod. 19.11; 34.29); it occurs in Deuteronomy only at 33.2. 4: Num. 21.21–35. 5: Expound seems intentionally ambiguous about whether ⁶The LORD our God spoke to us at Horeb, saying: You have stayed long enough at this mountain. ⁷Start out and make your way to the hill country of the Amorites and to all their neighbors in the Arabah, the hill country, the Shephelah,^a the Negeb, the seacoast, the land of the Canaanites,^b and the Lebanon, as far as the Great River, the river Euphrates. ⁸See, I place the land at your disposal. Go, take possession of the land that the LORD swore to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to assign to them and to their heirs after them.

⁹Thereupon I said to you, "I cannot bear the burden of you by myself. ¹⁰The LORD your God has multiplied you until you are today as numerous as the stars in the sky.—¹¹May the LORD, the God of your fathers, increase your numbers a thousandfold, and bless you as He promised you.—¹²How can I bear unaided the trouble of you, and the burden, and the bickering! ¹³Pick from each of your tribes men who are wise, discerning, and experienced, and I will appoint them as your heads." ¹⁴You answered me and said, "What you propose to do is good." ¹⁵So I took your tribal leaders, wise and experienced men, and appointed them heads over you: chiefs of thousands, chiefs of hundreds, chiefs of fifties, and chiefs of tens, and officials for your tribes. ¹⁶I charged your magistrates at that time as follows, "Hear out your fellow men, and decide justly between any man and a fellow Israelite or a stranger. ¹⁷You shall not be partial in judgment: hear out low and high alike. Fear no man, for judgment is God's. And any matter that is too difficult for you, you shall bring to me and I will hear it." ¹⁸Thus I instructed you, at that time, about the various things that you should do.

Moses here proclaims new religious teachings, not previously heard, or simply explicates material already proclaimed. This Teaching, lit. "this torah" (4.8, 44; 27.3, 8, 26; 28.58, 61; 29.20, 28; 30.10; 31.9, 11, 12; 32.46). The word designates not only the combination of ritual, civil, family, and ethical law found in chs 12–26, but also the religious instructions of chs 5–11. Here, as elsewhere in Deuteronomy, the reference is not to the entire Torah, but specifically to Deuteronomy itself.

1.6–3.29: Historical review. Moses rehearses the exodus, revelation at Horeb, and rebellion in the desert for the generation who arose after these events and did not directly witness them, so that they may understand what brought them to the present moment. At a number of points, this narrative diverges from that of Exodus–Numbers.

6: The original of the divine command quoted has not been preserved (cf. Num. ch 10). 7: Amorites, as at Gen. 15.16, seems to be used generically for the family of nations who are the original inhabitants of Canaan, rather than technically to designate one of those nations (contrast Gen. 15.19–21; Exod. 3.8, 17). The Shephelah is the region of foothills between the hill country on the east and the sea-coast on the west. The Negeb is the semi-arid region south of the hill country. Great River: The ideal borders of the Israelite empire extended to the Euphrates (Gen. 15.18), the northern limit of David's conquests (2 Sam. 8.3). 8: See . . . at your disposal: With this binding oral proclamation, God symbolically displays the land and transfers its legal title to Israel (similarly, Gen. 13.14–15).

1.9–18: Leadership institutionalized. This account combines and reinterprets two previous accounts of the creation of a military-judicial system to share the burden of leadership (compare vv. 9–12 with Num. 11.14–17 and vv. 13–17 with Exod. 18.13–27). This new version places the institutionalization of leadership after the departure from Sinai rather than before it and omits the important advisory role of Jethro, the non-Israelite (contrast Exod. ch 18). 10: Stars in the sky, thus fulfilling the promises to the ancestors (Gen. 15.5; 22.17; 26.4; Exod. 32.13). 11: God of your fathers: Deuteronomy's normal phrase is "the LORD your/our God" (i.e., vv. 6, 10, 19–21; 6.1, 4, 10). This departure from that formula ties this new generation to its past by recalling God's earlier promises (Gen. 26.24; 32.10; Exod. 3.6).

13: Wise (contrast Exod. 18.21), an attribute regularly stressed by Deuteronomy (4.6; 32.29), suggesting the influence of wisdom literature upon its authors. Experienced, lit. "knowing," continuing the emphasis upon wisdom as a criterion for leadership. 16: Stranger, better, "resident alien," a legal term that refers to the non-Israelite who lives in the community without title to land and who is therefore economically vulnerable. Deuteronomy insists upon a single law that applies to Israelite and non-Israelite alike (5.14; 10.18–19; 14.29; 16.11; 24.14, 17, 19–21). 17: Similarly, 16.18–20.

¹⁹We set out from Horeb and traveled the great and terrible wilderness that you saw, along the road to the hill country of the Amorites, as the LORD our God had commanded us. When we reached Kadesh-barnea, ²⁰I said to you, “You have come to the hill country of the Amorites which the LORD our God is giving to us. ²¹See, the LORD your God has placed the land at your disposal. Go up, take possession, as the LORD, the God of your fathers, promised you. Fear not and be not dismayed.”

²²Then all of you came to me and said, “Let us send men ahead to reconnoiter the land for us and bring back word on the route we shall follow and the cities we shall come to.” ²³I approved of the plan, and so I selected twelve of your men, one from each tribe. ²⁴They made for the hill country, came to the wadi Eshcol, and spied it out. ²⁵They took some of the fruit of the land with them and brought it down to us. And they gave us this report: “It is a good land that the LORD our God is giving to us.”

²⁶Yet you refused to go up, and flouted the command of the LORD your God. ²⁷You sulked^a in your tents and said, “It is because the LORD hates us that He brought us out of the land of Egypt, to hand us over to the Amorites to wipe us out. ^{28b}What kind of place^b are we going to? Our kinsmen have taken the heart out of us, saying, ‘We saw there a people stronger and taller than we, large cities with walls sky-high, and even Anakites.’”

²⁹I said to you, “Have no dread or fear of them. ³⁰None other than the LORD your God, who goes before you, will fight for you, just as He did for you in Egypt before your very eyes, ³¹and in the wilderness, where you saw how the LORD your God carried you, as a man carries his son, all the way that you traveled until you came to this place. ³²Yet for all that, you have no faith in the LORD your God, ³³who goes before you on your journeys—to scout the place where you are to encamp—in fire by night and in cloud by day, in order to guide you on the route you are to follow.”

³⁴When the LORD heard your loud complaint, He was angry. He vowed: ³⁵Not one of these men, this evil generation, shall see the good land that I swore to give to your fathers—³⁶none except Caleb son of Jephunneh; he shall see it, and to him and his descendants will I give the land on which he set foot, because he remained loyal to the LORD.

³⁷Because of you the LORD was incensed with me too, and He said: You shall not enter it either. ³⁸Joshua son of

1.19–46: From Horeb to Kadesh: A retelling, with significant variations, of the spies’ reconnaissance of the land (Num. ch 13), the people’s complaining of God’s inability to fulfill the promises made to Israel’s ancestors (Num. 14.1–38), and the abortive attempt to penetrate Canaan from the south despite the divine command not to do so (Num. 14.39–45; cf. 21.1–3). 28: Anakites, see Num. 13.22, 33 n. 30: Exod. 14.14. 33: Fire . . . cloud, see Exod. 13.21–22 n. 34–36: See Num. 14.28–30. 37: Here Moses is not punished for his own sin (contrast Num. 20.10–13; 27.12–23). Instead, the narrator presents Moses as innocent and as vicariously bearing the punishment due Israel for its sin (see 3.24–28).

Nun, who attends you, he shall enter it. Imbue him with strength, for he shall allot it to Israel.³⁹ Moreover, your little ones who you said would be carried off, your children who do not yet know good from bad, they shall enter it; to them will I give it and they shall possess it.⁴⁰ As for you, turn about and march into the wilderness by the way of the Sea of Reeds.

⁴¹You replied to me, saying, "We stand guilty before the LORD. We will go up now and fight, just as the LORD our God commanded us." And you all girded yourselves with war gear and recklessly^a started for the hill country.⁴² But the LORD said to me, "Warn them: Do not go up and do not fight, since I am not in your midst; else you will be routed by your enemies."⁴³ I spoke to you, but you would not listen; you flouted the LORD's command and willfully marched into the hill country.⁴⁴ Then the Amorites who lived in those hills came out against you like so many bees and chased you, and they crushed you at Hormah in Seir.⁴⁵ Again you wept before the LORD; but the LORD would not heed your cry or give ear to you.

2⁴⁶ Thus, after you had remained at Kadesh ^ball that long time,^b ¹we marched back into the wilderness by the way of the Sea of Reeds, as the LORD had spoken to me, and skirted the hill country of Seir a long time.

² Then the LORD said to me: ³You have been skirting this hill country long enough; now turn north. ⁴ And charge the people as follows: You will be passing through the territory of your kinsmen, the descendants of Esau, who live in Seir. Though they will be afraid of you, be very careful ⁵not to provoke them. For I will not give you of their land so much as a foot can tread on; I have given the hill country of Seir as a possession to Esau. ⁶What food you eat you shall obtain from them for money; even the water you drink you shall procure from them for money.^c ⁷ Indeed, the LORD your God has blessed you in all your undertakings. He has watched over your wanderings through this great wilderness; the LORD your God has been with you these past forty years: you have lacked nothing.

⁸ We then moved on, away from our kinsmen, the descendants of Esau, who live in Seir, away from the road of the Arabah, away from Elath and Ezion-geber; and we marched on in the direction of the wilderness of Moab. ⁹ And the LORD said to me: Do not harass the Moabites or Turning along the brook Zered (modern Wadi el-Hasa), which formed Edom's southern boundary, Israel detoured through the wilderness of Moab toward the Amorite kingdom of Sihon. 9: Moab and Ammon (v. 19) were traditionally related through Lot (Gen. 19.36–38).

provoke them to war. For I will not give you any of their land as a possession; I have assigned Ar as a possession to the descendants of Lot.—

¹⁰It was formerly inhabited by the Emim, a people great and numerous, and as tall as the Anakites.

¹¹Like the Anakites, they are counted as Rephaim; but the Moabites call them Emim. ¹²Similarly, Seir was formerly inhabited by the Horites; but the descendants of Esau dispossessed them, wiping them out and settling in their place, just as Israel did in the land they were to possess, which the LORD had given to them.—

So we crossed the wadi Zered. ¹⁴The time that we spent in travel from Kadesh-barnea until we crossed the wadi Zered was thirty-eight years, until that whole generation of warriors had perished from the camp, as the LORD had sworn concerning them. ¹⁵Indeed, the hand of the LORD struck them, to root them out from the camp to the last man.

¹⁶When all the warriors among the people had died off, ¹⁷the LORD spoke to me, saying: ¹⁸You are now passing through the territory of Moab, through Ar. ¹⁹You will then be close to the Ammonites; do not harass them or start a fight with them. For I will not give any part of the land of the Ammonites to you as a possession; I have assigned it as a possession to the descendants of Lot.—

²⁰It, too, is counted as Rephaim country. It was formerly inhabited by Rephaim, whom the Ammonites call Zamzummim, ²¹a people great and numerous and as tall as the Anakites. The LORD wiped them out, so that [the Ammonites] dispossessed them and settled in their place, ²²as He did for the descendants of Esau who live in Seir, when He wiped out the Horites before them, so that they dispossessed them and settled in their place, as is still the case.^a ²³So, too, with the Avvim who dwelt in villages in the vicinity of Gaza: the Caphtorim, who came from Crete,^b wiped them out and settled in their place.—

²⁴Up! Set out across the wadi Arnon! See, I give into your power Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land. Begin the occupation: engage him in battle. ²⁵This day I begin to put the dread and fear of you upon the peoples everywhere under heaven, so that they shall tremble and quake because of you whenever they hear you mentioned.

10–12: These verses are slightly indented, setting them off from the rest of the passage so as to mitigate the anachronistic post-conquest perspective (see v. 12 n.).

10–11: Emim, Rephaim (cf. v. 20; 3.11–13), names reflecting the legendary view that the aboriginal inhabitants of the land were fearsome giants. 12: Horites, see Gen. 36.20 n. As Israel did . . . to possess: Here the Israelite conquest of the land is represented as already having been completed, conflicting with the attribution to Moses and the narrative setting in Transjordan, prior to the conquest. The anachronism reflects the date of composition of this section (see 1.1 n.; 3.11 n.). 13: Wadi, a seasonal stream that dries up in the summer. 14: Fulfilling God's angry oath (1.34–35; Num. 14.28–30). Without the death of the generation of the exodus, here marked as accomplished, there can be no entry into the promised land.

15: Hand of the LORD, thus indicating that they did not die merely of old age or natural causes. The imagery inverts the standard idea of holy war: God had turned against Israel rather than fighting on its behalf (32.30 n.; see 3.22; 7.1–5; 12.29–31; 20.1–20).

20: Cf. vv. 10–11 n., Gen. 14.5. 23: Caphtorim . . . Crete refers to the conquest of the coastal plain by Sea Peoples such as Philistines shortly after 1200 BCE (see Gen. 10.14; Amos 9.7).

³⁰But King Sihon of Heshbon refused to let us pass through, because the LORD had stiffened his will and hardened his heart in order to deliver him into your power—as is now the case. ³¹And the LORD said to me: See, I begin by placing Sihon and his land at your disposal. Begin the occupation; take possession of his land.

3 We made our way up the road toward Bashan, and King Og of Bashan with all his men took the field against us at Edrei. ²But the LORD said to me: Do not fear him, for I am delivering him and all his men and his country into your power, and you will do to him as you did to Sihon king of the Amorites, who lived in Heshbon.

³So the LORD our God also delivered into our power King Og of Bashan, with all his men, and we dealt them such a blow that no survivor was left. ⁴At that time we captured all his towns; there was not a town that we did not take from them: sixty towns, the whole district of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan—⁵all those towns were fortified with high walls, gates,^d and bars—apart from a great number of unwalled towns. ⁶We doomed them as we had done in the case of King Sihon of Heshbon; we doomed every town—men, women, and children—⁷and retained as booty all the cattle and the spoil of the towns.

⁸Thus we seized, at that time, from the two Amorite kings, the country beyond the Jordan, from the wadi Arnon to Mount Hermon—⁹Sidonians called Hermon Sirion, and the Amorites call it Senir—¹⁰all the towns of the Tableland and the whole of Gilead and Bashan as far as Salcah^a and Edrei, the towns of Og's kingdom in Bashan. ¹¹Only King Og of Bashan was left of the remaining Rephaim. His bedstead, an iron bedstead, is now in Rabbah of the Ammonites; it is nine cubits long and four cubits wide, by ^bthe standard cubit!^b

¹⁸At that time I charged you,^f saying, "The LORD your God has given you this country to possess. You must go as shock-troops, warriors all, at the head of your Israelite kinsmen. ¹⁹Only your wives, children, and livestock—I know that you have much livestock—shall be left in the towns I have assigned to you, ²⁰until the LORD has granted your kinsmen a haven such as you have, and they too have taken possession of the land that the LORD your God is assigning them, beyond the Jordan. Then you may return each to the homestead that I have assigned to him."

11: The oversized bed of Og, one of the legendary Rephaim (2.10–11), was a "museum piece" in Rabbah, a city on the Ammonite border. The emphasis that this bed is now there places the historical perspective of the narrator, and thus of Deuteronomy's composition, long after the events here recounted (1.1 n.; 2.12 n.). A cubit was about 44 cm (17.5 in.).

²³I pleaded with the LORD at that time, saying, ²⁴“O Lord GOD, You who let Your servant see the first works of Your greatness and Your mighty hand, You whose powerful deeds no god in heaven or on earth can equal! ²⁵Let me, I pray, cross over and see the good land on the other side of the Jordan, that good hill country, and the Lebanon.” ²⁶But the LORD was wrathful with me on your account and would not listen to me. The LORD said to me, “Enough! Never speak to Me of this matter again! ²⁷Go up to the summit of Pisgah and gaze about, to the west, the north, the south, and the east. Look at it well, for you shall not go across yonder Jordan. ²⁸Give Joshua his instructions, and imbue him with strength and courage, for he shall go across at the head of this people, and he shall allot to them the land that you may only see.”

²⁹Meanwhile we stayed on in the valley near Beth-peor.

4 And now, O Israel, give heed to the laws and rules that I am instructing you to observe, so that you may live to enter and occupy the land that the LORD, the God of your fathers, is giving you. ²You shall not add anything to what I command you or take anything away from it, but keep the commandments of the LORD your God that I enjoin upon you. ³You saw with your own eyes what the LORD did in the matter of Baal-peor, that the LORD your God wiped out from among you every person who followed Baal-peor; ⁴while you, who held fast to the LORD your God, are all alive today.

⁵See, I have imparted to you laws and rules, as the LORD my God has commanded me, for you to abide by in ment and broadening its significance. Admonitions to obedience (vv. 1, 40) frame the unit, which systematically contrasts: obedience (vv. 5–24)/disobedience (vv. 25–31); remembering/forgetting (vv. 9, 23); the LORD/other gods (vv. 7, 34); Israel’s revealed Torah/the laws of other nations (vv. 8, 28); and God/idols (vv. 12–20). The central lesson is that the correct worship of God is aniconic: Images (whether of God or of natural phenomena) should play no role in Israelite religion. This becomes so strong a theme that idolatry, in and of itself, is asserted to be the cause of the nation’s exile from its land (vv. 25–31). The explicit reference to exile suggests that the unit is a late theological explanation for the Babylonian exile (586–538 BCE). The focus on idolatry as the basis for the divine punishment diverges significantly from the perspective elsewhere that views failure to heed “all his [God’s] commandments and decrees” as the cause of exile (28.15; cf. 28.1, 45. 58–59).

4.1–4: The incident at Baal-peor (Num. 25.1–9) is recalled to emphasize the importance of fidelity to God and the dire consequences of worshipping other gods. 2: This admonition not to alter the Torah, whether by addition or subtraction (cf. 13.1), parallels similar admonitions in wisdom literature (Prov. 30.6; Eccl. 3.14; 12.12–13; Sir. 42.21; cf. Revelation 22.18–19). It seems to originate in ancient Near Eastern literature (Egyptian wisdom codes; Neo-Assyrian state treaties; cf. 1 Maccabees 8.30). 3: Followed, see 6.14 n. 5–8: The Torah as Israel’s “wisdom.” The author here challenges the prevailing Near Eastern idea that wisdom was a royal prerogative. Whereas, for example, the ancient Babylonian Laws of Hammurabi (ca. 1755 BCE) praised the “just decisions” of its “wise” king (cols 47.1; 4.7), here it is rather the nation Israel who will be internationally renowned as “wise” for its “just”

Arabah. 22: The whole story of the exodus, wilderness journey, and invasion of Canaan is governed by the conventions of holy war, whereby God is a divine warrior who engages in battle on behalf of Israel. 23–29: Num. 27.12–23. 24: No god . . . can equal: The assertion of God’s superior power, relative to other gods in heaven, assumes the existence of other gods (5.7 n; 6.4 n; 32.8 n; Exod. 15.11;

Ps. 89.5–8). For the later perspective of monotheism, see 4.35 n.

4.1–40: Exhortation to obey the Torah. While preceding the Decalogue in narrative terms (5.6–18), this unit provides a historically later theological reflection upon it, focusing on the second command-the land that you are about to enter and occupy. ⁶Observe them faithfully, for that will be proof of your wisdom and discernment to other peoples, who on hearing of all these laws will say, "Surely, that great nation is a wise and discerning people." ⁷For what great nation is there that has a god so close at hand as is the LORD our God whenever we call upon Him? ⁸Or what great nation has laws and rules as perfect as all this Teaching that I set before you this day?

⁹But take utmost care and watch yourselves scrupulously, so that you do not forget the things that you saw with your own eyes and so that they do not fade from your mind as long as you live. And make them known to your children and to your children's children: ¹⁰The day you stood before the LORD your God at Horeb, when the LORD said to me, "Gather the people to Me that I may let them hear My words, in order that they may learn to revere Me as long as they live on earth, and may so teach their children." ¹¹You came forward and stood at the foot of the mountain. The mountain was ablaze with flames to the very skies, dark with densest clouds. ¹²The LORD spoke to you out of the fire; you heard the sound of words but perceived no shape—nothing but a voice. ¹³He declared to you the covenant that He commanded you to observe, the Ten Commandments; and He inscribed them on two tablets of stone. ¹⁴At the same time the LORD commanded me to impart to you laws and rules for you to observe in the land that you are about to cross into and occupy.

¹⁵For your own sake, therefore, be most careful—since you saw no shape when the LORD your God spoke to you laws (vv. 6, 8). See also 29.29 n. and 30.11–14 n. 7–8: Israel is distinguished both by its God and by its law: The two ideas are interlocked. 7: God is close at hand, both in having entered history on behalf of Israel and in revealing His will as Torah (30.14). 8: The laws are perfect (lit. "righteous"), not only in their morality but also as embodying the will of God. This Israelite idea of law as divine revelation diverges from Near Eastern views of law as royal wisdom (see 5.1–30 n.).

4.9–14: The revelation at Sinai/Horeb (Exod. chs 19–20; Deut. ch 5) is recalled in order to instruct the present generation, who did not experience it. 9: The paired injunctions not to forget the powerful experience of God's actions and to educate your children, so that the past becomes "present" also to them, represent a prominent aim of Deuteronomy: to overcome the historical distance of the past and to maintain it as a source of identity (vv. 23, 25; 6.2, 7, 20–25; 8.11; 9.7; 31.13; 32.18). You saw, and the following "you stood" (v. 10) are highly paradoxical assertions. Neither is literally true: The actual generation of the exodus had died off and been replaced by this new one, who had experienced none of the events here being recounted (2.14–15 n.). This paradoxical structure of thought, whereby

Moses addresses those who had not witnessed the events as if they had, while insisting that they inculcate the events to posterity, is central to Deuteronomy's theology of history (5.3–4, 20; 11.7; 29.13–14). This develops further in postbiblical Judaism to the idea that all Jews, past, present, and future, were at Sinai. 10: My words, here, the Decalogue ("Ten Commandments"; v. 13; 10.4). Elsewhere, however, the reference to God's "words" designates the legal corpus of chs 12–26 (12.28). Revere (lit. "fear"): This important Deuteronomistic characterization for the proper relation between the nation and God seems to originate with wisdom literature (Prov. 1.7; Job 28.28). 11: The manifestation of a god ("theophany") was often associated with disturbances of nature in Ugaritic (Canaanite) literature (see 5.1–30 n.). This motif was taken over by Israelite writers and applied to God (Exod. 19.16–19; 20.15; Pss. 18.7–15; 29.3–9).

12: Shape (also vv. 15; "likeness" vv. 16, 23, 25), directly alluding to the second commandment of the Decalogue (5.8 = Exod. 20.4). 13: A subtle reinterpretation of Sinai: The specification of that event as one where God proclaimed the Ten Commandments occurs only here, at 10.4, and at Exod. 34.28. There is no special number of or name for the commandments (lit. "words") in Exod. chs 19–20 or Deut. ch 5. The rationale for two tablets of stone (as at 5.19) derives from ancient Near Eastern state treaties, whereby both sovereign and vassal would retain a separate copy of the treaty. The popular image of a single tablet with a double arch misunderstands that historical context.

4.15–31: Reinterpretation of the second commandment. The Decalogue concedes the existence of other gods, while prohibiting Israel from worshipping them (5.7; cf. 32.8; Exod. 15.11; Ps. 82.1). It then separately prohibits the making of images (5.8). The distinction between those two commandments is dissolved here. The exist-at Horeb out of the fire—¹⁶not to act wickedly and make for yourselves a sculptured image in any likeness whatever: the form of a man or a woman, ¹⁷the form of any beast on earth, the form of any winged bird that flies in the sky, ¹⁸the form of anything that creeps on the ground, the form of any fish that is in the waters below the earth. ¹⁹And when you look up to the sky and behold the sun and the moon and the stars, the whole heavenly host, you must not be lured into bowing down to them or serving them. These the LORD your God allotted to other peoples everywhere under heaven; ²⁰but you the LORD took and brought out of Egypt, that iron blast furnace, to be His very own people, as is now the case.

²¹Now the LORD was angry with me on your account and swore that I should not cross the Jordan and enter the good land that the LORD your God is assigning you as a heritage. ²²For I must die in this land; I shall not cross the Jordan. But you will cross and take possession of that good land. ²³Take care, then, not to forget the covenant that the LORD your God concluded with you, and not to make for yourselves a sculptured image in any likeness, against which the LORD your God has enjoined you. ²⁴For the LORD your God is a consuming fire, an impassioned God.

²⁵When you have begotten children and children's children and are long established in the land, should you act wickedly and make for yourselves a sculptured image in any likeness, causing the LORD your God displeasure and vexation, ²⁶I call heaven and earth this day to witness against you that you shall soon perish from the land that you are crossing the Jordan to possess; you shall not long endure in it, but shall be utterly wiped out. ²⁷The LORD will scatter you among the peoples, and only a scant few of you shall be left among the nations to which the LORD will drive you. ²⁸There you will serve man-made gods of wood and stone, that cannot see or hear or eat or smell.

²⁹But if you search there for the LORD your God, you will find Him, if only you seek Him with all your heart and soul—³⁰when you are in distress because all these things have befallen you and, in the end, return to the LORD your God and obey Him. ³¹For the LORD your God is a compassionate God: He will not fail you nor will He let you perish; He will not forget the covenant which He made on oath with your fathers.

³²You have but to inquire about bygone ages that came before you, ever since God created man on earth, from one end of heaven to the other: has anything as grand as this

tence of other gods is no longer conceivable; the sole focus is the prohibition against idols. Here and elsewhere (see v. 19 n.), key ideas in Deuteronomy are reinterpreted from a later theological perspective; such passages therefore represent a later textual layer within Deuteronomy that dates to the exilic period. 16b–19a: This catalogue follows the order of creation in Gen. ch 1 in reverse order, consistent with an ancient scribal practice when quoting an earlier text. 18: Waters below the earth, seas, rivers, and lakes. Ancient cosmology conceived the earth to be a disk floating on such waters (cf. Gen. 1.9). 19: Sun . . . heavenly host: This polemic against astral cults may reflect images derived from the Neo-Assyrian pantheon that were brought into the Jerusalem Temple by Manasseh but removed by Josiah (2 Kings 21.5; 23.4–5; Jer. 8.2). The idea of idols or of celestial phenomena literally being worshipped sharply distorts ancient Near Eastern religion, which regarded such phenomena as visible manifestations or emblems of a deity, not as themselves alive or divine. This polemic, with the idea that God allotted the celestial phenomena to other nations while reserving Israel as “his very own people” (v. 20; cf. 7.6 n.), reinterprets the earlier biblical idea that God, as head of the pantheon, assigned other nations to the supervision of lesser gods but retained Israel as “His allotment” (lit. “His very own possession”; 32.8–9). The author de-animates those gods, reducing them to lifeless celestial objects. 21: See 1.37 n. 26: Heaven . . . witness, similarly, 30.19; 31.28; 32.1; Isa. 1.2; 44.23; Pss. 69.35; 96.11. 27–28: These verses allude to the exile of conquered populations, a policy used effectively by the Assyrians and the Babylonians.

4.32–40: Continuation of the double focus on the uniqueness of God's revelation to Israel and of the covenant He made with the nation. This passage fits best in the historical context of the Babyloever happened, or has its like ever been known? ³³ Has any people heard the voice of a god speaking out of a fire, as you have, and survived? ³⁴ Or has any god ventured to go and take for himself one nation from the midst of another by prodigious acts, by signs and portents, by war, by a mighty and an outstretched arm and awesome power, as the LORD your God did for you in Egypt before your very eyes? ³⁵ *It has been clearly demonstrated to you^a that the LORD alone is God; there is none beside Him. ³⁶ From the heavens He let you hear His voice to discipline you; on earth He let you see His great fire; and from amidst that fire you heard His words. ³⁷ And because He loved your fathers, He chose their heirs after them; He Himself,^b in His great might, led you out of Egypt, ³⁸ to drive from your path nations greater and more populous than you, to take you into their land and assign it to you as a heritage, as is still the case. ³⁹ Know therefore this day and keep in mind that the LORD alone is God in heaven above and on earth below; there is no other. ⁴⁰ Observe His laws and commandments, which I enjoin upon you this day, that it may go well with you and your children after you, and that you may long remain in the land that the LORD your God is assigning to you for all time.

nian exile (see v. 35 n.). 33: This alludes to the normal expectation that no human can look directly upon God and survive (Gen. 16.13; 32.30; Exod. 3.6; 19.21; 33.20). 34: Prodigious acts . . . portents refers to the signs performed by Moses and Aaron in Egypt, including the plagues, to persuade Pharaoh to release Israel (Exod. 7.3; 8.19; 10.1, 2; 11.9, 10). 35: There is none beside Him: This affirmation of full or radical monotheism (contrast v. 7; 5.7) corresponds to the thought of the contemporaneous Second Isaiah (Isa. 43.10–13; 44.6–8; 45.6–7, 22).

4.41–43: An appendix: the cities of refuge to be established in Transjordan (cf. Num. 35.9–15; Josh. 20.8). Since Deuteronomy's law concerned with these cities (ch 19) does not refer to this passage, these verses are most likely an editorial appendix composed after the completion of ch 19. Similar disconnected appendices often appear in the Bible at the conclusion of longer literary units (e.g., Lev. ch 27).

5 Moses summoned all the Israelites and said to them: Hear, O Israel, the laws and rules that I proclaim to you this day! Study them and observe them faithfully!

²The LORD our God made a covenant with us at Horeb.

³It was not with our fathers that the LORD made this covenant, but with us, the living, every one of us who is here today. ⁴Face to face the LORD spoke to you on the mountain out of the fire—⁵I stood between the LORD and you at that time to convey the LORD's words to you, for you were afraid of the fire and did not go up the mountain—saying:

5.1–30: The revelation of the Ten Commandments at Sinai/Horeb.

The Decalogue is distinctive in the context of ancient Near Eastern literature and religion, transforming the literary conventions of both theophany and law. In Ugaritic myth, for example, the manifestation of a god was accompanied by disturbances of nature like thunder, lightning, and earthquake. But the same phenomena here (Exod. 19.16–19; 20.15) simply provide the dramatic background for Israel's distinctive infusion of moral law into the older theophany tradition. Similarly, several ancient Mesopotamian legal collections (most famously, the Laws of Hammurabi, 1755 BCE) were attributed to a human monarch. King Hammurabi sought in his legal corpus to embody the cosmic principles of justice and equity. In the Decalogue, by contrast, law derives from God and represents divine will. As a result, law and ethics provide the foundation for the nation's covenantal relationship to God. This revision of Near Eastern literary convention is underscored by the markedly public nature of the divine revelation at Sinai/Horeb. Previously, neither theophany nor law was public and universally accessible. In this account, however, God reveals Himself to the whole nation, including non-Israelites (Exod. 12.38), cutting across boundaries of gender, race, and class.

The literary form of the Decalogue is also significant. It differs from the casuistic "if [infraction]—then [punishment]" form standard to both biblical law (Exod. chs 21–23) and Near Eastern law. That form, which seeks to mete out equitable punishment, nonetheless presupposes a status quo in which infraction of the law is inevitable. The Decalogue's prohibitions, in contrast, are "apodictic" (universal and absolute). The "thou shalt not" form in effect stipulates, "You must never!" The intent is to transform society by creating a moral community in which murder, theft, etc. cease to exist. Equally meaningful is the literary structure of the Decalogue, with one pentad of laws directed toward God and one toward the neighbor. Obedience to God's will (vv. 6–16) here demands active respect for the integrity of the neighbor (vv. 17–18). The Decalogue thus ties love of God inextricably together with love of neighbor: There is no separation of one's religious duties to God from one's moral commitments as a member of the divinely created community. Further, the direct address to the entire nation is grammatically unusual. It employs a singular rather than the expected plural form of "you" to stress that God directly addresses each former slave as an individual human being.

The chapter emphasizes that there is no access to God or revelation without mediation and interpretation (vv. 5, 25–29). The editing drives that point home. It preserves two mutually independent viewpoints about whether God spoke directly to the people, with them standing on the mountain (v. 4), or only through the mediation of Moses, while the people remained at the foot of the mountain (v. 5 n.). Similarly, there seems to be a disagreement about the terror involved in hearing the divine voice directly (vv. 21–22). That the editing of the chapter preserves this play of perspectives requires the attentive reader to join that ancient debate about the nature of revelation.

5.1–5: Making the past present.

3: Not with our fathers . . . but with us contrasts literally with the earlier emphasis that the generation who experienced these events has now died off (2.14–15). The aim is to overcome the limits of historical time and place through participation in the covenant, which makes revelation "present" (see 4.9 n.; 29.13–14 n.). Our fathers may refer either to the exodus generation (2.14–15 n.) or to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (1.11 n.). 5: NJPS sets off the entire sentence (except for the final word) within dashes to suggest that it intends merely to clarify the preceding verse. More likely, the statement neither continues nor supplements v. 4 but presents an alternative perspective inconsistent with v. 4. I stood between the LORD and you, contrast "Face to face" (v. 4). To convey the LORD's words to you, contrast "Face to face the LORD spoke" (v. 4). You . . . did not go up the mountain (lit. "up on the mountain") contradicts v. 4, "the LORD spoke to you on the mountain." Saying provides the original transition from the end of v. 4 directly to the Decalogue.

5.6–18: The Decalogue. The narrative of the Decalogue affirms that God wrote "Ten Words" or statements on two stone tablets and gave them to Moses following the revelation at Horeb (4.13; 10.4). The actual enumeration, however, of the text of the Decalogue into ten commandments is complicated because there are more than ten verbs expressing commands. Because of the ambiguity, three different divisions of the text emerged in ancient Judaism as shown in the chart on p. 376.

⁶I the LORD am your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, the house of bondage: ⁷You shall have no other gods beside Me.

⁸You shall not make for yourself a sculptured image, any likeness of what is in the heavens above, or on the

a Tradition varies as to the divisions of the Commandments in vv. 6–18 and the numbering of the verses. Cf. Exod. 20.1, note a.

The text's punctuation for synagogue worship preserves each of the three different systems simultaneously: (1) The cantillation marks that accompany the text for oral chanting (in Yiddish, the "trope") include an "upper" set (above the line), organizing the text according to the conventional rabbinic division; and (2) the "lower" set of cantillation marks (below the line), which reflects the sequence of Hellenistic Judaism. (3) The system of open and closed paragraphs, which divides the final prohibition (v. 18) into two separate laws, is reflected in the later Roman Catholic and Protestant enumeration.

Within the narrative frame, Deuteronomy's authors present the Decalogue as a precise reprise of that found in Exod. 20.2–14. This presentation is complicated by the fact that the text actually diverges in several places from the Exodus version. The most substantial inconsistency lies in the motivation given for the command to observe the Sabbath (see vv. 12–15 n.). Deuteronomy also expands the command to honor the mother and father (v. 16) and presents a slightly different version of the prohibition on coveting (see v. 18 n.). Other factors also challenge any simple reading of the narrative's claim. Whereas what follows the Decalogue in Exodus is the Book of the Covenant (Exod. chs 21–23), here, what follows is a legal collection that, while patterned after the Book of the Covenant, at key points sharply contradicts it (e.g., 12.13–14 n.; 15.12–18 n.). These and other inconsistencies suggest that the reuse of the Decalogue serves to anchor Deuteronomy's religious and legal innovations (chs 12–26) to the tradition of divine revelation at Sinai/Horeb. But by borrowing the authority of tradition for their new legal compilation, Deuteronomy's authors displace the earlier, competing collection of law: the Book of the Covenant (see further 6.1–3 n.).

At the time of Deuteronomy's composition, it is almost certain that the book of Exodus and the book of Deuteronomy existed independently of one another. However, once Second Temple period editors integrated both into a single literary work, subsequent generations of readers had to struggle to make sense of how the one Torah contained two mutually inconsistent Decalogues! The Rabbis developed elaborate interpretive strategies in order to resolve the inevitable difficulties that resulted. Their exegetical model presupposed that the Torah had a single author and that it was free of contradiction. On that basis, for example, the two different formulations of the Sabbath commandment were resolved by arguing that God had spoken both simultaneously (see v. 12 n.). Similarly, the inconsistency in the narrative frame about whether God spoke directly to the people or only through the mediation of Moses (see v. 5 n.), coupled with the abrupt change from first-person to third-person reference to God in the Decalogue (see v. 11 n.), was resolved by suggesting that God Himself spoke only the first two commandments while Moses spoke the rest on behalf of God, because the people complained of their fear of God (5.20–24). In contrast to this model of interpretation that "harmonizes" inconsistencies, modern critical scholarship presupposes that the Torah represents the work of multiple authors and editors who lived at different times and places. Consequently, the editorial "seams" implicitly recognized by the ancient Rabbis are explained in different ways. For example, the inconsistency in the Decalogue's narrative frame about whether revelation was direct or indirect probably points to the intentional splicing together of originally different traditions, each of which is here honored. The two different versions of the Decalogue most likely derive from two different historical contexts and communities.

5.7: This first commandment takes for granted the existence of other gods; its concern is only to ensure Israel's exclusive loyalty to YHWH . This perspective, called "monolatry," is found frequently within Deuteronomy (see 6.4; 32.8–9, 43; 33.2–3, 27). The idea of monolatry is often expressed by representing YHWH as the ruler of the divine council (see 32.8 n.; Pss. 82; 89.6–8; cf. Exod. 15.11). That perspective almost certainly represents an earlier form of Israelite religion. Ancient Near Eastern sources similarly envision a chief god ruling over a council of other gods. During the Babylonian exile, perhaps under the influence of Second Isaiah, a very different understanding developed. Radical "monotheism" affirms God's greatness, not by portraying Him as more powerful than other gods but, instead, by denying the existence of other deities altogether (see 4.15–31 n.; Isa. 43.10–12; 44.6–8; 45.5–6, 14, 18–19, 22). Once that perspective became normative in the period following the exile, the earlier view was no longer intelligible. As a result, in the process of reading, preaching, and translating the biblical text, Second Temple Jewish communities sometimes read the later perspective of monotheism into texts that actually had in mind the earlier idea of God as ruling a divine council (see v. 9 n.; 6.4 n.; 32.8 n.).

earth below, or in the waters below the earth. ⁹You shall not bow down to them or serve them. For I the LORD your God am an impassioned God, visiting the guilt of the parents upon the children, upon the third and upon the fourth generations of those who reject Me, ¹⁰but showing kindness to the thousandth generation of those who love Me and keep My commandments.

That original theology has also become unavailable to most contemporary readers, since many of the translations found in synagogue prayer books employ euphemisms to "explain away" the biblical text's clear references to other gods. ⁹: You shall not bow down to them or serve them: As it stands, the grammar of the text is illogical. The two references to "them" require a plural antecedent. The intended reference cannot be to the immediately previous v. 8, which refers only to "a sculptured image," in the singular. The grammatical difficulty suggests that, at an earlier stage of the text, v. 9 directly continued v. 7, which prohibits the Israelites from expressing their allegiance to "other gods," in the plural. The sequence of thought in the original form of the Decalogue would thus have prohibited allegiance to other gods (v. 7) by bowing down to them in worship (v. 9). Under the impact of later prophetic thought, the standard pre-exilic idea of monolatry became inconceivable and the existence of deities other than YHWH was denied (see previous note). The "other gods" of older texts were reinterpreted as mere lifeless "idols" (see Isa. 40.18-20; 44.9-20). On the basis of such an association, the original direct connection between vv. 6-7 and v. 9 (prohibiting first allegiance to and then worship of other gods) was severed by the later theological perspective represented by v. 8, with its prohibition merely of a "sculptured image." Serve: The same verb is translated "worship" at 13.3. The variation reflects the word's two different basic meanings. The first is "to perform a service or labor" (Exod. 21.2; Num. 3.7-8). The second is "to make sacrificial offerings to a deity," whether to God (Exod. 3.12; 4.23; 13.5) or to other gods (Deut. 7.16; 12.2, 30). Here the latter meaning is clearly intended. A postbiblical sermonic interpretation of this commandment is preserved by the word's grammatically impossible vocalization (see also 13.3; Exod. 20.5; 23.24; the vocalization of the Bible dates from the second half of the first millennium CE). The Masoretic Text implies that the prohibition warns: "You shall not be enslaved by them." This theological vocalization unites the word's two meanings: False worship leads to slavery (4.28); only in the worship of YHWH is there freedom (5.6; Lev. 25.55; 26.13). The daily recitation of the Decalogue in the developing liturgy of the Second Temple period provides the context for such ongoing interpretive activity, here witnessed by the formal vocalization of the text. The same understanding appears in a phylactery from Qumran (1Q13). Visiting the guilt of the parents upon the children: Punishment for sins against God extends across three generations. This principle of di-

¹¹You shall not swear falsely by the name of the LORD your God; for the LORD will not clear one who swears falsely by His name.

¹²Observe the sabbath day and keep it holy, as the LORD your God has commanded you. ¹³Six days you shall labor and do all your work, ¹⁴but the seventh day is a sabbath of the LORD your God; you shall not do any work—you, your son or your daughter, your male or female slave, your ox or your ass, or any of your cattle, or the stranger in your settlements, so that your male and female slave may rest as you do. ¹⁵Remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt and the LORD your God freed you from there with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; therefore the LORD your God has commanded you to observe the sabbath day.

¹⁶Honor your father and your mother, as the LORD your God has commanded you, that you may long endure, and that you may fare well, in the land that the LORD your God is assigning to you.

You shall not steal.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

vine vicarious punishment contrasts sharply with the Israelite norm for civil and criminal law, which restricts punishment to the agent alone (24.16). Later layers of tradition challenged this theological principle of divine justice (see 7.10 n.; Jer. 31.29–30; Ezek. ch 18). 10: Kindness or “grace,” loyalty of action as an expectation of the covenant (2 Sam. 7.15: “favor”; Hos. 6.6: “goodness”). Who love Me employs the technical language of Near Eastern treaties, whereby “love” refers to the loyalty the vassal owes to the sovereign. See also 6.14 n. 11: The intent is to prohibit careless use of the divine name in the context of swearing an oath (“May God do X to me unless I do Y”); such oaths were viewed as dangerous and legally binding (see Judg. 11.29–40). The LORD your God: The grammatical perspective here shifts from direct reference to God by God Himself (i.e., “those who love Me and keep My commandments”; v. 10) to a reference to God in relation to Israel by a third party (“your God”). Using different paradigms, both ancient rabbinic interpreters and modern scholars have sought to explain this shift. In the context of rabbinic interpretation, the inconsistency was resolved by claiming that it was only the first two commandments that God revealed directly to the people (in the first person). In response to the people's fear (v. 5), Moses then mediated the remaining commandments to the people, now logically referring to God in the third person (b. Mak. 24a; b. Hor. 8a). More likely, the explanation for the shift lies in the nature of the text as divine decree: Many Near Eastern royal inscriptions reflect the same inconsistency in the monarch's reference to himself. The shift may also point to different layers of composition. 12: Observe, contrast Exod. 20.8, “Remember.” Faced with two different versions of the Decalogue, rabbinic interpretation held that God uttered both versions simultaneously: “‘Observe’ and ‘Remember’ in a single utterance” (b. Shevu. 20b). This interpretation recurs in the hymn for Sabbath eve, “Lekha Dodi.” As the LORD . . . commanded you: A reference to the Decalogue of Exodus. The ostensibly precise repetition nonetheless here diverges from the original (Exod. 20.8). The Decalogue embeds the perspective of Moses as speaker, whose reference to God's prior proclamation now itself becomes part of the revelation. 14: The law equally benefits slaves and non-Israelites (1.16 n.; 15.15; 16.11; 24.17). 15: Contrast the rationale provided for the Sabbath at Exod. 20.11. Deuteronomy here, as elsewhere, emphasizes the exodus as a central motivation for religious and social practices, though how and why the Sabbath might be connected to the exodus are open to interpretation. 16: See v. 12 n. And that you may fare well is absent from the Exodus version (Exod. 20.12). This motivational phrase is typical of Deuteronomy's exhortations to obedience (4.40; 5.26; 6.3, 18; 12.25, 28; 22.7). 17: The prohibition against adultery in the Decalogue is absolute. The Decalogue has transformed the ancient Near Eastern breach of the contractual rights of the woman's husband (see Laws of Hammurabi §129) into an offense against both God and the larger community. Biblical law here removes the wife from the disposal of the husband and grants her the status of legal person (see 22.22 n.). 18: Wife . . . house, contrast the order “house . . . wife” in the Exodus Decalogue (Exod. 20.14). There the sequence suggests that “house” is the inclusive term, with the following list (wife, slave, ox, or ass) serving to itemize its contents. Consistent with their view elsewhere, the authors of Deuteronomy here completely separate family law from property law. They invert the earlier sequence, placing the wife first. By removing her altogether from the list of other chattels, they establish that the law does not regard the woman as merely one commodity among others comprising a “house” (see also 22.22–23.1 n.). This is consistent with Deuteronomy’s general view of women.

¹⁹The LORD spoke those words—those and no more—to your whole congregation at the mountain, with a mighty voice out of the fire and the dense clouds. He inscribed them on two tablets of stone, which He gave to me. ²⁰When you heard the voice out of the darkness, while the mountain was ablaze with fire, you came up to me, all your tribal heads and elders, ²¹and said, “The LORD our God has just shown us His majestic Presence, and we have heard His voice out of the fire; we have seen this day that man may live though God has spoken to him. ²²Let us not die, then, for this fearsome fire will consume us; if we hear the voice of the LORD our God any longer, we shall die. ²³For what mortal ever heard the voice of the living God speak out of the fire, as we did, and lived? ²⁴You go closer and hear all that the LORD our God says, and then you tell us everything that the LORD our God tells you, and we will willingly do it.”

²⁵The LORD heard the plea that you made to me, and the LORD said to me, “I have heard the plea that this people made to you; they did well to speak thus. ²⁶May they always be of such mind, to revere Me and follow all My commandments, that it may go well with them and with their children forever! ²⁷Go, say to them, ‘Return to your tents.’ ²⁸But you remain here with Me, and I will give you the whole Instruction—the laws and the rules—that you shall impart to them, for them to observe in the land that I am giving them to possess.”

²⁹Be careful, then, to do as the LORD your God has commanded you. Do not turn aside to the right or to the left: ³⁰follow only the path that the LORD your God has enjoined upon you, so that you may thrive and that it may go well with you, and that you may long endure in the land you are to possess.

5.19–30: Moses as mediator.

While the Decalogue was given directly to the people (v. 4; 4.10–13), the rest of the laws were mediated to the people by Moses, at their plea (v. 22–24; 4.14). 19–23: See 4.33; cf. Exod. 20.15–18. 19: The LORD spoke . . . at the mountain . . . out of the fire, lit. “The LORD spoke . . . on the mountain out of the fire.” The more precise translation of the Hebrew shows its exact correspondence to v. 4: “Face to face the LORD spoke to you on the mountain out of the fire . . .” The Decalogue is thus set in a precise literary frame, with both verses affirming the direct nature of the divine revelation. In this view, God spoke the Decalogue directly to Israel without the mediation of Moses. Those and no more, lit. “He did not add [anything more].” There is no source for this comment in Exod. ch 20. The authors of Deuteronomy here seem to be arguing that the Covenant Collection, which immediately follows the Decalogue in Exodus, was not included in the revelation at Sinai/Horeb. The phrase thus makes way for the presentation of the laws of Deuteronomy alone as the further words of God to Moses at Sinai/Horeb. 20–24: This section expands Exod. 20.15–18, while also revising that narrative in several key aspects. The editor here recognizes the existence of the two mutually inconsistent traditions about the Decalogue: that it was spoken directly by God to the people (vv. 4, 19); that it was mediated by Moses (v. 5). In this section, he establishes a compromise between the two views: While the Decalogue was proclaimed by God directly, thereafter all law was mediated by Moses. The editor’s careful reuse and expansion of Exod. 20.15–18 facilitates this attempt to reconcile the conflicting perspectives. 22: Let us not die: The people’s anxiety explains their request that Moses serve as mediator. The emphasis upon the mortal threat of the divine voice conflicts, however, with the affirmation of safety in v. 21. Therefore this verse is less a continuation of the previous one than an alternative to it, consistent with the idea of divine revelation in v. 5. If we hear . . . any longer: This formulation presupposes that God has already spoken to them directly. The Exodus source, however, does not presuppose God’s prior speech. Its formulation is unconditional and absolute: “Let God not speak to us, lest we die” (Exod. 20.16). Deuteronomy’s editor has added “any longer” in order to adapt the verse to the new context. It now supports the editorial compromise: God spoke (only) the Decalogue directly; Moses mediated (only) the following legal material. 25–30: The idea that Moses mediates between God and the people will be used in two ways: (1) to justify the laws that Moses subse-

6 And this is the Instruction—the laws and the rules—that the LORD your God has commanded [me] to impart to you, to be observed in the land that you are about to cross into and occupy,² so that you, your children, and your children’s children may revere the LORD your God and follow, as long as you live, all His laws and commandments that I enjoin upon you, to the end that you may long endure.³ Obey, O Israel, willingly and faithfully, that it may go well with you and that you may increase greatly [in] ^aa land flowing with milk and honey;^a as the LORD, the God of your fathers, spoke to you.

quently propounds as revelation (chs 12–26); (2) to justify the institution of “Mosaic” prophecy (18.15–22). 28: Instruction, lit. “commandment.” Note the deliberate allusion to this verse in 6.1 (see 6.1–3 n.).

6.1–11.32: The requirement of loyalty to God. A sermon preface to the laws of chs 12–26. 6.1–3: Introduction, validating Mosaic instruction as revealed upon Horeb. NJPS correctly follows the standard chapter division and recognizes that this paragraph begins a new literary unit. Whereas Moses speaks about the past in ch 5, as he recalls the revelation at Horeb, he now shifts into the present, to explain the significance of that revelation for the new generation whom he addresses in Moab. The Masoretic division of the text follows a different scheme, regarding 5.19–6.3 as a single paragraph. That organization attempts to show that there is no “break” whatsoever between Horeb and Moab. It maintains that “the laws and rules” that God originally proclaimed to Moses subsequent to the revelation on Sinai/Horeb (5.28) are identical to “the laws and the rules” (6.1; 12.1) of the following sermon (chs 6–11) and legal code (chs 12–26). That claim, however, runs counter to the tradition found in Exodus, whereby the Book of the Covenant (Exod. chs 21–23)—not Deuteronomy’s laws—records the “rules” that God spoke to Moses on the mountain (Exod. 21.1; 24.3). The attribution of the following sermon and law corpus to Sinaitic revelation by Deuteronomy’s authors thus reuses the earlier tradition in order to lend authority to Deuteronomy’s new vision of law and religion. The entire Mosaic reprise of ostensibly earlier law is therefore more sophisticated than at first evident, since repetition here entails competition, as Deuteronomy seeks to displace the Book of the Covenant. Accordingly, while the present chapter division is formally correct, the Masoretic division preserves an important insight into the original aims of the text’s authors. The sophistication of their literary strategy should not be underestimated. The Temple Scroll from Qumran, and the laws in the pseudepigraphic book of Jubilees similarly present sectarian law as deriving from Sinaitic revelation. The development during the early rabbinic movement (ca. 70–300 CE) of the doctrine of Oral Torah as a tradition that originates in revelation at Mount Sinai also corresponds to this model.

1: And, marking the transition from past retrospective about Horeb (chs 4–5) to the speaker’s addressing the Israelites in the present, in Moab, about the requirements of the covenant. The Instruction . . . occupy: The Hebrew is nearly identical to 5.28. The precise repetition of terminology is important. It legitimates the entire second discourse—both the Instruction (chs 6–11) and the laws and the rules (the legal corpus of chs 12–26; see 12.1)—as originating in direct divine revelation from God on Horeb (5.28). 2: Revere, see 4.10 n.

6.4–25: A sermon on the first commandment of the Decalogue, incorporating direct allusions to it: vv. 4 and 14 refer to 5.7; vv. 12, 21, 23 refer to 5.6; v. 15 (“impassioned God”) refers to 5.9; vv. 5 and 17 refer to 5.10. 4–9: The Shema.

These verses form the first paragraph of the important Jewish prayer called the Shema, after its first word, Heb for “Hear!” During the late Second Temple period, this prayer rose to special prominence both in the synagogue liturgy and in individual piety, a position that it still maintains. Strikingly, Deuteronomy itself gives no indication that this passage is theologically central or liturgically important. Nor do any of the biblical passages that incorporate liturgical prayer refer to it (see Ezra 3.10–11; Neh. ch 9; 1 Chron. 16.7–36; 2 Chron. 5.11–14; 7.3); its formal recitation is not attested until late in the Second Temple period. The centrality of this text is likely the result of early rabbinic interpretation of the requirement to “recite [these words] . . . when you lie down and when you get up” (vv. 6–7). This interpretation led to recitation of the Shema twice daily, in the morning and evening. A similar injunction to “recite . . . these My words” is found at 11.18–19. Because of the double reference to “these words,” the prayer was formally defined as including both paragraphs (6.4–9; 11.13–21). A third paragraph was also added (Num. 15.37–41): the requirement to wear a garment whose fringes (tzitzit) provide a further context for reflection upon Torah and fulfilling its precepts.

and with all your soul and with all your might. ⁶Take to heart these instructions with which I charge you this day. ⁷Impress them upon your children. Recite them when you stay at home and when you are away, when you lie down and when you get up. ⁸Bind them as a sign on your hand

Modern readers regard the Shema as an assertion of monotheism, a view that is anachronistic. In the context of ancient Israelite religion, it served as a public proclamation of exclusive loyalty to YHVH as the sole LORD of Israel. Subsequently, as the Shema became incorporated into the synagogue liturgy, its recitation was also given legal significance. The prayer was regarded as a legally binding oath to carry out the requirements of the Torah. Through the liturgical recitation of the Shema the worshipper thus recites, twice daily, the original covenant ratification ceremony that, in the narrative of Deuteronomy, took place on the plains of Moab.

4–5: The Shema, with its call for complete personal devotion to God, became normative for the various Judaismisms of the Second Temple period; in fact, these verses were cited by Jesus as the “first” of all commandments (Mark 12.29–30). 4: The LORD . . . alone: NJPS correctly departs from the more familiar translation, “The LORD [YHVH] our God, the LORD is one” (see translators’ note b, end). Each of the two interpretations is theoretically possible because, in Hebrew, it is possible to form a sentence by simply joining a subject and a predicate, without specifying the verb “to be.” The Hebrew here thus allows either “YHVH, our God, YHVH is one” or “YHVH is our God, YHVH alone.” The first, older translation, which makes a statement about the unity and the indivisibility of God, does not do full justice to this text (though it makes sense in a later Jewish context as a polemic against Christianity). The verse makes not a quantitative argument (about the number of deities) but a qualitative one, about the nature of the relationship between God and

Israel. Almost certainly, the original force of the verse, as the medieval Jewish exegetes in translators’ note b recognized, was to demand that Israel show exclusive loyalty to our God, YHVH—but not thereby to deny the existence of other gods! In this way, it assumes the same perspective as the first commandment of the Decalogue, which, by prohibiting the worship of other gods, presupposes their existence (see 5.7 n.). Once true monotheism became the norm in the Second Temple period, this earlier perspective became unintelligible. Second Temple readers and translators of the Shema were thus forced to read this and similar passages in a way that made them consistent with the normative monotheism (see 32.8 n.; cf. 4.15–31 n.; 5.9 n.). That process of reinterpretation is already evident in the Septuagint’s translation (3rd century BCE): “the LORD is one.” As the basis for most subsequent translations, that reading is the source for the common understanding of the verse. Alone: The traditional translation (see translators’ note b) preserves the normal use of Hebrew “’ehad,” “one,” which may have contributed to interpreting the Shema as a declaration of monotheism. But what it might mean to say that God is “one” is unclear, since that is not the same as affirming that there is only one God (Isa. 44.6; 45.5–7, 14, 18, 21; 46.9). Nor is it likely that the verse intends to clarify that there is only one YHVH, as opposed to many YHVHs, since there was no difficulty in recognizing that different manifestations of a divinity could derive from a single god (Exod. 6.3). NJPS thus properly understands “’ehad” to mean “alone,” i.e., “exclusively.” This interpretation receives support in the prophet Zechariah’s interpretation of this verse: “In that day there shall be one LORD with one name” (Zech. 14.9 and translators’ note d). 5: Love, see 5.10 n. The paradox of commanding a feeling (as in Lev. 19.17–18) is resolved with the recognition that covenantal “love” does not refer to internal sentiment or to private emotion. The focus is, instead, upon loyalty of action toward both deity and neighbor (see 5.1–30 n.). With all your soul: This phrase, in rabbinic interpretation, meant that one should be willing to give one’s life for God. This interpretation led to the practice of reciting the Shema on one’s deathbed or in the midst of acts of martyrdom. Might: Heb “me’od” is elsewhere an adverb meaning “very” or “exceedingly.” It is used as a noun only here and in the Deuteronomistic description of King Josiah, which cites this verse in order to portray Josiah as the paragon of obedience to Torah (2 Kings 23.25). While the word’s basic meaning is “might” or “strength,” it was understood as “wealth” or “property” both at Qumran (CD 9.11; 12.10) and in early rabbinic literature (Tg. Jon.; Sifre). The two interpretations each call for full commitment to God, whether psychological or practical; both are preserved in the Mishnah (m. Ber. 9.5). 6: These instructions, lit. “these words,” as at 11.19. 7: Impress them, in the sense of “teach them incisively”; similarly, “teach them” (11.19). Recite them: This translation reflects the formal liturgical recitation of the prayer, a ritual that is postbiblical. The original idea of the Hebrew is rather to “speak about them” (see also Ps. 119.13, 46); to be mindful of and discuss the laws of the Torah. When you lie down and when you get up, originally, a merism signifying that one should always reflect upon these Deuteronomistic teachings. Rabbinic interpretation, however, understands the phrase to refer literally to two distinct times: “in the evening” and “in the morning.” On that basis, the Shema is formally recited twice daily. So important is this obligation that the Mishnah (the formal compilation of rabbinic law) begins with a debate about how to fulfill it properly: “From what time in the evening should one recite the Shema?” (m. Ber. 1.1).

6.8: Bind them: This law, literally interpreted, provides the basis for the Jewish convention of binding tefillin (phylacteries) upon the arm and forehead. Tefillin have been found at Qumran, and it is clear that their use dates from at least the second century BCE. The Samaritan and some manuscripts of the Septuagint, however, understood the law metaphorically. There was thus clearly a debate within Second Temple Judaism about the correct interpretation of this prescription: whether literally to bind an object or symbolically to take instruction to heart (Exod. 13.9, 16; Prov. 3.3; 6.21; 7.3). Both perspectives have merit, but since the instructions to write upon the doorposts are intended literally (see v. 9 n.), it is possible, even likely, that the authors of Deuteronomy expected their audience to wear portions of the text upon the body. There is archeological evidence for such a practice. Inscribed silver amulets (with the text on, not in, them) that date to the 7th and 6th centuries BCE have been found at Jerusalem. Similar amulets are depicted in Egyptian and Mesopotamian art and literature. Such amulets, however, were likely worn as magic charms in order to ward off evil. In Deuteronomy, the objects have a different function: The text is worn to express the wearer’s dedication and obedience to Torah. In refocusing the purpose of wearing texts upon the body, Deuteronomy thus takes over an established practice but completely transforms its meaning. The same subordination of older custom to Deuteronomic Torah occurs elsewhere; see 6.9 n.; 12.13–19 n.; 17.14–20 n.; 18.15–22 n. Ironically, the Greek translation “phylakterion” (the source of “phylactery”) actually means “amulet,” suggesting the connection with magic that was rejected by the authors of Deuteronomy. Sign: Based on the archeological evidence, it seems that the texts would originally have been inscribed on metal and displayed in full view. Only later, in the Second Temple period, did the practice develop of enclosing the text in small leather cases. According to rabbinic custom, the texts placed in the tefillin always included the four biblical passages that refer to the practice (Exod. 13.3–10, 11–16; Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21), though the tefillin found at Qumran sometimes contain different passages, including the Decalogue and other passages.

9: Doorposts: The doorways of houses and temples were regarded in Israel and the ancient Near East as important transitional spaces in which religious-legal ceremonies were performed and where divine images might be stored (see Exod. 12.7, 21–23; 21.6; Isa. 57.8). The practice of inscribing these liminal spaces with cultic or religious invocations is also well known throughout the ancient Near East. Deuteronomy adopts that custom but subordinates the doorway, as a religiously significant space, to the authority of Deuteronomic law. Originally, the words were to be directly displayed on the doorposts, as can be seen from the stone plaques inscribed with the words of the Decalogue found outside ancient Samaritan dwellings. By the late Second Temple period, as evidenced at Qumran, the texts were written on parchment, placed in small boxes (mezuzot), and affixed to the doorpost. The texts placed in the mezuzot varied: All contained this passage (vv. 4–9) and Deut. 11.13–21. Samaritan mezuzot also contained the Decalogue. At Qumran, the Decalogue and Deut. 10.12–11.12 were sometimes added.

6.10–11: The list land . . . houses . . . cisterns . . . olive groves (cf. Josh. 24.13; Neh. 9.24–25) defines the elements of an established civilization, which Israel is about to both inherit and become. 12: The threat of forgetting and the risk of apostasy are repeatedly stressed (4.9–14 n.; 8.11–20; 32.18; cf. 5.26; Hos 2.5–13). 14: Do not follow, lit. “do not go after,” employs the technical language of Neo-Assyrian state treaties, which were concerned to ensure that the vassal show obedience and commitment to the suzerain alone. Deuteronomy redeploys that language, originally used in the context of in-

¹⁶Do not try the LORD your God, as you did at Massah.^a ¹⁷Be sure to keep the commandments, decrees, and laws that the LORD your God has enjoined upon you. ¹⁸Do what is right and good in the sight of the LORD, that it may go well with you and that you may be able to possess the good land that the LORD your God promised on oath to your fathers, ¹⁹and that all your enemies may be driven out before you, as the LORD has spoken.

7.1–10.11: Risks to covenantal faith upon entering the land. The first issue is that Israel enters an already inhabited land, whose greater population and worship apparatus it must confront (ch 7).

Thereafter, successful habitation carries its own risks: complacency and loss of historical memory (ch 8).

7.1–26: The war of conquest. Two topics are treated: (1) the command to destroy the original occupants of Canaan (vv. 1–3, 6, 17–24); and (2) the command not to worship their gods (vv. 4–5, 7–15, 25–26). The editors join the two themes at v. 16. 1: A number of factors combine to imply that this list is primarily an after-the-fact literary compilation rather than an historical portrayal. The identity, sequence, and number of the peoples included in the “table of nations” vary considerably (Gen. 15.19–21; Exod. 3.8, 17; 13.5; 23.23; 33.2; 34.11; Deut. 20.17; Josh. 3.10; 9.1; 11.3; 12.8; 24.11; Judg. 3.5; 1 Kings 9.20; Ezra 9.1; Neh. 9.8; 2 Chron. 8.7). Hittites (e.g., Gen. 23.10; 25.9; 49.29–30; 50.13; Num. 13.29) are presented as one of the original inhabitants of Canaan, in contrast to the historically important Hittite empire which flourished in Anatolia, in central Turkey, ca. 1700–1200 BCE. The Jebusites, the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Jerusalem, retained control of the city until it was conquered by David several centuries after the period in which the conquest is set (2 Sam. 5.6–7). The latter narrative implies that this law was never implemented. The ideal number seven, which signifies completion or totality (Gen. ch 1; the plague list of Pss. 78.44–51 and 105.28–36 in contrast to Exod. chs 7–12), suggests that the enumeration may be artificial. The number of peoples included in the “table” elsewhere in the Bible varies considerably: twelve, seven, six, or fewer. 2: This requirement for destruction is anomalous in several ways. Earlier sources contemplate only the expulsion of these groups (Exod. 23.27–33; cf. 34.11). The definition and requirements of the “ban” vary considerably throughout the Bible: total destruction of people and property (here; 13.15–17; 20.16–17; 1 Sam. 15.3); sparing of property (2.34–35; 3.6–7); sparing of women, children, and property (20.10–14). Finally, other narratives, which seem far more realistic, speak of the failure to carry out the conquest except in very limited areas and the use of conquered populations for labor (Josh. chs 15–17; Judg. ch 1; 3.1–6). These factors suggest that the law of the ban is an anachronistic literary formulation. It first arose centuries after the settlement; it was never implemented because there was no population extant against whom it could be implemented. Its polemic is directed at internal issues in 6th century Judah. Often the authors of Deuteronomy use the term “Canaanite” rhetorically to stigmatize them no quarter. ³You shall not intermarry with them: do not give your daughters to their sons or take their daughters for your sons. ⁴For they will turn your children away from Me to worship other gods, and the LORD's anger will blaze forth against you and He will promptly wipe you out. ⁵Instead, this is what you shall do to them: you shall tear down their altars, smash their pillars, cut down their sacred posts, and consign their images to the fire.

⁶For you are a people consecrated to the LORD your God: of all the peoples on earth the LORD your God chose you to be His treasured people. ⁷It is not because you are the most numerous of peoples that the LORD set His heart on you and chose you—indeed, you are the smallest of peoples; ⁸but it was because the LORD favored you and kept the oath He made to your fathers that the LORD freed you with a mighty hand and rescued you from the house of bondage, from the power of Pharaoh king of Egypt.

⁹Know, therefore, that only the LORD your God is God, the steadfast God who keeps His covenant faithfully to the thousandth generation of those who love Him and keep His commandments, ¹⁰but who instantly requites with destruction those who reject Him—never slow with those who reject Him, but requiting them instantly. ¹¹Therefore, observe faithfully the Instruction—the laws and the rules—with which I charge you today.

¹²And if you do obey these rules and observe them carefully, the LORD your God will maintain faithfully for you the covenant that He made on oath with your fathers: ¹³He will favor you and bless you and multiply you; He older forms of Israelite religion that they no longer accept (see v. 5 n.; 16.22 n.; 18.9–14 n.). Doom them to destruction, or “place under the ban,” or “devote.” That which is “devoted” is set aside for divine use and denied to humans. The war of conquest, as a holy war, should not be one where the individual profits through plunder (see 12.29–31 n.; 13.14 n.; 20.1–20 n.; Josh. ch 7). The law addresses apostasy as opposed to ethnicity; it is directed against apostate Israelites in 8.20; 13.15–17. 3: This prohibition against intermarriage does not fit easily after v. 2, suggesting several layers of editing. It is also inconsistent with 21.10–14, which seems more likely to reflect the original policy. 5: See Exod. 34.13. Pillars: stone monuments that marked places where God appeared and were thus originally legitimate in worship (Gen. 35.14; Exod. 24.4; Hos. 3.4). Only subsequently were they prohibited as alien (Exod. 23.24; 34.13; Lev. 26.1; Deut. 12.3; 16.22; 2 Kings 18.4). Sacred posts, Heb “‘Asherim.” The singular, “‘Asherah,” preserves the name of an important Canaanite goddess known from Ugarit (1 Kings 18.19); here the word designates merely the tree, wooden pole, or image that represented her (16.21; Judg. 6.25, 26, 28).

7.6–16: The meaning of Israel's covenantal relationship to God.

6: For suggests that the verse originally continued v. 3, since it provides the rationale for total separation from the Canaanites, not for the destruction of their cult sites. This verse, repeated at 14.2, summarizes Deuteronomy's view of Israel's relation to God. Consecrated, lit., “set aside as separate,” as is clear here. Chose, the precondition of Israel's elected status. His treasured people (14.2 n.; 26.18; Exod. 19.5; Mal. 3.17; Ps. 135.4), designating Israel as the exclusive property of God; similarly, 4.20, using a different Hebrew word.

The term originates in Near Eastern treaty language for the special relationship of vassal to overlord.

9–11: A sermon on the second commandment that radically revises its meaning. The reuse of key phrases and inversion of the order of punishment and blessing in 5.9–10 mark the citation. 9: Keeps His covenant faithfully: NJPS translates the same phrase as “showing kindness” at 5.10 (see note).

10: Instantly requites . . . requiting them instantly: Note the ABB'A' frame, at whose center in the key idea that God is never slow. The idea here is that the sinner is punished directly, as already recognized by Rashi (cf. NRSV “in their own person”). At issue is the rejection of the norm of vicarious or transgenerational punishment as previously propounded in the Decalogue (5.9 = Exod. 20.5; cf. Exod. 34.7; Num. 14.18). Instead, the sermon argues for individual retribution, as in criminal law (24.16), while deleting any reference to the transmission of punishment across generations. There is a similar rejection of transgenerational punishment in Jer. 31.27–30; Ezek. 18.1–4; it is nevertheless quite remarkable that Deuteronomy here directly polemicizes against the Decalogue. 12–14: The blessings of fertility do not come from the nature gods of Canaan but from Israel's God (see Hos. ch 2). Natural fertility is here made contingent upon obedience to the covenant. 13: Calving . . . lambing will bless the issue of your womb and the produce of your soil, your new grain and wine and oil, the calving of your herd and the lambing of your flock, in the land that He swore to your fathers to assign to you. ¹⁴You shall be blessed above all other peoples: there shall be no sterile male or female among you or among your livestock. ¹⁵The LORD will ward off from you all sickness; He will not bring upon you any of the dreadful diseases of Egypt, about which you know, but will inflict them upon all your enemies.

¹⁶You shall destroy all the peoples that the LORD your God delivers to you, showing them no pity. And you shall not worship their gods, for that would be a snare to you. ¹⁷Should you say to yourselves, "These nations are more numerous than we; how can we dispossess them?" ¹⁸You need have no fear of them. You have but to bear in mind what the LORD your God did to Pharaoh and all the Egyptians: ¹⁹the wondrous acts that you saw with your own eyes, the signs and the portents, the mighty hand, and the outstretched arm by which the LORD your God liberated you. Thus will the LORD your God do to all the peoples you now fear. ²⁰The LORD your God will also send a plague^a against them, until those who are left in hiding perish before you. ²¹Do not stand in dread of them, for the LORD your God is in your midst, a great and awesome God.

²²The LORD your God will dislodge those peoples before you little by little; you will not be able to put an end to them at once, else the wild beasts would multiply to your hurt. ²³The LORD your God will deliver them up to you, throwing them into utter panic until they are wiped out. ²⁴He will deliver their kings into your hand, and you shall obliterate their name from under the heavens; no man shall stand up to you, until you have wiped them out.

²⁵You shall consign the images of their gods to the fire; you shall not covet the silver and gold on them and keep it for yourselves, lest you be ensnared thereby; for that is abhorrent to the LORD your God. ²⁶You must not bring an abhorrent thing into your house, or you will be proscribed like it; you must reject it as abominable and abhorrent, for it is proscribed.

8 You shall faithfully observe all the Instruction that I enjoin upon you today, that you may thrive and increase and be able to possess the land that the LORD promised on oath to your fathers.

²Remember the long way that the LORD your God has

(28.4, 18, 51), originally two Ugaritic fertility deities; the second, "Astarte," is named at 1 Kings 11.5. 15: Cf. Exod. 15.26.

7.17–26: Israel need not fear nations more powerful than it since, according to the idea of the holy war, God "is in your midst" in battle (v. 21; 6.15; cf. 20.1–4). These verses echo ideas found in Exod. 23.20–33. 20: Plague, see Exod. 23.27–28 n.; Josh. 24.12. 22: Abbreviating Exod. 23.29–30; contrast Deut. 9.3.

8.1–20: The temptation to pride and self-sufficiency in the land. Moses warns the people that success in Canaan will tempt them to forget the wilderness lesson of complete dependence upon God. 1–10: An appeal to Israel's memory: In the wilderness God sustained the people daily (Exod. 12.37–17.16; Num. chs 11–14).

made you travel in the wilderness these past forty years, that He might test you by hardships to learn what was in your hearts: whether you would keep His commandments or not.³ He subjected you to the hardship of hunger and then gave you manna to eat, which neither you nor your fathers had ever known, in order to teach you that man does not live on bread alone, but that man may live on anything that the LORD decrees.⁴ The clothes upon you did not wear out, nor did your feet swell these forty years.⁵ Bear in mind that the LORD your God disciplines you just as a man disciplines his son.⁶ Therefore keep the commandments of the LORD your God: walk in His ways and revere Him.

⁷For the LORD your God is bringing you into a good land, a land with streams and springs and fountains issuing from plain and hill;⁸ a land of wheat and barley, of vines, figs, and pomegranates, a land of olive trees and honey;⁹ a land where you may eat food without stint, where you will lack nothing; a land whose rocks are iron and from whose hills you can mine copper.¹⁰ When you have eaten your fill, give thanks to the LORD your God for the good land which He has given you.

¹¹Take care lest you forget the LORD your God and fail to keep His commandments, His rules, and His laws, which I enjoin upon you today.¹² When you have eaten your fill, and have built fine houses to live in,¹³ and your herds and flocks have multiplied, and your silver and gold have increased, and everything you own has prospered,¹⁴ beware lest^a your heart grow haughty and you forget the LORD your God—who freed you from the land of Egypt, the house of bondage;¹⁵ who led you through the great and terrible wilderness with its seraph^b serpents and scorpions, a parched land with no water in it, who brought forth water for you from the flinty rock;¹⁶ who fed you in the wilderness with manna, which your fathers had never known, in order to test you by hardships only to benefit you in the end—¹⁷and you say to yourselves, “My own power and the might of my own hand have won this wealth for me.”¹⁸ Remember that it is the LORD your God who gives you the power to get wealth, in fulfillment of the covenant that He made on oath with your fathers, as is still the case.

¹⁹If you do forget the LORD your God and follow other gods to serve them or bow down to them, I warn you this day that you shall certainly perish;²⁰ like the nations that the LORD will cause to perish before you, so shall you perish—because you did not heed the LORD your God.

3: Manna, see Exod. ch 16; Num. 11.7–8. 5: Suffering is here interpreted as discipline, as in a parent’s correction of a child (Hos. ch 11); like many others in Deuteronomy, this idea reflects the influence of wisdom literature (see Prov. 3.11–12; cf. Deut. 1.13 n.; 4.2 n.; 4.5–8 n.; 4.10 n.; 11.2). 10: When you have eaten your fill, give thanks to the LORD your God serves as the rabbinic justification for reciting the grace after meals (b. Ber. 21a).

8.11–20: The peril of prosperity.

11: A bold equation between the LORD, on the one hand, and the legal corpus (His commandments . . . rules . . . laws . . . today), on the other. Disobedience to Deuteronomy’s laws becomes tantamount to forgetting God and transgressing the first commandment (see v. 19 n.). 15: Water . . . from the flinty rock, Exod. 17.1–7; Num. 20.2–13; Ps. 114.8. 19: Follow, see 6.14 n. Other gods . . . serve . . . bow down to, citing the first and second commandments of the Decalogue (5.7, 9). 20: Like the nations: Here Israel is itself placed under the ban if it commits apostasy (see 7.1–26 n.). Cause to perish . . . perish: The same word is used to underscore the precise “measure-for-measure” nature of the punishment. Israel’s election (7.6 n.) grants no exemption from upholding the law. Rightful habitation in the promised land, like its fertility (7.12–14 n.), depends upon covenantal obedience, not ethnic identity (7.2 n.).

9 Hear, O Israel! You are about to cross the Jordan to go in and dispossess nations greater and more populous than you: great cities with walls sky-high; ²a people great and tall, the Anakites, of whom you have knowledge; for you have heard it said, "Who can stand up to the children of Anak?" ³Know then this day that none other than the LORD your God is crossing at your head, a devouring fire; it is He who will wipe them out. He will subdue them before you, that you may quickly dispossess and destroy them, as the LORD promised you. ⁴And when the LORD your God has thrust them from your path, say not to yourselves, "The LORD has enabled us to possess this land because of our virtues"; it is rather because of the wickedness of those nations that the LORD is dispossessing them before you. ⁵It is not because of your virtues and your rectitude that you will be able to possess their country; but it is because of their wickedness that the LORD your God is dispossessing those nations before you, and in order to fulfill the oath that the LORD made to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

⁶Know, then, that it is not for any virtue of yours, that the LORD your God is giving you this good land to possess; for you are a stiffnecked people. ⁷Remember, never forget, how you provoked the LORD your God to anger in the wilderness: from the day that you left the land of Egypt until you reached this place, you have continued defiant toward the LORD.

⁸At Horeb you so provoked the LORD that the LORD was angry enough with you to have destroyed you. ⁹I had ascended the mountain to receive the tablets of stone, the Tablets of the Covenant that the LORD had made with you, and I stayed on the mountain forty days and forty nights, eating no bread and drinking no water. ¹⁰And the LORD gave me the two tablets of stone inscribed by the finger of God, with the exact words that the LORD had addressed to you on the mountain out of the fire on the day of the Assembly.

¹¹At the end of those forty days and forty nights, the LORD gave me the two tablets of stone, the Tablets of the Covenant. ¹²And the LORD said to me, "Hurry, go down from here at once, for the people whom you brought out of Egypt have acted wickedly; they have been quick to stray from the path that I enjoined upon them; they have made themselves a molten image." ¹³The LORD further said to me, "I see that this is a stiffnecked people. ¹⁴Let Me alone and I will destroy them and blot out their name from under heaven, and I will make you a nation far more numerous than they."

9.1-10.11: The already broken and renewed covenant. God does not give the land to the people as a reward for righteousness, for in the wilderness they acted rebelliously. 9.2: See Num. 13.22, 33. 4-5: Victory will be given in the holy war because (negatively) Canaan has been irrevocably corrupted by the actions of its present occupants and because (positively) of God's enduring commitment to the promises made to Israel's ancestors. 6-24: The historical record shows that Israel has been rebellious since the exodus (Ezek. 20.5-8; contrast Jer. 2.2-3; Hos. 2.14-20). 8-10: Exod. 24.12-18; 31.18. 11-21: Exod. ch 32, revised. 17: Smashing them, not simple anger but a legal ceremony to confirm breach of treaty. 22: Num. 11.1-3; Exod. 17.1-7; and Num. 11.31-34. 23: Num. chs 13-14. 25-29: A paraphrase of Exod. 32.11-14. Deuteronomy portrays Moses as the ideal prophet (34.10-12); he intercedes for the people and vicariously suffers for them (1.37 n.; cf. Isa. ch 53).

¹⁵I started down the mountain, a mountain ablaze with fire, the two Tablets of the Covenant in my two hands. ¹⁶I saw how you had sinned against the LORD your God: you had made yourselves a molten calf; you had been quick to stray from the path that the LORD had enjoined upon you. ¹⁷Thereupon I gripped the two tablets and flung them away with both my hands, smashing them before your eyes. ¹⁸I threw myself down before the LORD—eating no bread and drinking no water forty days and forty nights, as before—because of the great wrong you had committed, doing what displeased the LORD and vexing Him. ¹⁹For I was in dread of the LORD’s fierce anger against you, which moved Him to wipe you out. And that time, too, the LORD gave heed to me.—²⁰Moreover, the LORD was angry enough with Aaron to have destroyed him; so I also interceded for Aaron at that time.—²¹As for that sinful thing you had made, the calf, I took it and put it to the fire; I broke it to bits and ground it thoroughly until it was fine as dust, and I threw its dust into the brook that comes down from the mountain.

²³And when the LORD sent you on from Kadesh-barnea, saying, “Go up and take possession of the land that I am giving you,” you flouted the command of the LORD your God; you did not put your trust in Him and did not obey Him.

²⁴As long as I have known you, you have been defiant toward the LORD.

²⁵When I lay prostrate before the LORD ^athose forty days and forty nights,^a because the LORD was determined to destroy you, ²⁶I prayed to the LORD and said, “O Lord God, do not annihilate Your very own people, whom You redeemed in Your majesty and whom You freed from Egypt with a mighty hand. ²⁷Give thought to Your servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and pay no heed to the stubbornness of this people, its wickedness, and its sinfulness. ²⁸Else the country from which You freed us will say, ‘It was because the LORD was powerless to bring them into the land that He had promised them, and because He rejected them, that He brought them out to have them die in the wilderness.’ ²⁹Yet they are Your very own people, whom You freed with Your great might and Your outstretched arm.”

10 Thereupon the LORD said to me, “Carve out two tablets of stone like the first, and come up to Me on the mountain; and make an ark of wood. ²I will inscribe on the tablets the commandments that were on the first tablets that you smashed, and you shall deposit them in the ark."

10.1–11: The second ascent of the mountain (this narrative is abstracted at Exod. 34.1–4, 27–28). 1–3: These verses rest on a tradition that Moses made the Ark and put the stone tablets in it (1 Kings 8.9).

³I made an ark of acacia wood and carved out two tablets of stone like the first; I took the two tablets with me and went up the mountain. ⁴The LORD inscribed on the tablets the same text as on the first, the Ten Commandments that He addressed to you on the mountain out of the fire on the day of the Assembly; and the LORD gave them to me. ⁵Then I left and went down from the mountain, and I deposited the tablets in the ark that I had made, where they still are, as the LORD had commanded me.

⁶From Beeroth-bene-jaakan^a the Israelites marched to Moserah. Aaron died there and was buried there; and his son Eleazar became priest in his stead. ⁷From there they marched to Gudgod,^b and from Gudgod to Jotbath, a region of running brooks.

¹⁰I had stayed on the mountain, as I did the first time, forty days and forty nights; and the LORD heeded me once again: the LORD agreed not to destroy you. ¹¹And the LORD said to me, "Up, resume the march at the head of the people, that they may go in and possess the land that I swore to their fathers to give them."

¹²And now, O Israel, what does the LORD your God demand of you? Only this: to revere the LORD your God, to walk only in His paths, to love Him, and to serve the LORD your God with all your heart and soul, ¹³keeping the LORD's commandments and laws, which I enjoin upon you today, for your good. ¹⁴Mark, the heavens "to their uttermost reaches" belong to the LORD your God, the earth and all that is on it! ¹⁵Yet it was to your fathers that the LORD was drawn in His love for them, so that He chose you, their lineal descendants, from among all peoples—as is now the case. ¹⁶Cut away, therefore, the thickening about your hearts and stiffen your necks no more. ¹⁷For the LORD your God is "God supreme and Lord

6-9: An editorial insertion; vv. 6-7 seem to quote a wilderness itinerary from the Priestly literature (cf. Num. 33.30-38). 6: Num. 20.22-29. 8: Exod. 32.25-29. The Levites' role is to bear the Ark (Num. 4.4-15), to stand in attendance, i.e., conduct the sacrificial services (Num. ch 18), and to bless the people (Num. 6.22-27). 9: See 12.12 n.; 18.2 n.

10.12-11.32: Obedience as the condition for prosperity in the land. This section provides the climax and conclusion of the historical review found in 8.1-10.11.

10.12-13: A striking transformation of the Decalogue. Earlier, breach of the first and second Decalogue commandments, with their focus specifically on God, had been redefined and equated with failing to "keep His commandments . . . rules . . . and . . . laws" (8.11 n.). Now obedience to God is similarly redefined as compliance with the fixed commandments and laws (v. 13) of Deuteronomy, i.e., the laws of chs 12-26 (see 28.15, 45). 13: Keeping, the precise antithesis of 8.11. The sequence love . . . keeping . . . commandments (vv. 12-13) cites 5.10. 16: Cut away . . . the thickening about your hearts (lit. "circumcise . . . the foreskin of your heart") means to open oneself to God (Lev. 26.41); no distinction is intended between mind, will, and emotion. The metaphorical formulation, which challenges any attempt to reduce Deuteronomy to narrow "legalism," corresponds to prophetic ideals (cf. Jer. 4.4; 31.33). 17-18: Integrity in the administration of court justice (v. 17; cf. 1.17; 16.19) and protection of the marginalized (v. 18) are together given a theological foundation, making the remarkable argument that human social ethics amounts to "imitatio dei." Ensuring justice in court and defending the marginalized were conventional royal prerogatives (Laws of Hammurabi prologue; Ps. 72.4). Deuteronomy contemplates no such role for the monarch (17.14-20 n.). Instead, it is here God who protects the rights of the supreme,^d the great, the mighty, and the awesome God, who shows no favor and takes no bribe,¹⁸ but upholds the cause of the fatherless and the widow, and befriends the stranger, providing him with food and clothing.—¹⁹ You too must befriend the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt.

²⁰ You must revere the LORD your God: only Him shall you worship, to Him shall you hold fast, and by His name shall you swear. ²¹ He is your glory and He is your God, who wrought for you those marvelous, awesome deeds that you saw with your own eyes. ²² Your ancestors went down to Egypt seventy persons in all; and now the LORD your God has made you as numerous as the stars of heaven.

11 Love, therefore, the LORD your God, and always keep His charge, His laws, His rules, and His commandments.

^{2a} Take thought this day that it was not your children, who neither experienced nor witnessed the lesson of the LORD your God—

His majesty, His mighty hand, His outstretched arm;

³ the signs and the deeds that He performed in Egypt against Pharaoh king of Egypt and all his land; ⁴ what He did to Egypt's army, its horses and chariots; how the LORD rolled back upon them the waters of the Sea of Reeds when they were pursuing you, thus destroying them ^bonce and for all;^b ⁵ what He did for you in the wilderness before you arrived in this place; ⁶ and what He did to Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab son of Reuben, when the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them, along with their households, their tents, and every living thing in their train, from amidst all Israel—

⁸ Keep, therefore, all the Instruction that I enjoin upon you today, so that you may have the strength to enter and take possession of the land that you are about to cross into and possess, ⁹ and that you may long endure upon the soil that the LORD swore to your fathers to assign to them and to their heirs, a land flowing with milk and honey.

¹⁰ For the land that you are about to enter and possess is not like the land of Egypt from which you have come. There the grain you sowed had to be watered by your own labors,^c like a vegetable garden; ¹¹ but the land you marginalized, entering history to do so (cf. Exod. 3.7–10; similarly Philippians 2.5–8). Love of neighbor thus originates in divine action as ethics receives a theological foundation. In its use of the consecutive adjectives the great, the mighty, and the awesome to describe God, this section echoes the style of Mesopotamian royal inscriptions, but projects these royal attributes on to God. This phrase becomes significant in later Judaism when it is quoted as part of the first blessing of the daily statutory prayer (“Amidah”).

18–19: Stranger . . . strangers, better, “resident alien” in both cases; see 1.16 n. The Israelite is not urged simply to love an unfamiliar fellow Israelite. Instead, the Israelite is adjured to love and identify with the non-Israelite. Just as justice must be rendered to Israelite and alien alike (see 1.16 n.), so must “love” reach across national or ethnic lines (cf. Lev. 19.33–34). 18: Befriends (lit., “loves”): Note the concrete expression of love in action and service (see 5.10 n.; 6.5 n.). 19: For you were, see Exod. 23.9. 22: Seventy persons (Gen. 46.27; Exod. 1.5), here a stereotypical number expressing completeness, comes first in the Hebrew, emphasizing Israel’s miraculous transformation into a nation. Stars of heaven, see 1.10 n.

11.1–32: Loyalty to the covenant provides the condition for life in Canaan. The punishments and rewards in this section are predominantly addressed to a plural “you,” stressing communal rather than individual responsibility. 2: The frequent phrase this day in Deuteronomy emphasizes the contemporaneity of the covenant (see 5.3 n.). Lesson, see 8.5 n. 4: See Exod. ch. 14. 6: The address is based upon the early tradition of the revolt of Dathan and Abiram (Num. ch. 16). There is no mention of Korah’s rebellion (Num. 16.3–11), which was very likely added to the narrative in Numbers by the Priestly school after this abstract was made. 10–12: The Nile valley must be irrigated are about to cross into and possess, a land of hills and valleys, soaks up its water from the rains of heaven. ¹²It is a land which the LORD your God looks after, on which the LORD your God always keeps His eye, from year's beginning to year's end.

¹³If, then, you obey the commandments that I enjoin upon you this day, loving the LORD your God and serving Him with all your heart and soul, ¹⁴I^a will grant the rain for your land in season, the early rain and the late. You shall gather in your new grain and wine and oil—¹⁵I^a will also provide grass in the fields for your cattle—and thus you shall eat your fill. ¹⁶Take care not to be lured away to serve other gods and bow to them. ¹⁷For the LORD's anger will flare up against you, and He will shut up the skies so that there will be no rain and the ground will not yield its produce; and you will soon perish from the good land that the LORD is assigning to you.

¹⁸Therefore impress these My words upon your ^bvery heart:^b bind them as a sign on your hand and let them serve as a ^csymbol on your forehead,^c ¹⁹and teach them to your children—reciting them when you stay at home and when you are away, when you lie down and when you get up; ²⁰and inscribe them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates—²¹to the end that you and your children may endure, in the land that the LORD swore to your fathers to assign to them, as long as there is a heaven over the earth.

²²If, then, you faithfully keep all this Instruction that I command you, loving the LORD your God, walking in all His ways, and holding fast to Him, ²³the LORD will dislodge before you all these nations: you will dispossess nations greater and more numerous than you. ²⁴Every spot on which your foot treads shall be yours; your territory shall extend from the wilderness to the Lebanon and from the River—the Euphrates—to the Western^d Sea. ²⁵No man shall stand up to you: the LORD your God will put the dread and the fear of you over the whole land in which you set foot, as He promised you.

29–30: These verses represent an editorial intrusion. Previously, blessing . . . and the curse identify the benefits of covenantal obedience and the sanctions for breach of covenant (vv. 26–28; 28.2, 15). That theme is the expected climax of this chapter. Here, “blessing” and “curse” are restricted to a series of positive and negative sayings shouted from mounts Gerizim and . . . Ebal, in anticipation of ch 27. Gerizim, on the south, and Ebal, on the north, flank the pass guarded by the city of Shechem in the central hill country. This geographic restriction fits poorly in a chapter otherwise directed to the entire land (vv. 22–25, 31–32). 30: The terebinths of Moreh, at Shechem (see Gen. 12.6). 31–32: Transition to the legal corpus. 32: Take care to observe . . . laws and rules, cited chiasmically at 12.1

(“laws . . . rules . . . carefully observe”) to effect the transition from the literary frame of Deuteronomy (chs 1–11) into the laws (chs 12–26).

12.1–26.15: The legal corpus, the core of Deuteronomy’s transformation of Israelite religion. For the topical organization, see introduction.

12.1–13.1: Centralization and purification of the sacrificial worship, distinguishing Deuteronomic law and theology. These two requirements radically transformed Israelite religion, which in its formative stages, like all religions of antiquity, viewed sacrifice as indispensable to honor and to communicate with the deity. Historically, they are associated with the reform movements of King

Hezekiah (2 Kings 18.3–6, 22; 727/715–698/687) and, especially, of King Josiah (2 Kings chs 22–23; 640–609 BCE). The chapter requires the removal of foreign elements from the cultus (the system of sacrificial worship of God). It also centralizes the cultus by restricting sacrifice to a single, exclusively legitimate sanctuary. Four paragraphs (vv. 2–7, 8–12, 13–19, 20–28) each contain the centralization command; a fifth paragraph (vv. 29–31), concerned with cultic purification, vividly warns of the consequences of introducing alien worship into the Israelite system. An editorial superscription (v. 1) and conclusion (13.1) frame the unit, as each urges obedience.

12.2–7: Israel must violently reject the Canaanite precedent of worshipping God at multiple sanctuaries distributed throughout the land; instead, no matter where the members of the covenant live, they must travel to the single, legitimate sanctuary. 2: You: The chapter alternates between primarily plural (vv. 1–12) and primarily singular (vv. 13–31). This unexplained grammatical shift, combined with six repetitions of the command for cultic centralization (vv. 5, 11, 14, 18, 21, 26), suggests a complex compositional history. Destroy: Similar commands to destroy all implements associated with the worship of foreign gods are found at Exod. 23.23–24; 34.11–14; Deut. 7.5. Lofty mountains . . . luxuriant tree, formulaic language of the school of Deuteronomy for Canaanite sanctuaries, also known as “high places” (1 Kings 3.2; 2 Kings 16.4). Such sanctuaries were not only used to worship alien deities, however. During the monarchy, God could also be worshipped at such locations (1 Kings 3.4). 5: The site that the LORD . . . will choose: This frequent formula consistently refers to Jerusalem, where Solomon built the Temple. Since Jerusalem played no role in Israel’s history until David conquered it, made it his capital, and brought the Ark of the Covenant there (2 Sam. 5.6–6.19), the city cannot choose amidst all your tribes as His habitation, to establish His name there. There you are to go, ⁶and there you are to bring your burnt offerings and other sacrifices, your tithes and contributions,^a your votive and freewill offerings, and the firstlings of your herds and flocks. ⁷Together with your households, you shall feast there before the LORD your God, happy in all the undertakings in which the LORD your God has blessed you.

⁸You shall not act at all as we now act here, every man as he pleases, ⁹because you have not yet come to the allotted haven that the LORD your God is giving you. ¹⁰When you cross the Jordan and settle in the land that the LORD your God is allotting to you, and He grants you safety from all your enemies around you and you live in security, ¹¹then you must bring everything that I command you to the site where the LORD your God will choose to establish His name: your burnt offerings and other sacrifices, your tithes and contributions,^a and all the choice votive offerings that you vow to the LORD. ¹²And you shall rejoice before the LORD your God with your sons and daughters and with your male and female slaves, along with the Levite in your settlements, for he has no territorial allotment among you.

¹³Take care not to sacrifice your burnt offerings in any place you like, ¹⁴but only in the place that the LORD will choose in one of your tribal territories. There you shall sacrifice your burnt offerings and there you shall observe all that I enjoin upon you. ¹⁵But whenever you desire, you may slaughter and eat meat in any of your settlements, according to the blessing that the LORD your God has granted you. The unclean and the clean alike may partake of it, as of the gazelle and the deer.^b ¹⁶But you must not partake of the blood; you shall pour it out on the ground like water.

be named explicitly without undermining the literary form of Deuteronomy as a Mosaic address. To establish His name there: Deuteronomy rejects the common older idea that a nation's God would inhabit the Temple (contrast 1 Kings 8.12–13). Thus, as His habitation would better be translated "to establish it" (the divine name), indicating possession and special relationship. 6: A list of different types of sacrificial offerings. Burnt offer- ings is a technical term for a type of sacrifice where all of the animal's flesh was burnt on the altar (v. 27; Lev. 1.3–17). Other sacrifices refers to offerings where portions of the animal were assigned to the priests or shared by the worshippers (v. 27; 18.1–3; Lev. ch 3; 7.29–36).

12.8–12: This paragraph understands centralization of worship as part of a divine plan that awaits future fulfillment. The idea here that sacrificial worship at multiple sanctuaries was intended from the beginning to have limited temporal validity differs from the viewpoint of Exod. 20.21, where it is chronologically unconditional. 8: Every man as he pleases, lit. "each person doing what is right in his own eyes" in the absence of a central authority; a negative judgment, as in Judg. 17.6; 21.25. 9–10: Allotted haven is a typical Deuteronomistic term for the land as a whole. These verses designate territorial security as the precondition for the inauguration of centralization. This condition was fulfilled, according to the Deuteronomistic historian, only with David's conquest of Jerusalem, which then allowed the construction of the Temple (2 Sam. 7.1, 11; 1 Kings 8.56; cf. Josh. 21.43–45). 12: Since the Levites were not assigned land (see Josh. 13.14; cf. Ezek. 44.28), they had to depend upon voluntary offerings (see 10.9; 18.2 n.).

12.13–19: This section, the earliest in the chapter, is concentrically arranged in a chiasm, a literary device frequently used by the authors and editors of antiquity to structure diverse material in an ABC:C'B'A' pattern (diagram on p. 393). 13–16: The paragraph introduces two important distinctions in Israelite religion, each of which was revolutionary.

13–14: The first distinction is between sacrificial worship any place (i.e., at sites scattered throughout the land), which is here rejected as illegitimate, and legitimate sacrifice performed at a single sanctuary, the place that the LORD will choose (v. 14). The prohibition of sacrifice at multiple sites marks a dramatic contrast with the nation's previous norms. It was formerly common to erect altars and sacrifice to God throughout the land (Gen. 12.7; 35.1–7; 1 Sam. 7.17; 1 Kings 18.20–46); indeed, earlier biblical law assures God's blessing at multiple sacrificial altars: "in every place" (Exod. 20.21).

14–16: The second distinction is between the ritual sacrifice of animals at an altar and the secular slaughter of domestic animals for

¹⁷You may not partake in your settlements of the tithes of your new grain or wine or oil, or of the firstlings of your herds and flocks, or of any of the votive offerings that you vow, or of your freewill offerings, or of your contributions.^a

¹⁸These you must consume before the LORD your God in the place that the LORD your God will choose—you and your sons and your daughters, your male and female slaves, and the Levite in your settlements—happy before the LORD your God in all your undertakings. ¹⁹Be sure not to neglect the Levite as long as you live in your land.

²⁰When the LORD enlarges your territory, as He has promised you, and you say, "I shall eat some meat," for you have the urge to eat meat, you may eat meat whenever you wish. ²¹If the place where the LORD has chosen to establish His name is too far from you, you may slaughter any of the cattle or sheep that the LORD gives you, as I have instructed you; and you may eat to your heart's content in your settlements. ²²Eat it, however, as the gazelle and the deer are eaten: the unclean may eat it together with the clean. ²³But make sure that you do not partake of the blood; for the blood is the life, and you must not consume the life with the flesh. ²⁴You must not partake of it; you must pour it out on the ground like water: ²⁵you food. Prior to Deuteronomy, that distinction almost certainly did not exist. The existence of multiple altars throughout the land made it easy to comply with the requirement that the slaughter of a domestic animal should take place upon an altar, on the base of which its blood would be spilled in devotion to God (Lev. 17.1–9). This requirement lies behind the condemnation of Saul's troops for slaughtering domestic animals "on the ground," without an altar (1 Sam. 14.31–35). The prohibition of all local altars, however, created a real difficulty for those living in any of your settlements (v. 15), without easy access to the central sanctuary. In order that those far from the Temple could continue to eat meat, the legislator sought a legal precedent for the innovation of permitting the slaughter of domestic animals without performing that slaughter at an altar. The precedent employed was, paradoxically, the convention that applied to wild game such as the gazelle and . . . deer (v. 15). Although permissible for consumption, these animals could not be sacrificed (note translators' note b). Accordingly, Priestly law allowed the slaughter of wild game in the open field: i.e., away from an altar. (Later rabbinic law also provides specific rules concerning how any animal should be slaughtered, seeking to prevent suffering.) The one condition imposed was not to consume the animal's blood but to "pour out its blood and cover it with earth" (Lev. 17.13). Deuteronomy's legislator applies that model to domestic animals, which may now—paradoxically in contravention of Priestly norms (Lev. 17.3–7)—similarly be slaughtered throughout the land, on condition that their blood is not consumed but poured out on the ground like water (v. 16). Blood was accorded special status because it symbolized the vitality and "life" of animals and humans (v. 23; 15.23; Gen. 9.4–5; Lev. 17.14; 19.26). Ritually pure and impure alike (the unclean and the clean) may now eat meat slaughtered under the new regulations (v. 15; contrast Lev. 7.19–21). 17: Tithes, see 14.22–29 n.

12.20–28: This section repeats the permission for secular slaughter. It presents it in a new light, however, now explaining it as a necessary consequence of the expansion of Israel's boundaries and resulting distance from the cultic shrine. The assumption of a 7th century date for the composition of Deuteronomy would imply that the paragraph's future formulation reflects an after-the-fact explanation. 23–27: Although secular slaughter does not require an altar, common to it and the rules for sacrifice are special procedures for handling the animal's blood (see vv. 13–16 n.). In neither case may the blood ever be consumed by humans. Slaughter requires the blood to be poured on the ground (vv. 23–25). Similarly, the rules for each of the two main types of animal sacrifice direct the blood away from human consumption (v. 27). With burnt offerings, both the flesh and the blood are offered to God on the altar (see v. 6 n.). With your other sacrifices, the blood is directed on the altar, at or upon its base.

28: Commandments, lit. "words."

12.29–31: Here the focus shifts to purification of worship. 30: The new covenant requires that Israelites not imitate the more established sacrificial practices of the Canaanites, by whose antiquity the newcomers might be lured. Elsewhere, the corruption of Israelite religion is presented as resulting from the attractions of marital contract (7.1–5, 25) or political treaty (Exod. 23.33; 34.12).

31: Offer up their sons and their daughters in fire: The Canaanites are accused of child sacrifice (see 2 Kings 3.27; 23.10; Jer. 19.5–6), elsewhere associated with the deity Molech (Lev. 18.2; 20.2–5). This practice may have entrenched itself during the monarchy, with a cult center in the Hinnom Valley, just southwest of Jerusalem (2 Kings 23.10; Jer. 7.31; 19.5–6). The historical evidence for such practices, however, remains disputed.

13.1: NJPS, following the Masoretic paragraph divisions, correctly regards this verse as the conclusion to ch 12; contrast the standard chapter and verse numbers, which were first added to the Hebrew text in the 13th century CE. The demarcation of the unit is here important. In form, ch 12 is thus framed by an inclusio (see next note) that urges fidelity to law and tradition, even though, in its content, the unit has just profoundly transformed both. Be careful to observe, the same idiom found at 12.1 (also 11.32), frames the unit with an inclusio. Moreover, Neither add to it nor take away from it reflects an ancient Near Eastern scribal formula that was often included in the epilogue of treaties, inscriptions, or law collections to protect them from being defaced, altered, or written over. Although the admonition may begin a section (4.2), more frequently, as here, it serves as an ending marker or "colophon" to conclude the literary unit (Prov. 30.6; Eccl. 3.14; cf. Revelation 22.18–19).

13.2–19: The requirement for unconditional loyalty to God. Three hypothetical test cases introduced by "if," each of which requires a difficult choice between competing social or personal commitments and allegiance to Israel's God. In the first case (vv. 2–6), a prophet or interpreter of dreams, symbolizing powerful religious authority, invites the citizen to worship other gods and thereby betray God by committing apostasy. The second test case (vv. 7–12) presents the incitement to apostasy as coming from an intimate family member, spouse, or close friend. The third case (vv. 13–19) concerns the successful conversion to apostasy of an entire city. In each instance, the crime is capital, and the citizen must act decisively by executing the prophet or dream interpreter

For the LORD your God is testing you to see whether you really love the LORD your God with all your heart and soul.⁵ Follow none but the LORD your God, and revere none but Him; observe His commandments alone, and heed only His orders; worship none but Him, and hold fast to Him.⁶ As for that prophet or dream-diviner, he shall be put to death; for he urged disloyalty to the LORD your God—who freed you from the land of Egypt and who redeemed you from the house of bondage—to make you stray from the path that the LORD your God commanded you to follow. Thus you will sweep out evil from your midst.

⁷If your brother, ^a“your own mother’s son,”^a or your son or daughter, or the wife of your bosom, or your ^b“closest friend”^b entices you in secret, saying, “Come let us worship other gods”—whom neither you nor your fathers have experienced^c—⁸from among the gods of the peoples around you, either near to you or distant, anywhere from one end of the earth to the other: ⁹do not assent or give heed to him. (v. 6), killing the family member, spouse, or friend (v. 10), or conducting a war of attrition against a town of fellow citizens (v. 16). The literary model for these requirements is found in ancient Near Eastern treaties, which stipulated that vassals subject to a suzerain owed absolute loyalty to that suzerain and his designated successor. Political conspiracy had to be reported and was punishable by death. The author of this chapter has transformed that treaty requirement into a demand for absolute covenantal loyalty to Israel’s divine suzerain.

13.2–6: While Deuteronomy presents Moses as the founder of Israelite prophecy, establishing both its standard (18.15–22) and its pinnacle (34.10–12), the book is nonetheless concerned to regulate prophecy. No other Torah law collection legislates concerning the prophet. Deuteronomy does so twice, in each case requiring the execution of the prophet who contravenes Deuteronomy’s Torah (vv. 1–5; 18.19–22) and thus subordinating prophecy to covenantal law. At the same time, Deuteronomy sharply reworks the role of the prophet. Older forms of charismatic revelation (dream, sign or a portent), once the touchstone of the legitimate prophet and employed by Moses himself, now become suspect. No longer is the power to perform signs the test of a prophet’s legitimacy (contrast v. 2 with 34.11–12; Exod. 4.1–9, 21; 1 Kings 18.20–40). The true prophet will now proclaim Torah (18.18). 2: As a mediator of divine communications, a prophet or a dream-diviner (lit. “a prophet or dreamer of dreams”) would by definition command public credibility and authority, making it the more difficult to resist his incitement to apostasy. Dream-diviner: Predicting the future by dream interpretation was one of the most common techniques of divination (Gen. 37.5–10; Num. 12.6; Jer.

23.25; Joel 3.1). The two sources of religious authority identified here correspond closely to the nearly contemporary Neo-Assyrian Vassal Treaty of Esarhaddon (672 BCE), which requires loyalty even in the face of conspiracy from “your brothers, your sons, your daughters, or from the mouth of a prophet, an ecstatic, or an inquirer of oracles” (§10). Signs or portents were also used by legitimate prophets to authenticate their proclamations (34.11; Exod. 4.1–9, 21; 7.9; Judg. 6.17). 3: Follow . . . another god: The incitement to apostasy is formulated in the language of Neo-Assyrian treaties; see 6.14 n. Worship, specifically, with sacrifice; see 5.9 n. 6: Disloyalty, as betrayal of the divine suzerain to whom covenantal loyalty is owed. Sweep out evil from your midst: a formula that emphasizes the community’s obligation to eliminate particularly offensive religious transgressions (e.g., 17.7, 12; 19.19; 21.21).

13.7–12: The possible conflict between love of family, spouse, or friend—exclusive loyalty to God (cf. Luke 14.26). 7: In secret, i.e., in private, without witnesses. Your own mother’s son (lit. “the son of your mother”), that is, “your full brother.” In the context of Second Temple Judaism, the law was read as incomplete because of its asymmetrical formulation. Seeking to fill the perceived gap in the law, the Samaritan, the Septuagint, and fragments of Deuteronomy found at Qumran add: “the son of your father” (in translators’ note a-a), so that it would include both the full and the half-brother. The addition no longer understands the original intent of this law, which demands that the addressee choose between loyalty to God and loyalty to the closest possible member of the immediate family. Thus, the Masoretic version preserves the better reading by restricting the focus to the full brother. 10: But take his life, lit. “But you shall surely kill him.” This verb is almost never used for a standard judicial execution. Here it demands that the inciter should be killed on the spot. Only the religious emergency of a grave threat against him to put him to death, and the hand of the rest of the people thereafter. ¹¹Stone him to death, for he sought to make you stray from the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. ¹²Thus all Israel will hear and be afraid, and such evil things will not be done again in your midst.

¹³If you hear it said, of one of the towns that the LORD your God is giving you to dwell in, ¹⁴that some scoundrels from among you have gone and subverted the inhabitants of their town, saying, “Come let us worship other gods”—whom you have not experienced—¹⁵you shall investigate and inquire and interrogate thoroughly. If it is true, the fact is established—that abhorrent thing was perpetrated in your midst—¹⁶put the inhabitants of that town to the sword and put its cattle to the sword. Doom it and all that is in it to destruction: ¹⁷gather all its spoil into the open square, and burn the town and all its spoil as a holocaust to the LORD your God. And it shall remain an everlasting ruin, never to be rebuilt. ¹⁸Let nothing that has been doomed stick to your hand, in order that the LORD may turn from His blazing anger and show you compassion, and in His compassion increase you as He promised your fathers on oath—¹⁹for you will be heeding the LORD your God, obeying all His commandments that I enjoin upon you this day, doing what is right in the sight of the LORD your God.

to the covenant, requiring urgent action, explains this type of summary execution (see also Exod. 32.27; Num. 25.5; Ezek. 9.6; cf. Lev. 20.15–16). Similar requirements for summarily executing traitors may be found in the Neo-Assyrian loyalty treaties that serve as a partial literary source for this chapter. Historically, the requirement for unconditional loyalty to YHWH, at all costs, modeled after the political treaty’s similar demand for loyalty to the suzerain, accounts for the law’s stringency. Nonetheless, compliance with the law conflicts with Deuteronomy’s own requirement for due process (17.2–7 n.; 19.15; similarly, Num. 35.30). Later editors therefore added another layer to bring the law into conformity with the normal protocol for a public, judicial execution (v. 11 n.). In the Second Temple period, the law could only be taught and understood in that light: as consistent with the standard requirement that any execution require a prior legal conviction based upon the testimony of two witnesses. The Septuagint embeds that later reinterpretation of the law into its translation of the initial command: “You shall report.”

11: Stone: Stoning was reserved for a particular class of offenses regarded as violating the community’s fundamental values or sources of authority: apostasy or treason (here; 17.2–7; Lev. 20.2; Josh. 7.10–26; 1 Kings 21.8–14), blasphemy (Lev. 24.13–23), defying parental authority (21.18–21; 22.20–21), betraying marriage (22.23–24). Each of these offenses is prohibited by the Decalogue (5.6–7, 11, 16, 17). This form of punishment compelled the entire community to act collectively to repudiate the offense.

13.14: Scoundrels, lit., “sons of worthlessness,” or “children of Belial” (KJV), a very strong derogatory term. 16–18: In the sphere of clan life, little could be more horrifying and socially divisive than to have to “join battle with our kinsmen” (Judg. 20.23). Nonetheless, the infidelity of the entire town represents so significant a betrayal of the covenant that its entire population must be placed under the same ban as that otherwise reserved for the Canaanite population (7.1–6, 25–26; 12.29–30; 20.16–18). 17: Normally in antiquity, new occupants would rebuild cities after their military destruction, right on top of the ruin (Heb “tel”). The word yields the term for the city-mounds that remain visible throughout the Near East, where archeological digs are conducted. In cases of particular cataclysm, the mounds sometimes were not rebuilt, and served as visible reminders of the destruction (Josh. 8.28; Jer. 26.18; 49.2; Mic. 3.12).

14.1–29: The obligations of holiness. 1–21: The special status that the covenant grants Israel as a people consecrated to the LORD entails special obligations upon them, one focus of which is dietary. The affirmation of holiness (vv. 2, 21) therefore frames the list of permitted and prohibited foods (vv. 3–21). That the nation’s holiness requires special selectivity regarding food is also evident in earlier biblical law (the “holy” of Exod. 22.30). 1: Children of the LORD, the first of three metaphors used in vv. 1–2 to emphasize the special relation between God and Israel. The divine parent has special custody for the child (Exod. 2.22–23; Hos. 1.10) but, equally, special indignation at wrongdoing (32.5–6, 19–20; Isa. 1.2). Gash . . . shave . . . dead: Gashing and head shaving were customary mourning rituals within Israel and the larger Near East (1 Kings 18.28; Jer. 16.6–7; 41.4–5; 47.5; Amos 8.10). The rationale for their prohibition (see also Lev. 19.27–28; 21.1–6) may be their association with foreign religion. More likely, such rituals were associated with ancestor worship or cults of the dead, an aspect of Israelite popular religion rejected by Deuteronomy (see 18.10–11). 2: For you are a people consecrated to the LORD: Just as priests observe more stringent purity rules than other Israelites, so must Israel distinguish itself from other nations by observing the special requirements of the Torah. This second metaphor of election departs from the idea of Israel's status found in the other biblical legal collections. Both the Book of the Covenant and the Holiness Collection understand the nation's holiness as a goal to be achieved in the future ("you shall be": Exod. 22.30; Lev. 19.2). In contrast, Deuteronomy affirms Israel's present status as already holy. His treasured people: The third metaphor is political. Just as the monarch is entitled to a "private hoard" of treasure not in the public domain (1 Chron. 29.3), so does God single Israel out for a special relationship. Both the second and third metaphors (consecrated; treasured people) derive from God's affirmation just prior to Sinai (Exod. 19.5–6).

14.3–21: The word "kosher" is never used in the Bible in reference to food. Nor is there in the Torah a comprehensive set of rules, similar to the later rabbinic system of kashrut, which covers permitted and nonpermitted foods, combinations of foods, means of preparation, rules for slaughter, etc. Deuteronomy nevertheless begins to build toward such a system. In contrast to Priestly law (Lev. ch 11), it brings together a list of creatures that may or may not be eaten (vv. 3–20), which it combines with laws implicitly concerned with slaughter and food preparation (v. 21). Deuteronomy's dietary restrictions abridge and revise the more detailed list of permitted and prohibited foods provided by the Priestly source (Lev. 11.2–23). For example, contrast the land animals prohibited by vv. 7–9 with the fuller list, including individual explanations, of Lev. 11.4–8. Similarly, vv. 9–10 offer a précis of Lev. 11.9–12; and v. 19 issues a blanket prohibition against insects in contrast to the lengthy distinctions between permitted and prohibited insects of Lev. 11.20–23. This textual relationship, where Deuteronomy uses and revises Priestly material, is highly unusual; by and large, it seems unaware of these texts. The classification of creatures as permitted or nonpermitted employs unexplained criteria to establish three basic divisions of species: creatures of the land (Deut. 14.1–8), water (vv. 9–10), or air (vv. 11–20). The same tripartite division occurs in the Priestly creation account (Gen. 1.20–25). Species that fail to satisfy the defining characteristics established for each category are not permitted: the pig (v. 8) and shellfish (v. 10). It is important to recognize that the classification system reflects the desire to imprint a human system of categorization upon nature and is based on a concern for systematic order rather than on hygiene or health. Thus, the term unclean (v. 8) does ²¹You shall not eat anything that has died a natural death; give it to the stranger in your community to eat, or you may sell it to a foreigner. For you are a people consecrated to the LORD your God.

²²You shall set aside every year a tenth part of all the yield of your sowing that is brought from the field. ²³You shall consume the tithes of your new grain and wine and oil, and the firstlings of your herds and flocks, in the presence of the LORD your God, in the place where He will choose to establish His name, so that you may learn to revere the LORD your God forever. ²⁴Should the distance be too great for you, should you be unable to transport them, because the place where the LORD your God has chosen to establish His name is far from you and because the LORD your God has blessed you,^a ²⁵you may convert them into money. Wrap up the money and take it with you to the place that the LORD your God has chosen, ²⁶and spend the money on anything you want—cattle, sheep, wine, or other intoxicant, or anything you may desire. And you shall feast there, in the presence of the LORD your God, and rejoice with your household.

²⁷But do not neglect the Levite in your community, for he has no hereditary portion as you have. ^{28^b}Every third year^b you shall bring out the full tithe of your yield of that year, but leave it within your settlements. ²⁹Then the Levite, who has no hereditary portion as you have, and the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow in your settlements shall come and eat their fill, so that the LORD your God may bless you in all the enterprises you undertake.

15 ^cEvery seventh year^c you shall practice remission of debts. ²This shall be the nature of the remission: every creditor shall remit the due that he claims from his fellow; he shall not dun his fellow or kinsman, for the re-not imply that an animal is dirty. Ritually "impure" conveys the idea more clearly. 21: Anything that has died a natural death: Israelites may not eat carrion (Exod. 22.30) or any other animal that is not slaughtered according to Deuteronomy's stringent requirement that the blood be drained (12.16, 23–25). The motivation is not hygiene but the enforcement of rules for slaughter. Carrion may therefore be donated to resident aliens or sold to foreigners, since the laws of slaughter apply only to Israelites. Boil a kid: This law is repeated three times in the Torah (here; Exod. 23.19; 34.26). The rabbinic assumption that no law in the Bible is redundant led to the postbiblical generalization that prohibited the consumption of meat and milk products together. On its own terms, the law seems to have had a more restricted application. It originally applied specifically to the pilgrimage festival offerings (Exod. 23.19; 34.26). Deuteronomy now reinterprets it as a general law of food preparation. Philo viewed it as directing the mind away from the body; Maimonides viewed it as directed against idolatry. Some moderns have viewed the prohibition as directed against Canaanite religious rituals; others view it as concerned to prevent the abuse of animals.

14.22–29: The requirement to set aside every year a tenth of crops and livestock as a tax or honorarium paid to a monarch is common (Gen. 14.20; 28.22; 1 Sam. 8.15, 17). Here the rule signifies that Israel is God's steward, working but not owning God's land. 23: The standard rules of the tithe (Lev. 27.30–33; Num. 18.21–32; cf. Exod. 22.29) are revised to direct offerings to the single sanctuary. Later rabbinic norms for tithing do not recognize this, and attempt to harmonize these various laws. You shall consume: Whereas Deuteronomy assigns the tithe to the landholder, Lev. 27.30 directs it to the sanctuary and Num. 18.21 to the Levites. 24: In light of centralization, sanctified crops (designated for the sanctuary) may be converted into money (v. 25) to facilitate the journey. That firstlings (v. 23) may also be sold for cash is at variance with Lev. 27.32. Distance be too great, as in 12.21 ("too far"). 28–29: Every third year the tithe is shifted away from the central sanctuary to focus on the needs of the disadvantaged and the marginalized in the local community, to ensure that they too may eat their fill.

15.1–18: Remission of debts (vv. 1–11) and manumission of slaves (vv. 12–18). On accession to the throne, ancient Near Eastern rulers would sometimes grant one-time cancellation of debts, return land confiscated by the crown, and mission proclaimed is of the LORD.³ You may dun the foreigner; but you must remit whatever is due you from your kinsmen.

⁴There shall be no needy among you—since the LORD your God will bless you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you as a hereditary portion—⁵if only you heed the LORD your God and take care to keep all this Instruction that I enjoin upon you this day. ⁶For the LORD your God will bless you as He has promised you: you will extend loans to many nations, but require none yourself; you will dominate many nations, but they will not dominate you.

⁷If, however, there is a needy person among you, one of your kinsmen in any of your settlements in the land that the LORD your God is giving you, do not harden your heart and shut your hand against your needy kinsman. ⁸Rather, you must open your hand and lend him sufficient for whatever he needs. ⁹Beware lest you harbor the base thought, “The seventh year, the year of remission, is approaching,” so that you are mean to your needy kinsman and give him nothing. He will cry out to the LORD against you, and you will incur guilt. ¹⁰Give to him readily and have no regrets when you do so, for in return the LORD your God will bless you in all your efforts and in all your undertakings. ¹¹For there will never cease to be needy ones in your land, which is why I command you: open your hand to the poor and needy kinsman in your land.

free indentured slaves. That custom, Akkadian “duraru,” is reflected in the Hebrew “deror,” “jubilee” or “release,” of Lev. 25.10; Isa. 61.1; Jer. 34.15, 17. Deuteronomy’s conception of the covenant between Israel and God entails a similar fresh start in which prior economic obligations are canceled at the initiative of the divine monarch. Now, however, it is not financial obligations to a privileged monarch that are canceled. Instead, the covenant requires the wealthy to forgive the debts of the poor! Moreover, this remission of debts and still unpaid labor contracts is no longer to be a voluntary, one-time act but a covenantal obligation that recurs every seven years. This blueprint for social justice is highly idealistic. By providing specific mechanisms to eliminate poverty and financial inequality every seven years, Deuteronomy seeks to prevent economic injustice from becoming entrenched in society.

There is evidence that the authors are aware of the gap between this aspiration and worldly convention: Perspectives that are idealistic (v. 4) and pragmatic (v. 11) alternate in the chapter. For reflections of the injustices at issue, see Amos 2.6–8; Jer. 34.8–22; Ezek. 18.16–18; Job 24.9; Neh. 5.1–13. In the concern for social justice, the chapter reworks earlier laws found in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. chs 21–23), adjusting their requirements to the innovation of centralization of worship. The sequence of the paragraphs reflects increasingly severe stages of financial distress: from debt to indentured servitude, an ancient form of bankruptcy (see Lev. 25.13–55 for a similar sequence). Slavery and manumission serve as rich theological metaphors for both Jews and Christians (see Lev. 25.42, 55; Romans 6.20–23; Philippians 2.5–8).

15.1–6: Cancellation of debts.

1: Seventh year: This law presupposes the requirement of the Book of the Covenant that agricultural land should be permitted to lie fallow each “seventh year” (Exod. 23.10–11). 2: Remission, using the same verb found in Exod. 23.11 for “lie fallow,” but now reapplying that agricultural requirement to command the cancellation of all existing debts. 3: The utopian requirement is restricted to fellow citizens. In not canceling the debts of foreigners, the legislator makes a concession to the pragmatic concerns of the creditor. 4: There shall be no needy, or, “no poor.” Note the contrast between this unconditional utopian affirmation and the pragmatism of v. 7.

15.7–11: An appeal to conscience, anticipating the problem of implementing and enforcing such a law. 9: Cry . . . guilt. The law has no judicial penalty or sanction. The neighbor’s appeal is to the divine judge for enforcement (similarly, 24.15; Exod. 22.22–23).

15.12–18: Manumission: This law adjusts the older laws regulating male (Exod. 21.2–6) and female slaves (Exod. 21.7–11) in four significant ways. (1) It rejects separate procedures for the female bondservant and creates a single law that applies to both genders, strikingly abrogating the older law (contrast v. 17b with Exod. 21.7b)! (2) It secularizes the procedure for a slave who voluntarily relinquishes the right to freedom (vv. 16–17) by eliminating the former requirement that the ceremony take place “before God,” i.e., at one of the now prohibited local sanctuaries or before the household deities (Exod. 21.6). (3) The master must now grant the slave a gift (vv. 13–14) rather than simply releasing him or her empty-handed (contrast Exod. 21.2). (4) In the ¹²If a fellow Hebrew, man or woman, is sold to you, he shall serve you six years, and in the seventh year you shall set him free. ¹³When you set him free, do not let him go empty-handed: ¹⁴Furnish him out of the flock, threshing floor, and vat, with which the LORD your God has blessed you. ¹⁵Bear in mind that you were slaves in the land of Egypt and the LORD your God redeemed you; therefore I enjoin this commandment upon you today.

¹⁶But should he say to you, “I do not want to leave you”—for he loves you and your household and is happy with you—¹⁷you shall take an awl and put it through his ear into the door, and he shall become your slave in perpetuity. Do the same with your female slave. ¹⁸When you do set him free, do not feel aggrieved; for in the six years he has given you double the service of a hired man. Moreover, the LORD your God will bless you in all you do.

¹⁹You shall consecrate to the LORD your God all male firstlings that are born in your herd and in your flock: you must not work your firstling ox or shear your firstling sheep. ²⁰You and your household shall eat it annually before the LORD your God in the place that the LORD will choose. ²¹But if it has a defect, lameness or blindness, any serious defect, you shall not sacrifice it to the LORD your God. ²²Eat it in your settlements, the unclean among you no less than the clean, just like the gazelle and the deer. ²³Only you must not partake of its blood; you shall pour it out on the ground like water.

Book of the Covenant, there is no connection between the manumission law (Exod. 21.2–6) and the land sabbatical law (Exod. 23.10–11). Nor should one be expected. Logically, the year of manumission would not be uniform through the land but would vary with each household, depending upon when a slave began to labor. By conjoining the two originally separate laws, Deuteronomy creates a single year of release that now applies to both remission of debts (vv. 1–6) and manumission (vv. 12–18). Deuteronomy thus transforms manumission, which used to be based in the individual household, into a year of universal liberty (see also Lev. ch 25). That perspective lies behind Zedekiah’s last-ditch attempt to curry divine favor by implementing this law on the eve of the Babylonian invasion of Jerusalem in 587 BCE, with a universal emancipation of slaves (Jer. 34.6–22). And whereas the legislator of Deuteronomy can only appeal to individual moral conscience to urge obedience (v. 18), Jeremiah explains the Babylonian destruction as divine punishment for Jerusalem’s citizens’ reneging on the law by immediately reenslaving those whom they freed (Jer. 34.11–22). With national exile thus made the penalty for infringement, setting slaves free every seven years becomes, in this view, a central requirement of the covenant. The delay of manumission to the fiftieth year in the Holiness Collection may reflect the difficulty of implementing this idealistic law (Lev. 25.39–44). 12: Is sold, alternately, “sells himself,” expressing the two alternative ways of understanding the contractual and economic nature of this slavery, which is not based on race, nationality, or religion. The court might require that a thief, unable to repay a theft, “be sold,” i.e., indenture his labor to compensate the victim (Exod. 21.37–22.3). Alternately, if overcome by debt, a serf might “sell himself,” i.e., assign his labor to repay a loan (Lev. 25.39–44). 14–15: The gift provided the manumitted slave recalls and reenacts the nation’s own manumission by God from slavery in Egypt. 18: As in vv. 8–10, an appeal to conscience that anticipates the difficulty of enforcing a law that lacks judicial sanction.

15.19–23: Sacrifice of firstlings. Older religious convention required that each first-born male domestic animal be offered as a sacrifice to God at one of the local sanctuaries (Exod. 13.1–2, 11–16; 22.28–29; 34.19–20). The author now adjusts that law to the new one stipulating a single sanctuary. 19: Not work, so as to reserve the animal for God. 20: Before the LORD refers to sacrifice at an altar, which now requires a pilgrimage to the central sanctuary of Jerusalem, the place that the LORD will choose. 21–23: Blemished first-born livestock need not be taken to the central sanctuary. They may be slaughtered locally, in your settlements, following the requirements for secular slaughter (12.15–16, 21–25).

16.1–17: The festival calendar. Deuteronomy strikingly transforms older religious celebrations in order to accommodate them

you from Egypt. ²You shall slaughter the passover sacrifice for the LORD your God, from the flock and the herd, in the place where the LORD will choose to establish His name. ³You shall not eat anything leavened with it; for seven days thereafter^a you shall eat unleavened bread, bread of distress—for you departed from the land of Egypt hurriedly—so that you may remember the day of your departure from the land of Egypt as long as you live. ⁴For seven days no leaven shall be found with you in all your territory, and none of the flesh of what you slaughter on the evening of the first day shall be left until morning.

⁵You are not permitted to slaughter the passover sacrifice in any of the settlements that the LORD your God is giving you; ⁶but at the place where the LORD your God will choose to establish His name, there alone shall you slaughter the passover sacrifice, in the evening, at sundown, the time of day when you departed from Egypt. ⁷You shall cook and eat it at the place that the LORD your God will choose; and in the morning you may start back on your journey home. ⁸After eating unleavened bread six days, you shall hold a solemn gathering^b for the LORD your God on the seventh day: you shall do no work.

to its requirement for centralization of worship. Previously, each male Israelite was commanded to undertake three pilgrimages to "appear before the LORD," i.e., to make an offering at one of the multiple local sanctuaries (v. 16; Exod. 23.14–18). The Hebrew term for these important events in ancient Israel's religious calendar is "Ḥag" (as in the still common greeting, "Ḥag Sameaḥ"). Often translated as "feasts" (v. 16; Exod. 23.14), the original idea is "pilgrimage festival." As a consequence of restricting sacrifice to a single, central sanctuary, Deuteronomy redirects the required pilgrimage from the prohibited local sanctuaries (v. 5) to the central one, the place where the LORD will choose (vv. 2, 6, 7, 11, 15, 16; 12.17–18). These three festivals were Unleavened Bread (Heb "Matzot"), Harvest, and Ingathering (Exod. 23.14–17; 34.18, 23). Deuteronomy renames the latter two "Weeks" (v. 10; Heb "Shavu'ot") and "Booths" (v. 13; Heb "Sukkot"), which remain their current names.

16.1–8: The blend of Passover and the Festival of Unleavened Bread is the most remarkable section of this calendar. Passover was originally a separate observance, celebrated within the family or clan. Since it did not require a sacrifice at the sanctuary, it was not included among the three pilgrimage festivals (Exod. 23.14–17; 34.18, 21–23). Instead, it was distinguished by a nighttime slaughter of a sheep or goat in the doorway of the house, where the blood was smeared to demarcate the house as Israelite (Exod. 12.7, 21–22). First performed to protect the Israelites in Egypt from the plague against the first-born, the ritual thereafter annually commemorated Israel's deliverance from that plague (Exod. 12.1–13, 21–28). But Deuteronomy's restriction of sacrifice to the single sanctuary prohibited Passover from being observed locally (v. 5) and required that the observance be redirected to the central sanctuary (vv. 2, 6–7). Now made into a pilgrimage festival, the older blood ritual in the doorway of the private home—the defining act of the original Passover observance—is no longer mentioned. The new observance then merges with the Festival of Unleavened Bread, which was also celebrated in early spring. Traces of the separate identity of Passover and Unleavened Bread remain evident in their distinct dates and naming in Lev. 23.5, 6; Num. 28.16, 17–25. 1: Abib (lit. "new ear of grain"), in early spring, when ears of barley, the first crop, began to ripen (Exod. 13.4; 23.15; 34.18). It was originally the first month of the Hebrew calendar (Exod. 12.2); later this month was called by the Babylonian month name "Nisan." 2: From the flock and the herd expands the earlier restriction of the paschal offering to "a lamb . . . from the sheep or from the goats" (Exod. 12.4–5, 21). 3: For seven days: This section, through v. 4a, splices the seven-day observance of the Festival of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12.14–20; 23.15) into the one-day observance of Passover (vv. 1–3a, 4b–7). 7: Cook: more accurately, "boil," like other standard sacrifices (Exod. 29.1; Lev. 6.21; 8.31; Num. 6.19; 1 Sam. 2.13, 15; Zech. 14.21). This prescription is at odds with the earlier stipulation that the paschal offering be "roasted by fire," not "boiled in water" (Exod. 12.8–9; Hebrew). The Passover is now being treated as a standard sacrifice. These two mutually inconsistent laws are harmonized at 2 Chron. 35.13, where the Hebrew paradoxically reads: "They boiled the Passover offering by fire, according to the law." 8: After eating unleavened bread six days: The Hebrew reads simply, "For six days you shall eat unleavened bread." The NJPS rendering, "after . . . six days," results in an eight-day total for the festivals of Passover and Unleavened Bread, modeled after the Priestly version of the calendar: 1 day (Passover) + 6 days (Unleavened Bread) + 1 day (the solemn gathering); see Lev. 23.3–8. In contrast, Deuteronomy intended to fuse the two holidays into a single seven-day observance.

a Lit. "you in all."

16.9–12: The Festival of Weeks (Exod. 34.22; Lev. 23.15–16; Num. 28.26), originally, as the earliest name signifies, the "Festival of Harvest" (Exod. 23.16), celebrated in May–June. In postbiblical Judaism, the festival came to be associated with the revelation at Mount Sinai (Exod. chs 19–20). The idea underlies the New Testament narrative of the Holy Spirit's activity at "Pentecost" (Acts 2.1; cf. 20.16; 1 Corinthians 16.8), the Greek term for which reflects the calculation of "fifty days" (Lev. 23.16). 9: Start to count the seven weeks when the sickle is first put to the standing grain: The date of this festival is not a fixed date set by the calendar but is based upon the cycle of the agricultural year. The seven-week period delays the celebration until the safe conclusion of the harvest, a precarious period when the important crop might be damaged by natural forces. This kind of calculation implies that different parts of the land might celebrate the festival on different dates. This ambiguity gave rise to a chain of successive interpretations in Second Temple literature that attempted to clarify the precise date of the festival. The first of these attempts may well be that of the Holiness Collection, which dates the seven weeks "from the day on which you bring the sheaf of elevation offering—the day after the sabbath" (Lev. 23.15). But that calculation remains ambiguous, since the "sabbath" to which the text refers is not identified. Contextually, "the day after the sabbath" refers to the first Sunday after the first ripe sheaf of grain is harvested, but precisely that absence of a specific date for Weeks led to sectarian disagreement in Second Temple times over when to observe it. Pharisees understood the sabbath in question simply as a reference to the Passover, no matter on which day of the week it fell; Sadducees regarded it as the Sabbath during the week of Passover/Unleavened Bread; and the Qumran community viewed it as the Sabbath of the following week. The proliferation of sects in the Second Temple period may well reflect, in part, the mutually exclusive interpretations of different groups who struggled to resolve the Bible's calendrical ambiguities. 11: With your son and daughter: The command to rejoice before God at the central sanctuary specifies the inclusion of women (as v. 14; 12.12, 18). That the wife is not named separately in the list implies that the law regards the male and female adult citizen as equals. Contrast the more formulaic vv. 16–17, which is slavishly adopted from its source in Exodus. Slave . . . widow: The marginalized and the disadvantaged are also included in this comprehensive list. Stranger, better, "resident alien," see 10.18–19 n.

16.13–15: The Feast of Booths. Curiously, the law provides no explanation for the name of the festival, which is elsewhere called "Ingathering" (Exod. 23.16; 34.22), reflecting its origins as the fall harvest festival. The Holiness Collection fills in this gap with the sermon-like explanation that the name recalls how God "made the Israelite people live in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt" (Lev. 23.43). But that explanation is inconsistent with the narrative tradition that the Israelites lived in tents during the wilderness sojourn (Num. 11.10; 16.27; 25.8). More likely, the name reflects the agricultural custom of farmers erecting temporary shelters in the fields during the summer while the grapes, olives, and other crops are tended and then harvested (see Isa. 1.8). 15: Seven days: Deuteronomy's observance differs from that of the Holiness Collection, which requires a total of eight days (Lev. 23.36, 40). Moreover, Deuteronomy does not require that the first and the final days of the festival involve a "holy convocation" or "solemn assembly," ¹⁶Three times a year—on the Feast of Unleavened Bread, on the Feast of Weeks, and on the Feast of Booths—all your males shall appear before the LORD your God in the place that He will choose. 16.16–17: The formulaic summary (“colophon”) reuses the conclusion of the older festival calendar in the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 23.17), which it now updates to specify that the three annual pilgrimages must be to the central sanctuary, the place that He will choose. Two elements, however, reflect older assumptions inconsistent with the rest of this chapter: Passover (vv. 1–8) is not mentioned, and the pilgrimage requirement is directed to all your males (as Exod. 23.17), despite the gender inclusivity of vv. 11, 14.

16.18–18.22: Laws of public officials. Although western political theory is normally traced back to ancient Athens, this section is remarkable for providing what seems to be the first blueprint for a constitutional system of government. The carefully thought-out plan is designed to ensure that no single branch of government and no single religious institution should have sole power. Each is brought into relationship to the others and, more importantly, each is made subordinate to the one true authority: the Torah of Deuteronomy. Even institutions that might justifiably claim absolute authority—whether political, as in the case of the king (see Ps. 2.6–7), or religious, as in the case of the prophet (see Exod. 3.10–12)—are integrated into Deuteronomy’s comprehensive vision. It is unlikely that the ambitious program envisioned by this draft constitution was ever fully implemented. Upon the return from exile, when Judah regained some measure of political autonomy under Persian rule, different religious and political priorities preempted this blueprint. There is a great deal of scholarly disagreement about the precise dating of this section: how much to ascribe to the original legislation of Deuteronomy, associated with the Josianic period shortly before the exile, and how much may derive from the Babylonian exile itself, as Judean thinkers reflected on their national history and mapped out a new model of society, structured by Torah. Most likely, an original Josianic layer underwent elaboration during the exile.

In its organization, this section addresses the full range of public officials in the judicial, executive, and religious branches: the local and the central courts (16.18–17.13), kingship (17.14–20), the Levitical priesthood (18.1–8), and prophecy (18.9–22). Although the focus on public officials ostensibly marks a significant change from the previous section’s focus on the sacrificial system (12.1–16.17), the concern of the legislator in both sections is consistent: the impact of centralization of worship upon all spheres of life. The desire to bridge from the first section to the new one explains the puzzling way in which ritual laws (16.21–17.1) seem to intrude between two paragraphs concerned with justice (16.18–20, 17.2–7). By means of the repetition, the editor provides a transition into the new section, while establishing the underlying unity of both areas of community life:

- A Cultus (12.1–16.17)
- B Justice (16.18–20)
- A’ Cultus (16.21–17.1)
- B’ Justice (17.2–7, 17.8–13)

16.18–17.13: The organization of justice. 16.18–20: Deuteronomy here establishes a professionalized local judiciary. 18: Settlements, lit., “gates,” Deuteronomy’s metaphor for the local sphere (12.15, 17.21; 16.5), as distinguished from the central sanctuary. Here the metaphor takes on an additional meaning, because the city gate served as the location where justice was traditionally dispensed by the village elders (Job 29.7; Ruth 4.1, 11; Lam. 5.14). By appointing professional magistrates and officials to just that location, while leaving the elders unmentioned, Deuteronomy significantly contracts the elders’ sphere of authority, if not altogether eliminating it. The professionalization of the judicial system thus entails a disruption of traditional patterns of clan authority. The elders are mentioned elsewhere in the legal corpus as involved with judicial matters (21.1–9, 19; 22.15, 25.7). These references may preserve an older perspective; otherwise, they show how the elders’ role in justice has now been restricted to family and marital law. 19: You shall not judge unfairly: This admonition to the judges, sometimes called a “Mirror for Magistrates,” quotes Exod. 23.6a (where the same verb is translated “subvert”). For bribes blind the eyes of the discerning (lit. “of the wise”): The older law of Exod. 23.8, which refers to “the clear-sighted” as being blinded by justice shall you pursue, that you may thrive and occupy the land that the LORD your God is giving you.

²¹You shall not set up a sacred post—any kind of pole beside the altar of the LORD your God that you may make—²²or erect a stone pillar; for such the LORD your God detests.

17You shall not sacrifice to the LORD your God an ox or a sheep that has any defect of a serious kind, for that is abhorrent to the LORD your God.

²If there is found among you, in one of the settlements that the LORD your God is giving you, a man or woman who has affronted the LORD your God and transgressed His covenant—³turning to the worship of other gods and bowing down to them, to the sun or the moon or any of the heavenly host, something I never commanded—⁴and you have been informed or have learned of it, then you shall make a thorough inquiry. If it is true, the fact is established, that abhorrent thing was perpetrated in Israel, ⁵you shall take the man or the woman who did that wicked thing out to the public place, and you shall stone them, man or woman, to death.—⁶A person shall be put to death only on the testimony of two or more^a witnesses; he must not be put to death on the testimony of a single witness.—⁷Let the hands of the witnesses be the first against him to put him to death, and the hands of the rest of the people thereafter. Thus you will sweep out evil from your midst.

bribery, is revised in light of Deuteronomy's stress upon wisdom. The failure of Samuel's sons to meet this standard of judicial probity (1 Sam. 8.3) is viewed by the Deuteronomistic historian as the justification for the establishment of the monarchy (1 Sam. 8.5).

16.21–17.1: Prohibitions against Canaanite cultic objects (7.5; 12.3; Exod. 34.13). 16.21: Sacred post or "Asherah," see 7.5 n. Archeological evidence suggests that this Canaanite goddess may also have been popular in Israel. 16.22: See 7.5 n. 17.1: This verse broadens the prohibition against sacrificing blemished firstlings (15.21) into a general law of sacrifice.

17.2–7: Local justice. Because of the extent to which this law so closely overlaps with 13.7–12, both in its wording and in the topic of apostasy by an individual, many scholars have viewed it as out of place and as belonging to ch 13. That is incorrect. Whereas the theme of ch 13 is incitement, at issue here are the procedures and the jurisdiction of the local courts. Under the professionalized judiciary (16.18), the law grants the local courts maximal autonomy, enabling them to try even capital cases and to address religious matters (the accusation of apostasy). Just one essential condition is imposed: that a trial be conducted according to strictly rational standards that assure empirical proof for the verdict. Thus v. 4 provides the procedures to put a vague rumor (you have been informed) to the formal test of a thorough inquiry in order to verify its truth. The law stipulates the criteria necessary to establish judicial "proof": the testimony of two or more witnesses (v. 6). This law may be the first place in the Bible, historically speaking, where norms of justice regarding witness law were established. (Scholars normally date the Priestly source, and thus the parallel requirement of more than one witness in Num. 35.30, later than Deuteronomy.) The power of this law is that it rejects the summary execution in the case of incitement required by Deut. 13.7–12. By stipulating that he must not be put to death on the testimony of a single witness (v. 6b), the law seeks to impose rigorous requirements for evidence even in cases of apostasy. The older law is then subordinated to the new standard of justice: No longer is the execution carried out by the single witness ("your hand," 13.10); rather the agents carrying out the execution are now plural: the hands of the witnesses (v. 7). 2: A man or a woman: The law views the woman as a legally responsible individual. The viewpoint in marriage and family law differs, however (see 22.13–29). 3: Contravening the Decalogue (5.8–9); see 4.19; 2 Kings 23.5; Jer. 8.2. 6: A travesty of the condition for two or more witnesses occurs in the kangaroo court set up by Jezebel to execute Naboth (1 Kings 21.10, 13). The prohibition against execution on the basis of testimony by a single witness is also found at 19.15–16; Num. 35.30.

17.8–13: Justice at the central sanctuary. In the pre-Deuteronomomic period, the local sanctuaries served a judicial function in addition to providing a place for the sacrificial worship of God. In legal pute in your courts—you shall promptly repair to the place that the LORD your God will have chosen,⁹ and appear before the levitical priests, or the magistrate in charge at the time, and present your problem. When they have announced to you the verdict in the case,¹⁰ you shall carry out the verdict that is announced to you from that place that the LORD chose, observing scrupulously all their instructions to you.¹¹ You shall act in accordance with the instructions given you and the ruling handed down to you; you must not deviate from the verdict that they announce to you either to the right or to the left.¹² Should a man act presumptuously and disregard the priest charged with serving there the LORD your God, or the magistrate, that man shall die. Thus you will sweep out evil from Israel:¹³ all the people will hear and be afraid and will not act presumptuously again.

¹⁴If, after you have entered the land that the LORD your God has assigned to you, and taken possession of it and settled in it, you decide, “I will set a king over me, as do all the nations about me,”¹⁵ you shall be free to set a king over yourself, one chosen by the LORD your God. Be sure to set as king over yourself one of your own people; you must not set a foreigner over you, one who is not your kinsman.¹⁶ Moreover, he shall not keep many horses or cases where there was an absence either of physical evidence or of witnesses, no court could make a ruling. Such cases were remanded to divine jurisdiction at the local sanctuary on the assumption that God could determine guilt or innocence without being bound by empirical criteria. The parties to the dispute would swear a judicial oath at the altar, symbolically “before God” (19.17; 1 Kings 8.31–32; see also Exod. 21.6). In special circumstances, a priest might conduct a judicial ordeal (Num. 5.11–31). In both cases, Israelite judicial procedures conform closely to those evident in ancient Babylonian legal collections like The Laws of Hammurabi (§§9, 23, 266, 281) or the Laws of Eshnunna. Deuteronomy’s prohibition of the local sanctuaries (ch 12) therefore created an important local judicial void. The intent of these two laws (17.2–7, 8–13) is to fill the void. Deuteronomy grants the local courts absolute judicial autonomy, extending even to capital cases and to religious matters, on condition that all such cases meet the standard of sufficient evidence (17.2–7). Cases that do not meet that empirical standard, and that once would have been remanded to the local sanctuary for divine resolution, must now be remanded instead to the central sanctuary (17.8–13). Deuteronomy is thus completely consistent in its transformation of sacrifice and in its revolution of the judicial system. The local sphere is completely secularized (12.15–16, 20–25; 17.2–7); the central sanctuary provides the sole legitimate context for either sacrifice (12.13–14, 26–27; 16.2, 5–7a) or divine resolution of ambiguous legal cases (17.8–13). 8: Too baffling for you to decide, going beyond what is possible for human knowledge to resolve. A controversy over homicide, when it is unclear whether the defendant is guilty of murder or manslaughter (Exod. 21.12–14; Num. 35.16–23).

In each of these pairs, the distinction is between premeditated and unintentional offenses. 9: The tribunal at the sanctuary includes both priestly and lay members, assuming that the magistrate refers to a secular official (as in 19.17). The account of Jehoshaphat’s setting up tribunals throughout Judah composed of lay and clerical judges reflects this law (2 Chron. 19.5–11).

17.14–20: The law of the king. Deuteronomy’s conception of the kingship entails an extraordinary restriction of royal authority. Whereas generally Near Eastern monarchs like Hammurabi themselves promulgated law, here the monarch is subject to the law and required to read the Torah daily (v. 19). Conventionally the monarch was assigned a crucial role in the administration of justice, serving as a court of last appeal to defend the rights of the oppressed (Ps. 72.1–4). Deuteronomy remarkably denies the king any role whatsoever in justice, granting the local courts and the central sanctuary complete jurisdiction. The king is also denied his customary Near Eastern role in supervising the public cultus. This law far more emphasizes what the king may not do than what he may do. The remarkable subordination of the king to this Teaching (v. 18)—Deuteronomic Torah—thus envisions something like a constitutional monarchy. This notion exists in some tension to the views of the Deuteronomic historian, who returns the king to his public religious function as Josiah leads the national Passover celebration (2 Kings 23.21–23), and to the royalist concerns of the Chronicler. 14: As do all the nations, see 1 Sam. 8.5. 16–18: The offenses specified here allude to the warnings against royal autocracy outlined at the very founding of the monarchy (1 Sam. 8.10–18). They almost certainly presuppose Solomon’s trade in horses (1 Kings 10.26–29) and his multiple marital alliances with foreign wives (1 Kings 11.1–8). The Deuteronomistic historian under-send people back to Egypt to add to his horses, since the LORD has warned you, “You must not go back that way again.”¹⁷ And he shall not have many wives, lest his heart go astray; nor shall he amass silver and gold to excess.

¹⁸When he is seated on his royal throne, he shall have a copy of this Teaching written for him on a scroll by^a the levitical priests. ¹⁹Let it remain with him and let him read in it all his life, so that he may learn to revere the LORD his God, to observe faithfully every word of this Teaching as well as these laws. ²⁰Thus he will not act haughtily toward his fellows or deviate from the Instruction to the right or to the left, to the end that he and his descendants may reign long in the midst of Israel.

18 The levitical priests, the whole tribe of Levi, shall have no territorial portion with Israel. They shall live only off the LORD’s offerings by fire as their^b portion, ²and shall have no portion among their brother tribes: the LORD is their portion, as He promised them.

stood those marriages to lead to religious syncretism and the corruption of Israelite religion (1 Kings 11.1–8), with the breakup of the united monarchy the divine punishment for these transgressions (1 Kings 11.9–13). 16: People, lit. “the people,” i.e., the Israelites. Back to Egypt to add to his horses: The reference is difficult. Elsewhere, the idea of Israel’s returning to Egypt implies divine punishment and the reimposition of slavery (28.68; Hos. 8.13; 9.3). But here that idea is combined with a veiled critical reference to Judah’s attempt to forge a military alliance with Egypt against Assyria in 701 BCE, when Isaiah challenged “those who go down to Egypt for help/And rely upon horses!” (Isa. 31.1). Since the LORD has warned you, see 28.68 n. 18: The law requires the king to be subject to the law, not above it. The common status of the monarch throughout the ancient Near East as promulgator of the law (as in the Laws of Hammurabi) and as enjoying a special relationship with the divinity (so also Ps. 2) might suggest that the king would be exempt from the law’s requirements. To emphasize its rejection of that norm, Deuteronomy requires the king to have a copy of this Teaching written for him: The king must daily read the law that limits his powers. The literal Hebrew phrase, “a copy of this Teaching (torah),” provides the basis for one of the two ancient Jewish designations of the book. One title is “Sefer Devarim,” “The Book of Words,” short for “The Book of ‘These are the Words . . .’” (based on 1.1). That title follows the common ancient Near Eastern convention of naming books after their opening phrase or incipit. The second ancient rabbinic title, based on this phrase, was “Mishneh Torah” (Sifre §160). This was translated into Greek by Philo and the Septuagint as “Deuteronomion” and is the source of the book’s familiar English title, “Deuteronomy.” That title, however, is based on a misunderstanding of this phrase in 17.18 as referring to Deuteronomy as a whole.

18.1–8: The Levitical priesthood. Centralization of worship also had an impact upon the Israelite priesthood, to which the legislator now turns. Deuteronomy provides a concise “job description” of the priesthood (vv. 1–5) and then addresses the impact of centralization upon its livelihood (vv. 6–8).

1: The phrase levitical priests marks a distinctively Deuteronomic conception of the priesthood, one that significantly differs from that found in the Priestly literature, where “the priests” and “the Levites” are separate from one another. The Priestly source establishes a hierarchy within the tribe of Levi between the direct descendants of Aaron and the rest of the tribe (Num. ch 18). Only the Aaronides are technically called “priests” and thereby permitted to officiate at the altar before God (Num. 18.5, 7). For their support they are assigned the priestly share of the sacrificial offerings brought by Israelites to the sanctuary (Num. 18.8–20). In contrast, the remainder of the tribe, the “Levites,” serve the priests and are prohibited from officiating at the altar (Num. 18.3–4, 6). For their support, they receive the tithes of produce and cattle. In turn, they pay a tithe of what they have received to the priests (Num. 18.21–31). Deuteronomy’s approach is very different. There is no genealogical hierarchy within the tribe; all are deemed equally Levitical priests and are eligible to serve at the altar and to receive sacrifices. The emphatic appositive phrase, the whole tribe of Levi, seems to rule out precisely the hierarchy presupposed by Num. ch 18. It should be stressed, however, that continuing scholarly debate about the dating of the Priestly source makes it very difficult to establish the relative dating and sequence of these two diverging approaches to the priesthood. 2: They shall have no portion: Levi does not participate in the tribal land distribution at the time of the conquest (see Josh. 13.14; Ezek. 44.28). Without their own land allocation, the tribe has no independent means of agricultural support or income. As an alternative, the LORD is their portion: God grants them a share of the sacrificial offer-

³This then shall be the priests' due from the people: Everyone who offers a sacrifice, whether an ox or a sheep, must give the shoulder, the cheeks, and the stomach to the priest. ⁴You shall also give him the first fruits of your new grain and wine and oil, and the first shearing of your sheep. ⁵For the LORD your God has chosen him and his descendants, out of all your tribes, to be in attendance for service in the name of the LORD for all time.

⁶If a Levite would go, from any of the settlements throughout Israel where he has been residing, to the place that the LORD has chosen, he may do so whenever he pleases. ⁷He may serve in the name of the LORD his God like all his fellow Levites who are there in attendance before the LORD. ⁸They shall receive equal shares of the dues, ^awithout regard to personal gifts or patrimonies.^a

⁹When you enter the land that the LORD your God is giving you, you shall not learn to imitate the abhorrent practices of those nations. ¹⁰Let no one be found among you who consigns his son or daughter to the fire, or who is an augur, a soothsayer, a diviner, a sorcerer, ¹¹one who

ings brought to the sanctuary. This system in effect made the Levitical priests completely dependent upon other Israelites for their support. The system must have run into difficulty because the priest-prophet Ezekiel allocates land both to the priests and the Levites in his vision of the future restoration of Judah after the exile (Ezek. 48.10–14). 3: These specific portions of the sacrificial offerings are reserved for the priests. The abuse of this privilege by the greedy sons of Eli led to divine punishment (1 Sam. 2.12–17, 22–36). 5: To be in attendance for service refers technically to officiating at the altar.

6–8: While rejecting any genealogical hierarchy within the tribe, the law anticipates a geographical one and seeks to prevent it. 6: With Deuteronomy's prohibition of local altars (12.8–12; 13–15), the Levites serving at those altars would face sudden unemployment. With no independent land-holding as a means of support, the local Levite would thus become completely destitute. Accordingly, if a Levite would go, from any of the settlements to the central sanctuary in Jerusalem, seeking to serve there as a priest, he must be provided for. 7: The concern is to guarantee the country Levite equal access to the altar. This admonition correctly anticipates that the Levites who had long been stationed at the Jerusalem Temple would hardly welcome such newcomers, fearing that their own income and power would be threatened. The emphasis that each displaced Levite may serve in the name of the LORD his God implies that the countryside altars prohibited by Deuteronomy were not entirely devoted to Canaanite cults, as 12.2–4 asserts. They clearly included sanctuaries officiated over by a priesthood loyal to the God of Israel. 8: Equal shares, the choice meats, grains, and oil assigned the tribe in vv. 3–4. The Deuteronomistic historian, while narrating the accomplishments of Josiah's reform, concedes that the priests at the Temple failed to implement this requirement. The displaced countryside Levites thus became second-class citizens, able to eat only "unleavened bread" (2 Kings 23.9).

18.9–22: The Mosaic prophet.

This section divides into two main paragraphs. The first condemns various types of divination as illegitimate and associates them with the Canaanites (vv. 9–14). The second establishes a uniquely Israelite model of prophecy, patterned after Moses, which understands the prophet to mediate God's word to the people (vv. 15–22). 9–14: Just as the legal corpus prohibits forms of sacrificial worship that it condemns as Canaanite (12.1–4, 29–31; also 7.1–6, 25–26; Exod. 23.24; 34.11–16), so here does it prohibit certain forms of divination, which are repeatedly branded as Canaanite, almost as a refrain (vv. 9, 12, 14). In each case, Deuteronomy consistently requires its own alternative: here, prophecy rather than divination; previously, centralization of worship rather than multiple altar sites (12.5–7). At the same time, the condemnation of the rejected practices as Canaanite warrants further consideration. Strikingly, when divination or necromancy are elsewhere mentioned and even challenged (in sources that do not depend upon this list), there is no accusation or hint that they are foreign or not efficacious. They seem completely Israelite (1 Sam. 28.3–25; Isa. 8.19–22; 29.4). The same applies to the rejected forms of sacrificial worship (see 12.14 n.; 16.21 n.). Indeed, in the seventh century, the generally accepted date of Deuteronomy's composition (see introduction), the Canaanites would no longer have been a live issue. Most likely the authors of the legal corpus represented prior norms as "Canaanite" in order to gain acceptance for their trenchant critique of Israelite popular religion. 10: Consigns . . . to the fire: It is unclear if this refers to child sacrifice, and if so, why this law is included in this context. Who is an augur, a soothsayer . . . The AB sequence of these two initial terms is reversed at the end of the list, in the B'A' of casts spells, or one who consults ghosts or familiar spirits, or one who inquires of the dead. ¹²For anyone who does such things is abhorrent to the LORD, and it is because of these abhorrent things that the LORD your God is dispossessing them before you. ¹³You must be wholehearted with the LORD your God. ¹⁴Those nations that you are about to dispossess do indeed resort to soothsayers and augurs; to you, however, the LORD your God has not assigned the like.

¹⁵The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet from among your own people, like myself; him you shall heed. ¹⁶This is just what you asked of the LORD your God at Horeb, on the day of the Assembly, saying, "Let me not hear the voice of the LORD my God any longer or see this wondrous fire any more, lest I die." ¹⁷Whereupon the LORD said to me, "They have done well in speaking thus. ¹⁸I will raise up a prophet for them from among their own people, like yourself: I will put My words in his mouth and he will speak to them all that I command him; ¹⁹and if anybody fails to heed the words he speaks in My name, I Myself will call him to account. ²⁰But any prophet who presumes to speak in My name an oracle that I did not command him to utter, or who speaks in the name of other gods—that prophet shall die." ²¹And should you ask yourselves, "How can we know that the oracle was not spoken by the LORD?"—²²if the prophet speaks in the name of the LORD and the oracle does not come true, that oracle was not spoken by the LORD; the prophet has uttered it presumptuously: do not stand in dread of him.

"soothsayers and augurs" (v. 14), thereby providing the long list of vv. 10–14 with a frame. The list provides the most comprehensive compilation of such activities in the Bible (Exod. 22.17; Lev. 19.30–31; 20.6, 27; Isa. 8.19). It is no longer possible precisely to identify each of the prohibited forms of divination. Indeed, because the list is so comprehensive, it is unclear whether each term represented a distinct activity still known to the author or whether the list represents more of a scholastic compilation. Sorcerer: reflects the standard Akkadian term for magic ("kishpu"). 11: Who consults ghosts or familiar spirits . . . dead: necromancy, or conjuring the dead (1 Sam. 28.7–15; Isa. 29.4). Popular religion in antiquity devoted extensive attention to communicating with the dead, especially with ancestors, as do many contemporary religions. 12: Abhorrent: This condemnation of necromancy as obnoxious to God is remarkable for what is not said. There is no claim that it is ineffective. The Deuteronomistic historian narrates the ability of the witch of Endor to raise Samuel's ghost on demand (1 Sam. 28.7–25). 15–22: Deuteronomy transforms prophecy, viewing the prophet as the spokesperson of Torah (see 13.2–6 n.) and defining Moses as the paradigmatic prophet. 15: The LORD . . . will raise up: The continuity of prophecy is assured by means of divine election. Other offices achieve their continuity by means of professional training and appointment (as with the judges of 16.18–20; 17.2–13), or dynastically (the king of 17.14–20), or by tribal membership (the Levitical priesthood of vv. 1–8). That God alone appoints the prophet makes the prophet independent of all institutions and able to challenge them. A prophet, while grammatically singular, is distributive in its meaning: "I will repeatedly raise up for you a prophet." More than one prophet is clearly intended. A much later Jewish reinterpretation that was accepted by the Christian church (John 1.21, 45; 6.14; 7.40; Acts 3.22; 7.37) understands the verse to promise a single, messianic prophet at the end of time. Like myself: At Horeb (5.20–30), Moses established the distinctively Israelite model of prophecy as mediating God's word to the people. This model contrasts with the prophet as diviner (vv. 9–14), where the prophet does not represent the God of Israel and where the supernatural communication about the future bears no relation to covenantal law. Thus the prophet, like the king (17.15), should be from among your own people. 16–17: See 5.20–28; Exod. 20.16–18. 18: The prophet's oracles do not originate from other deities, from dead spirits, from skilled manipulation of objects, or from the prophet's own reflections. God instead affirms, I will put My words in his mouth. The prophet reiterates the word of Israel's God. That metaphorical promise is reused in the call narrative of Jeremiah (Jer. 1.9) and then dramatically enacted in Ezekiel's call, where the metaphor is taken literally (Ezek. 2.9–3.3). 20: Having established an Israelite model of prophecy, the law provides two criteria to distinguish true from false prophecy. The first is that the prophet should speak exclusively on behalf of God, and report only God's words. Breach of that rule is a capital offense (Jer. 28.12–17). 21–23: The second criterion makes the fulfillment of a prophet's oracle the measure of its truth. That approach attempts to solve a critical problem: If two prophets each

19 When the LORD your God has cut down the nations whose land the LORD your God is assigning to you, and you have dispossessed them and settled in their towns and homes, ²you shall set aside three cities in the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess. ³You shall survey the distances, and divide into three parts the territory of the country that the LORD your God has allotted to you, so that any manslayer may have a place to flee to.—⁴Now this is the case of the manslayer who may flee there and live: one who has killed another claim to speak on behalf of God yet make mutually exclusive claims—(1 Kings 22.6 versus v. 17; Jer. 27.8 versus 28.2)—how many one decide which prophet speaks the truth? The solution offered is not free of difficulty. If a false prophet is distinguished by the failure of his oracle to come true, then making a decision in the present about which prophet to obey becomes impossible. Nor can this criterion easily be reconciled with 13.3, which concedes that the oracles of false prophets might come true. Finally, the prophets frequently threatened judgment, hoping to bring about repentance (Jer. ch 7; 26.1–6). If the prophet succeeds, and the people repent and thereby avert doom (Jonah chs 3–4), one would assume the prophet to be authentic, since he has accomplished God’s goal of repentance. Yet according to the criteria here (but contrast Jer. 28.9), the prophet who accomplished repentance is nonetheless a false prophet, since the judgment oracle that was proclaimed remains unfulfilled. These texts, with their questions and differences of opinion on such issues, reflect the vigorous debate that took place in Israel about prophecy.

19.1–13: Cities of refuge. Under the old system of clan justice, the kin of a homicide victim assumed the burden of killing the slayer to avenge the death. Deuteronomy limits but cannot eradicate that older system. In cases of murder, the capital punishment is not carried out by the state but by the kinsman (“the blood-avenger,”

v. 12; Num. 35.19, 21). Similarly, while the law can insist that unintentional homicide is not a capital crime, it cannot simply declare the person innocent. It must also provide a city to serve as sanctuary where the avenging kinsman may not enter. The law concedes that it can provide no protection should the avenger overtake the unintentional slayer before he reaches sanctuary (v. 6; cf. Num. 35.26–28).

The literary model for the law may be found in the Book of the Covenant, which stipulated that criminal homicide was a capital crime but exempted unintentional homicide: “He who fatally strikes a man shall be put to death. If he did not do it by design, but it came about by an act of God, I will assign you a place to which he can flee” (Exod. 21.12–13). But should that person have committed murder rather than manslaughter, “you shall take him from My very altar to be put to death” (Exod. 21.14). The coordination of these two laws establishes that the “place” of refuge refers specifically to the “altar” of the sanctuary (so also 1 Kings 1.49–53; 2.28–35). The same Hebrew word (“place” or “site”) also designates the altar in 12.5, 11, 13, 18, 21, 26; Exod. 20.21.

Once centralization declared those local altars illegitimate, Deuteronomy had to update the law of sanctuary. Simply shifting the location of sanctuary from the local to the central sanctuary was clearly not feasible, since the distance for the trip would jeopardize the person needing protection (v. 6). Instead, Deuteronomy retains the local setting of the law but secularizes the site of refuge. No longer the altar but three neutral “cities” are designated to fill the void, with provision made for an additional three when necessary (vv. 8–9). Even the language of the older law is updated. According to the older law, the accidental homicide takes place when “the god deflected his [the slayer’s] hand” (Exod. 21.13, lit.). But that attribution of the accident to the agency of a generic god, following an archaic formula inherited from Near Eastern law, is no longer acceptable even as a cliché of speech. The scrupulous authors of Deuteronomy eliminate the superstitious element and re-define the accident neutrally: “the ax head flies off the handle” (v. 5).

The later Deuteronomistic introduction to the book (4.44) provides a concise summary of the law but understands the six cities to refer to three in Transjordan and three in Israel (4.41–44), rather than as all within the land, three in the present and three in the future (vv. 2, 8–9). The Priestly source correctly recognizes the original cultic basis of the law, which had been rooted in the local altars. It accepts Deuteronomy’s designation of the city as the new sanctuary site but defines those cities as belonging to the Levites (Num. 35.6). It extends the law to non-Israelites and follows 4.41–44 in concluding that three of the six cities are located in Transjordan (Num. 35.13–15). Josh. 20.7–8 reconciles these different reflections of the law of asylum while narrating its enactment at the time of the settlement, following the enumeration of 4.41–44 while conforming to Num. 35.9–34 in selecting cities assigned to the Levites.

19.1: For the formulaic introduction, see 12.29. 4: Who may flee there, more literally, “where he might flee (there),” an exact citation of the older law that requires revision (Exod. 21.13b; translated “to which he can flee” in NJPS). Whereas the law in Exodus refers specifically to the altar at the local sanctuary as the site of refuge, Deuteronomy redefines the word unwittingly, without having been his enemy in the past.⁵ For instance, a man goes with his neighbor into a grove to cut wood; as his hand swings the ax to cut down a tree, the ax-head flies off the handle and strikes the other so that he dies. That man shall flee to one of these cities and live.—⁶ Otherwise, when the distance is great, the blood-avenger, pursuing the manslayer in hot anger, may overtake him and kill him; yet he did not incur the death penalty, since he had never been the other's enemy.⁷ That is why I command you: set aside three cities.

⁸ And when the LORD your God enlarges your territory, as He swore to your fathers, and gives you all the land that He promised to give your fathers—⁹ if you faithfully observe all this Instruction that I enjoin upon you this day, to love the LORD your God and to walk in His ways at all times—then you shall add three more towns to those three.¹⁰ Thus blood of the innocent will not be shed, bringing bloodguilt upon you in the land that the LORD your God is allotting to you.

¹¹ If, however, a person who is the enemy of another lies in wait for him and sets upon him and strikes him a fatal blow and then flees to one of these towns,¹² the elders of his town shall have him brought back from there and shall hand him over to the blood-avenger to be put to death;¹³ you must show him no pity. Thus you will purge Israel of the blood of the innocent,^a and it will go well with you.

¹⁴ You shall not move your countryman's landmarks, set up by previous generations, in the property that will be allotted to you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess.

¹⁵ A single witness may not validate against a person any guilt or blame for any offense that may be committed; a case can be valid only on the testimony of two witnesses or more.^b ¹⁶ If a man appears against another to testify ma-

so that, in the new context, it now refers to one of the three "cities" of vv. 2–3. (The same cited phrase also occurs in the Hebrew of v. 3.) 5: Shall flee to one of these cities: The same key phrase is now explicitly amended to include the city reference. 6: When the distance is great: The formula marks Deuteronomy's updating of older law; see 14.24. In hot anger, lit. "for his heart is incensed." If the kinsman kills the slayer while in hot pursuit, the law is powerless. 8: En- larges your territory: This formula provides a means for updating older law to address present realities (see 12.20; Exod. 34.24). It does so by casting the provision for change as intended from the beginning, rather than something that takes place after the fact. 10: Blood of the innocent, a bold conception of innocence. The law insists that wrongfully killing someone who has unintentionally committed homicide—yet who is innocent of murder—would itself constitute murder! Bloodguilt: Spilling innocent blood defiles the land (see Num. 35.33–34; Deut. 21.1–9). 12: Brought back from there, secularizing the original law of Exod. 21.14, "You shall take him from My very altar." Hand him over to the blood-avenger to be put to death. The law here regulates but does not replace the clan-based system of justice, surrendering the murderer to the kinsman to serve as executioner.

19.14: Boundary marker. The sacrosanct status of a landmark (lit. "boundary marker") was a legal tradition in the ancient Near East (see 27.17; Isa. 5.8; Hos. 5.10; Job 24.2; Prov. 22.28). The verse also marks a topical boundary within the legal corpus and provides a transition marker. In the next law, the legislator will conclude the section devoted to the impact of centralization upon justice.

19.15–21: The integrity of the judicial system. This section, whose theme is the public order (16.18–19.21), began with a law that required probity on the part of the newly established judges (16.18–20). The section therefore appropriately concludes with a law that demands corresponding integrity from witnesses. The two laws thus frame the unit with an inclusio that emphasizes the honesty required of all participants in the judicial system. The same emphasis, symbolizing the legal collection's commitment to justice, is also evident in Near Eastern law (Laws of Hammurabi §§1–5). 15: Validate against a person any guilt or blame for any offense: Heb is even more insistent on the universal application of this law, repeating the "any" before each of the three nouns. A case can be valid . . . two witnesses or more, broadening the specific focus of 17.6 on capital crimes: "A person shall be put to death only on the testimony of two or more witnesses." That principle is here made a universal requirement for justice. It prohibits hearsay or spurious accusation (one person's word against another's) from having any legal liciously and gives false testimony against him,¹⁷ the two parties to the dispute shall appear before the LORD, before the priests or magistrates in authority at the time,¹⁸ and the magistrates shall make a thorough investigation. If the man who testified is a false witness, if he has testified falsely against his fellow,¹⁹ you shall do to him as he schemed to do to his fellow. Thus you will sweep out evil from your midst;²⁰ others will hear and be afraid, and such evil things will not again be done in your midst.²¹ Nor must you show pity: life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

20 When you take the field against your enemies, and see horses and chariots—forces larger than yours—have no fear of them, for the LORD your God, who brought you from the land of Egypt, is with you.² Before you join battle, the priest shall come forward and address the troops.³ He shall say to them, “Hear, O Israel! You are about to join battle with your enemy. Let not your courage falter. Do not be in fear, or in panic, or in dread of them.⁴ For it is the LORD your God who marches with you to do battle for you against your enemy, to bring you victory.”

⁵ Then the officials shall address the troops, as follows:

force whatsoever. 17: Before the LORD, testimony before the altar at the central sanctuary (12.7; 14.23; 17.8–13). 19: You shall do to him [the false witness] as he schemed to do to his fellow: This reciprocal formulation of justice is called “talion,” the technical term for “measure for measure” or “an eye for an eye.” That principle is elsewhere employed in the context of bodily injury or homicide (Exod. 21.23–25; Lev. 24.17–21). It distinguishes crimes against the person (which require talion) from property crimes (where alone financial compensation is permitted). By applying the principle of talion to the category of crimes against the judicial system, the legislators here seek to ensure the integrity of the law by using the highest sanction available to them (see also Laws of Hammurabi §§1–5).

20.1–20: Rules for waging holy war. In contrast to the other biblical legal collections, which include only brief sections concerning military engagement (Exod. 23.23–33;

34.11–16; Num. 34.50–56), Deuteronomy, reflecting a literary setting of Israel about to enter the land, concerns itself extensively with the laws of holy war. Underlying this theology of holy war is the idea that Israel’s God joins the fray as a divine warrior and directly confronts the adversary on behalf of the nation. God’s presence in the military camp imposes additional purity requirements upon the people (23.11–15). Although wars of conquest would normally be waged for the sake of empire building and profit, Israel’s holy war is fought for religious reasons: to extirpate iniquity and to create a covenantal community organized by divine law (Lev. 18.24–29; 20.22–24). Accordingly, the usual seizing of plunder—property, animals, and humans—is prohibited (7.25b; 13.15–17). Throughout the Near East, the kinds of spoils taken in war would include men, for their labor, and women, for labor and child-rearing (v. 11). For that reason, the rules for holy war must stipulate that no prisoners be taken (vv. 16–18; 7.1–5). All the normal spoils of war had to be devoted exclusively to God, like the sacrificial “holocaust” offering (13.17) from which neither priest nor lay Israelite could take any portion (see 12.23–27 n.). Contemporary inscriptions like the Moabite or Mesha Stone (ca. 850 BCE) establish that similar theologies of holy war were shared by a number of nations. In the case of Deuteronomy, it is important to recognize that the conception of the conquest as a holy war represents, paradoxically, a highly schematized idealization, formulated half a millennium after the settlement, at a time when ethnic Canaanites would already long have assimilated into the Israelite population. (See 18.9–14 n.) 1: When you take the field against your enemies: This introductory formula enables the editor to group a series of various laws loosely together (21.10–14; cf. 23.9–14; 24.5). Horses and chariots: The adversary is superior both in numbers and in military equipment (see Exod. 14.9; 15.4; Josh. 11.4). Forces (lit. “people”): Deuteronomy imagines both Israel and the adversary less as a professionally organized army than as an entire nation arrayed for a common purpose. This conception, also reflected in the conquest account in Joshua, is an idealization about the past that is inconsistent with earlier accounts, which represent the settlement as a series of initiatives by individual tribes who achieved very restricted penetration into the land, and who did not act in concert as a unified nation (Judg. 1.18–20, 27–36). The ideal national perspective outlined by Deuteronomy lies behind the account in Joshua. Have no fear of them, for the LORD your God . . . is with you: The narrator, in this introductory formula, summarizes the priest’s oracle of military reassurance in vv. 3–4. 3–4: See 9.1–3; 31.3–6; cf. Exod. 14.14, 25; 15.1–4. 5–9: A reverse muster, designed to thin the ranks. The primary intent is to remove conscripts who may have competing priorities because they are in a transitional state: about to

“Is there anyone who has built a new house but has not dedicated it? Let him go back to his home, lest he die in battle and another dedicate it. ⁶Is there anyone who has planted a vineyard but has never harvested it? Let him go back to his home, lest he die in battle and another harvest it. ⁷Is there anyone who has paid the bride-price for a wife,^a but who has not yet married her? Let him go back to his home, lest he die in battle and another marry her.” ⁸The officials shall go on addressing the troops and say, “Is there anyone afraid and disheartened? Let him go back to his home, lest the courage of his comrades flag like his.” ⁹When the officials have finished addressing the troops, army commanders shall assume command of the troops.

¹⁰When you approach a town to attack it, you shall ^boffer it terms of peace.^b ¹¹If it responds peaceably and lets you in, all the people present there shall serve you at forced labor. ¹²If it does not surrender to you, but would join battle with you, you shall lay siege to it; ¹³and when the LORD your God delivers it into your hand, you shall put all its males to the sword. ¹⁴You may, however, take as your booty the women, the children, the livestock, and everything in the town—all its spoil—and enjoy the use of the spoil of your enemy, which the LORD your God gives you.

¹⁵Thus you shall deal with all towns that lie very far officially begin living in a house that is awaiting occupation; about to make a first harvest; about to complete an engagement with marriage and consummation (vv. 5–7). The importance of “taking possession of” house, vineyard, and wife is evident in their inclusion also in the curses for disobedience (28.30), where they signify dispossession by the enemy. The sequence of the three together symbolizes the home as an entirety. 5: Dedicated (or “inaugurated”): Although Solomon’s dedication of the Temple is narrated (1 Kings ch 8), there are no specific rituals of home dedication recorded in the Bible. The parallel curse employs “live” (28.30). 6: Harvested it, lit. “profaned it”; Priestly law stipulated that newly planted fruit trees were only available for common use in the fifth year (Lev. 19.23–25). 7: Paid the bride-price . . . married: Marriage was a two-step process; see NJPS translators’ note a; 22.23–27 n. Wife: For the order in which “wife” follows “house,” see Exod. 20.14. The wife comes first at 5.18; 28.30. 8: Comrade: The Hebrew employs “brother,” to which Deuteronomy frequently, and distinctively, gives the meaning “fellow citizen.” The same word is elsewhere translated “a fellow Hebrew” (15.12). 11: The use of a defeated people for forced labor was widespread. The earliest narratives within the Deuteronomistic History establish that the Israelites employed the indigenous population of Canaan as such a resource (Judg. 1.27–36). So important was it to the monarchy that David’s cabinet included an official responsible for “forced labor” (2 Sam. 20.24). 15–18: Thus you shall deal with all towns that lie very far from you: The law now retroactively restricts the preceding rules of engagement (vv. 10–14), which tolerate the taking of captives as “forced labor,” so that they apply only to foreign wars. That restriction comes unexpectedly and contradicts the unconditional formulation of v. 10, which imposed no geographical restriction. Moreover, the stipulation that the indigenous population of Canaan should uniformly be exterminated is inconsistent both with the earliest narratives of the settlement and with the administrative list of the monarchy (see v. 11 n.). Most likely, therefore, the law sanctioning the negotiation of peace treaties and the taking of captives (vv. 10–14) originally applied to warfare within Canaan. It preserves the earliest rules of engagement and more closely reflects the actual course of events. The geographical restriction imposed upon the law—nowhere within the law itself but only from the perspective of vv. 15–16—allows the editor to preserve the venerated older law by giving it a new application. The formulaic prohibition against taking prisoners (see 7.1–6; 12.29–31) thus represents a later addition reflecting the 7th century theology of Deuteronomy. The rationale for the literary fiction may be an ex post facto ideal of religious purity at the very historical moment that Judah was in fact a vassal state paying tribute to Assyria (2 Kings 18.7–19.35). 15: The nations hereabout refers to the Canaanites. With that turn of language, the narrator places himself in the land of Canaan (as at 1.1). According to the narrative, however, the nation has not yet entered the land and Moses died before entering Canaan (34.5). Similar anachronisms (2.12b; 3.11; 34.5; Gen. 12.6b) led a few medieval Jewish biblical commentators, like Abraham Ibn Ezra (1089–1164 CE), to recognize that both Deuteronomy and the Torah include substantial post-Mosaic material.

from you, towns that do not belong to nations hereabout. ¹⁶In the towns of the latter peoples, however, which the LORD your God is giving you as a heritage, you shall not let a soul remain alive. ¹⁷No, you must proscribe^a them—the Hittites and the Amorites, the Canaanites and the Perizzites, the Hivites and the Jebusites—as the LORD your God has commanded you, ¹⁸lest they lead you into doing all the abhorrent things that they have done for their gods and you stand guilty before the LORD your God.

¹⁹When in your war against a city you have to besiege it a long time in order to capture it, you must not destroy its trees, wielding the ax against them. You may eat of them, but you must not cut them down. Are trees of the field human to withdraw before you into the besieged city? ²⁰Only trees that you know do not yield food may be destroyed; you may cut them down for constructing siege-works against the city that is waging war on you, until it has been reduced.

21 If, in the land that the LORD your God is assigning you to possess, someone slain is found lying in the open, the identity of the slayer not being known, ²your elders and magistrates shall go out and measure the distances from the corpse to the nearby towns. ³The elders of the town nearest to the corpse shall then take a heifer which has never been worked, which has never pulled in a yoke; ⁴and the elders of that town shall bring the heifer down to an everflowing wadi, which is not tilled or sown. There, in the wadi, they shall break the heifer's neck. ⁵The priests, sons of Levi, shall come forward; for the LORD your God has chosen them to minister to Him and to pronounce blessing in the name of the LORD, and every lawsuit and case of assault^b is subject to their ruling. ⁶Then all the elders of the town nearest to the corpse shall wash their hands over the heifer whose neck was broken in the

There are similar cases involving corpses found between two cities in older Near Eastern law (Laws of Hammurabi §§23–24; Hittite Laws §6), where the primary focus is to clarify whether financial liability exists. Here, in contrast, the sole concern is to atone for the spilled blood of the victim. The law shows evidence of several stages of literary reworking, making it difficult to recover the exact meaning of its rituals. 1: In the open, a technical term, meaning beyond the legal jurisdiction of any particular town (see 22.23, 25). The reference implies the absence of witnesses to identify the culprit. 2: For the judicial role of the elders in cases of homicide, see 19.12; 21.18–21; for the magistrates, see 16.18 n. Measure the distances in order to establish legal jurisdiction, as in the Hittite Laws §6. 3: Never been worked . . . never pulled in a yoke: The heifer's immaturity and physically intact state symbolize the human victim's innocence (similarly, Num. 19.2). 4: Everflowing wadi, lit. "with reliable water" (Amos 5.24), in contrast to unreliable seasonal streams (Jer. 15.18). Break the heifer's neck, nonsacrificial slaughter; sacrifice requires ritual slitting of the throat (see Exod. 13.13; 34.20). 5: The priests, sons of Levi were not mentioned among the officials of v. 2 and play no subsequent role in the law. Their inclusion therefore seems like a later addition, perhaps prompted by the prayer. Every lawsuit and case of assault contrasts with 17.9, where the Levitical priests, officiating at the central sanctuary, had jurisdiction only in cases that could not be resolved locally. The NJPS translation is correct as it stands. The alternative translation mentioned in translators' note b is valid only when the word here properly translated "assault" is combined with another word specifying "skin" (as at 24.8). 6: Wash their hands over the heifer, with no laying on of hands, thus entailing no ritual transfer of culpability from the elders to the animal (contrast Lev. 16.21–22). Instead, the ritual seems symbolically to contrast this

16: In the towns of the latter peoples refers to the Canaanites. 17: You must proscribe them: The Hebrew phrase is elsewhere translated as "doom . . . to destruction" (7.2; 13.16; see also translators' note a). 19–20: Wars often involved the kind of "scorched earth policy" prohibited here (2 Kings 3.19, 25). 20: Siege-works were regularly built against walled cities (1 Sam. 20.15; 2 Kings 25.1). Remnants of Roman siege-works (70–74 CE) remain visible at Masada.

21.1–9: Atonement for an unsolved murder. Since a murder victim's blood tainted the land (Gen. 4.10; Num. 35.33–34), it was imperative to "purge Israel of the blood of the innocent" (19.13). This law therefore addresses the difficulty of how to do so when the perpetrator cannot be identified.

wadi. ⁷ And they shall make this declaration: “Our hands did not shed this blood, nor did our eyes see it done. ⁸ Absolve, O LORD, Your people Israel whom You redeemed, and do not let guilt for the blood of the innocent remain among Your people Israel.” And they will be absolved of bloodguilt. ⁹ Thus you will remove from your midst guilt for the blood of the innocent, for you will be doing what is right in the sight of the LORD.

¹⁰ When you take the field against your enemies, and the LORD your God delivers them into your power and you take some of them captive, ¹¹ and you see among the captives a beautiful woman and you desire her and would take her to wife, ¹² you shall bring her into your house, and she shall trim her hair, pare her nails, ¹³ and discard her captive's garb. She shall spend a month's time in your house lamenting her father and mother; after that you may come to her and possess her, and she shall be your wife. ¹⁴ Then, should you no longer want her, you must release her outright. You must not sell her for money: since you had your will of her, you must not enslave her.

slaughter with that of the human victim. 7: Our hands . . . nor did our eyes see it done: The formula extends the notion of responsibility from direct (our hands) to indirect: mere failure to avert or report a witnessed crime (cf. Lev. 5.1). 8: Absolve, O LORD: The extended ritual of vv. 3–6 has no intrinsic efficacy; prayer is the means of absolution. Your people Israel: The verse's double reference to the nation drives home that the frame of reference is no longer the “elders of the town nearest to the corpse” (v. 6) but the people's collective responsibility (19.10, 13). The prayer has a chiasmic structure: “Absolve . . . your people Israel . . . your people Israel . . . will be absolved” (AB:B'A). And they will be absolved, better, “so that they may be absolved.” The verse's literary symmetry and grammar together establish that absolution ultimately depends upon divine action, not human ritual.

21.10–25.19: Miscellaneous criminal, civil, and family laws. The following laws are concerned with individual family, civil, and ethical issues; in comparison, the preceding section was more broadly concerned with the system of worship, the judicial procedures, and the public administration of the nation as a whole. Laws extending legal protection to women in contexts where they would otherwise be disenfranchised concern female captives (21.10–14), the property rights of the less-favored wife (21.15–17), and false charges of infidelity (22.13–19).

21.10–14: Legal obligations toward female captives. In light of 20.10–18, the law would apply only to female captives taken in wars outside of the land; most likely, however, it also applied to the Canaanite population (20.15–18 n.). Female war captives routinely became concubines of their captors. This law regulates that convention and accords such women dignity and protection against enslavement. 12–13: The rituals provide both captive and captor means to effect a transition from one status to another.

13: A month's time, the full mourning period, as for Aaron and Moses (Num. 20.29; Deut. 34.8). Lamenting: Contextually it is unclear whether the captive's parents actually died in the war or are mourned as lost to her because of her captivity. The prescribed time to grieve implies legal respect for the female captive as a person.

13: Come to her sexually; consummation provides the legal means for her to become your wife.

14: Manumission to protect female concubines from being sold as slaves is also prescribed at Exod. 21.7–8. Had your will of her, more specifically, “violated her” sexually (22.24, 29; Gen. 34.2; Judg. 19.24; 2 Sam. 13.12).

21.15–17: Legal protection of the less-favored wife. The law uses the norm of primogeniture (Gen. 25.29–34; Laws of Hammurabi §§165–70) to protect the son of the less-favored wife from disinheritance. 17: Double portion, two-thirds (see Zech. 13.8), leaving one third for the other son. The birthright, the technical legal term for the preferential share of the inheri-

²² If a man is guilty of a capital offense and is put to death, and you impale him on a stake, ²³ you must not let his corpse remain on the stake overnight, but must bury him the same day. For an impaled body is an affront to God: you shall not defile the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess.

22 If you see your fellow’s ox or sheep gone astray, do not ignore it; you must take it back to your fellow. ² If your fellow does not live near you or you do not know who he is, you shall bring it home and it shall remain with you until your fellow claims it; then you shall give it back to him. ³ You shall do the same with his ass; you shall do the same with his garment; and so too shall you do with anything that your fellow loses and you find: you must not remain indifferent.

⁴ If you see your fellow’s ass or ox fallen on the road, do not ignore it; you must help him raise it.

tance. Ironically, the foundation narratives concerning Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph subvert the legal norm here affirmed (Gen. 17.15–22; 21.8–14; 27.1–40; 48.8–22).

21.18–21: The rebellious son. The Decalogue requirement to honor the parents (5.16; Exod. 20.12) carries no explicit sanction; here flagrant and sustained disobedience is a capital offense. Nevertheless, the Rabbis (m. Sanh. 8) attenuated the force of this law by making the son’s violation much more stringent than the text suggests, essentially eliminating cases in which the penalty would apply. The law becomes, then, an ideal law teaching respect for parents. Other Near

Eastern law collections included similar laws but did not require capital punishment (Law of Hammurabi §195). This law concerning sons should be read in tandem with the law concerning daughters in 22.13–21. 18: Not heed his father or mother: The Heb more emphatically ascribes equal authority to each parent: “obey either his father or his mother.” Discipline: The term extends to physical measures such as flogging (1 Kings 12.11). 19: The elders functioned as judges of family law and held court at the city gate, which served as a public forum (22.15; 25.7; Job. 29.7; Ruth 4.1–2, 11; Lam. 5.14). This system contrasts with the professionalized judiciary established at the same site (16.18), which may specifically have had jurisdiction over religious and criminal law (17.2–7). 21: In contrast to 13.14 and 17.4, no investigation is required; only parental testimony. Stone him, see 13.10 n.

21.22–23: Treatment of the executed. Public exposure of the corpse of an executed criminal, which was not the norm, was a form of reproach directed against enemies of the state (Josh. 8.29; 10.26; 1 Sam. 31.10; Esth. 9.6–14). Out of respect for the body, to prevent it from serving as carrion (2 Sam. 21.10), this law sets stringent limits to that procedure. The law applies to Israelites and non-Israelites alike (Josh. 8.29; 10.27). 22: Impale him on a stake: The Hebrew phrase may also mean death caused by hanging from a tree or gallows, or suspending someone who has already been executed from a pole or gallows (Josh. 10.26; Esth. 9.11–14).

22.1–12: Various moral and religious responsibilities of citizenship. The rationale for the sequence and selection of these laws is often unclear.

22.1–4: Moral duties toward the neighbor. Two laws (vv. 1–3, 4) that develop, in sequence, two corresponding laws from the earlier Covenant Collection. 1–3: The earlier law governing the return of wandering animals (Exod. 21.1–3) is here revised and extended in its application. 1: Your fellow’s ox, in contrast to “your enemy’s ox” (Exod. 23.4). 3: Anything: The earlier law has now been universalized to apply to any lost property, even that which cannot independently have “gone astray” (v. 1). You must not remain indifferent: The law makes a moral appeal to conscience but possesses no legal sanction. 4: Reworking Exod. 23.5 to emphasize the neighbor, as in v. 1.

22.5–12: Miscellaneous laws. 5: The prohibition against cross-dressing likely seeks to maintain ⁶If, along the road, you chance upon a bird's nest, in any tree or on the ground, with fledglings or eggs and the mother sitting over the fledglings or on the eggs, do not take the mother together with her young. ⁷Let the mother go, and take only the young, in order that you may fare well and have a long life.

⁸When you build a new house, you shall make a parapet for your roof, so that you do not bring bloodguilt on your house if anyone should fall from it.

⁹You shall not sow your vineyard with a second kind of seed, else the crop—from the seed you have sown—and the yield of the vineyard may not be used. ¹⁰You shall not plow with an ox and an ass together. ¹¹You shall not wear cloth combining wool and linen.

¹³A man marries a woman and cohabits with her. Then he takes an aversion to her ¹⁴and makes up charges against her and defames her, saying, "I married this woman; but when I approached her, I found that she was not a virgin." ¹⁵In such a case, the girl's father and mother shall produce the evidence of the girl's virginity before the elders of the town at the gate. ¹⁶And the girl's father shall gender boundaries; a similar concern for boundaries is evident in vv. 10–12. In none of these cases is it possible to recover the original social or religious context and rationale for these laws. 6–7: The respect for the life of other creatures here parallels that shown for the integrity of the natural environment even in the context of war (20.19–20). Desire to avoid the simultaneous consumption of two generations of the same creature is also evident in other laws (14.21; Exod. 23.19; 34.26; Lev. 22.28). 7: To elicit compliance, the legislator makes an appeal to enlightened self-interest; as in v. 3, there is no legal sanction for non-compliance. 8: The roof was used as living space (Josh. 2.6; Judg. 3.20–25; 2 Sam. 11.2). Bloodguilt defines the negligence in criminal rather than civil terms, with the implication that the offense is capital (see 19.10 n.). For other examples of criminal negligence, see Exod. 21.29 and, also involving liability for faulty construction, Laws of Hammurabi §229. 9–10: Corresponding to Lev. 19.19, these laws attempt to maintain specific boundaries between categories seen as incompatible (as in v. 5; 14.3–20). The rationale for the specific examples selected, however, is hard to establish. 9: May not be used, lit. becomes "set apart" or "holy"; that is, not permitted for human consumption. 12: Tassels: No reason is given for this requirement, although the law receives a theological rationale at Num. 15.37–40. Since Neo-Assyrian palace reliefs distinguish royalty by their fringed garments, it may symbolize the application of a royal dress code to the nation as a whole. The command's original intention was that the tassels were to be worn in full view. Only during the persecution of the Middle Ages did the practice develop of wearing tassels (the "tallit katan") underneath the clothing. Based on this law and its parallel in Numbers, rabbinic law requires that a tasseled shawl (tallit) be worn during certain prayers. Yourself: Here, the requirement is not explicitly restricted to males. One side of a rabbinic debate on the issue argued that women, too, are to wear tassels, although the majority view exempted women from this requirement (see Sifre Numbers §115; b. Menah. 43a).

22.13–23.1: Violations of marriage law. In the ancient Near East, marriage was a contractual relationship. A woman, regarded in terms of her relation to her father or her husband, could not act independently. There was little conception of the woman as a free agent, either in legal or sexual terms. She remained in the household of her father until a suitor paid a bride-price (v. 28–29; Exod. 22.15–16) to compensate the father for the reduction of the household. At that point she became formally engaged in the sense of legally contracted for, although still living "under her father's authority" (v. 21; lit. "in her father's house"). Later, at the marriage feast, the union was consummated (Gen. 29.22–25) and the woman took up residence in the household of her husband. The following laws presuppose these contractual norms and terminology. 13–21: False accusation of breach of marital contract. 13: Cohabits with her to consummate the marriage sexually (as 21.13). Takes an aversion to her, cf. 21.15. 14: Makes up charges against her: His reason for using this option to end the relation may well be mercenary. Displeasure with a wife provided grounds for divorce (24.1), but divorce would almost certainly have required the man to provide financial support, as presupposed by the requirement for a "bill of divorce" (24.3; Isa. 50.1; Jer. 3.8; cf. Exod. 21.10) and stipulated by Near Eastern law (Laws of Hammurabi §§137–40). In contrast, the slander, I found that she was not a virgin, would entail the refund of the bride-price and payment of a penalty for breach of contract. 15: The evidence sought is the blood-stained cloth of v. 17. For a different approach to a charge of say to the elders, “I gave this man my daughter to wife, but he has taken an aversion to her; ¹⁷ so he has made up charges, saying, ‘I did not find your daughter a virgin.’ But here is the evidence of my daughter’s virginity!” And they shall spread out the cloth before the elders of the town. ¹⁸ The elders of that town shall then take the man and flog him, ¹⁹ and they shall fine him a hundred [shekels of] silver and give it to the girl’s father; for the man has defamed a virgin in Israel. Moreover, she shall remain his wife; he shall never have the right to divorce her.

²⁰ But if the charge proves true, the girl was found not to have been a virgin, ²¹ then the girl shall be brought out to the entrance of her father’s house, and the men of her town shall stone her to death; for she did a shameful thing in Israel, committing fornication while under her father’s authority. Thus you will sweep away evil from your midst.

²³ In the case of a virgin who is “engaged to a man”—if a man comes upon her in town and lies with her, ²⁴ you shall take the two of them out to the gate of that town and stone them to death: the girl because she did not cry for help in the town, and the man because he violated another man’s wife. Thus you will sweep away evil from your midst. ²⁵ But if the man comes upon the engaged girl in the open country, and the man lies with her by force, only the man who lay with her shall die, ²⁶ but you shall do infidelity, see Num. 5.11–31. Elders of the town at the gate, see 16.18 n.; 21.19 n. 17: The cloth upon which husband and wife slept upon consummation of the relationship. There is scant medical support for the underlying assumptions: that intercourse would cause the first perforation of the hymen and that such perforation would cause bleeding upon the bedding, which is here held up in public display as legal evidence. 18: Flog him, the same Hebrew word as “discipline him” (21.18); it may refer to flogging or simply to the following fine. 19: They shall fine him: The penalty for his slanderous accusation is financial, although the penalty for her infidelity, if proven true, is capital (vv. 20–21). This disproportion seriously conflicts with Deuteronomy’s requirement that “you shall do to the false witness just as the false witness had meant to do to the other” (19.19). A hundred shekels, about 1.1 kg (2.5 lbs), is twice the fine for rape (v. 29).

21: Entrance of her father’s house, the very site of the offense. Stone her to death, see 13.11 n. Shameful thing in Israel, a violation of basic community sexual and religious norms (Gen. 34.7; Josh. 7.15; Judg. 19.23–34; 20.6, 10). Sweep away evil, see 13.5 n.

22.22–23.1: Adultery and rape. The editors’ placement of these laws suggests their concern to establish sex and family law as an independent moral category. In so doing, the authors of Deuteronomy depart from the earlier legal system of the Covenant Collection. There, the law of the seduced virgin (Exod. 22.15–16) came at the end of a sequence of property law (Exod. 21.35–22.14), implying that the daughter was seen as an extension of her father’s estate. In contrast, the corresponding law found here (22.28–29) concludes a series of similar laws (22.13–23.1); there is no longer any connection to property law (see also 5.18 n.).

22: Adultery is a violation of the seventh commandment (5.17) and a capital offense (Lev. 18.20; 20.10). Both of them . . . shall die: This stipulation makes a sharp contrast with ancient Near Eastern legal norms, which required the adulterer’s death but left the fate of the adulterous wife to the disposition of her husband. That the wife is here removed from the authority of the husband defines her as a legal person who is accountable for her actions. 23–27: Two laws determining the woman’s culpability (vv. 23–24) or nonculpability (vv. 25–27) in cases of rape. The distinction hangs upon the expectation of protest to express refusal (v. 24). 23: Engaged to a man (cf. v. 25): This specification of legal status permits the transition from adultery to rape: Although the woman still resides with her father, she is contractually bound to her future husband (see translators’ note a-a). In town, where there are potential witnesses. The contrast with “in the open country” (v. 25) symbolically determines the availability or unavailability of witnesses who could testify or come to the rescue. Similarly, Middle Assyrian Laws §A 12 (ca. 1076 BCE). 24: Cry for help: The fabrication of such a cry in the false accusation against Joseph therefore has legal significance (Gen. 39.14–15). 25: The assault in the open country, where witnesses are unlikely, suggests planned malice. 26: For this case is like: A distinctive cross-reference to another legal case (19.11–13), used to make an argunothing to the girl. The girl did not incur the death penalty, for this case is like that of a man attacking another and murdering him. ²⁷He came upon her in the open; though the engaged girl cried for help, there was no one to save her.

²⁸If a man comes upon a virgin who is not engaged and he seizes her and lies with her, and they are discovered, ²⁹the man who lay with her shall pay the girl's father fifty [shekels of] silver, and she shall be his wife. Because he has violated her, he can never have the right to divorce her.

23 No man shall marry his father's former wife, so as ^ato remove his father's garment.^a ²No one whose testes are crushed or whose member is cut off shall be admitted into the congregation of the LORD.

³No one misbegotten^b shall be admitted into the congregation of the LORD; none of his descendants, even in the tenth generation, shall be admitted into the congregation of the LORD.

ment from analogy. A man attacking another and murdering him: This case is determined to be analogous to the one involving premeditated murder. The law understands rape as a criminal assault against the woman rather than as a sex crime. 28–29: The seizure and rape of a virgin who is not engaged, the enforced marriage, and the prohibition of divorce correspond to Middle Assyrian Laws §A 55. The law also follows the literary model of Exod. 22.16–17, which specifies sexual intercourse with, but not forced rape of, a "virgin who is not engaged." The conflation of the two different models makes it unclear whether or not this law refers to consensual intercourse. 28: Seizes her: The Hebrew word differs from that in v. 25, where force is clearly intended; here it may mean simply "hold" or "handle" (Jer. 2.8). And lies with her, as in Exod. 22.15. The fact of intercourse normally marks legal consummation of a marriage; here it places the woman in a legally ambiguous position, unavailable to others (v. 14). 29: Fifty . . . silver: In contrast to Exod. 22.15–16, the payment to the father does not represent compensation for the loss of the bride-price, which is normally a negotiated amount (Gen. 34.12). As a fixed amount externally imposed by the law, the payment here seems closer to a fine (v. 19), paid for the woman's violation. As in Exod. 22.16, the law requires the man now also legally and contractually to marry the woman by paying the bride-price to the father. In contrast to Exod. 22.16, the father's consent is not sought. Postbiblical Jewish law granted both the father and the daughter the right to refuse such marriages. 23.1: A transition from marriage law to the next section, which resembles the previous one in form (prohibition) and content (prohibited sexual relations). The Hebrew chapter division reflects the law's closer connection to what follows. Father's former wife presupposes the death of the father and almost certainly refers to the widowed stepmother, not the birth mother (see Lev. 18.7–8). Remove his father's garment: The intent is to respect the sexual privacy of the father and to avoid even indirect sexual contact with him (Gen. 9.23–24; 49.4; Lev. 18.8; 20.11).

23.2–9: Restrictions on access to Israel's assembly. The congregation of the LORD (v. 2) served as the national governing body, akin to a popular legislature, that was charged with a broad range of judicial, political, and policy matters (Judg. 20.2). 2: Testes . . . member: Thus covering any physical damage to the male genitalia. Deuteronomy here seems to impose the same physiological qualification for membership in the assembly that the Holiness Collection requires of the priesthood (Lev. 21.17–23; see also Deut. 14.2 n.). Alternatively, eunuchs may be here excluded for reasons of their cultural association, since they served as officials in Near Eastern bureaucracies. 3: Misbegotten, the offspring of a marriage viewed as incestuous (see vv. 1, 4; Lev. 18.6–18; translators' note b). Tenth generation, see v. 4 n. 4–9: The restriction on access to Israel's national assembly does not entail denial of residence rights. Those named retain the protection afforded by the legal status of "resident alien" (see 1.16; 5.14; Lev. 19.10, 33–34; 23.22). It is likely, however, that those excluded could not marry within the community, and could not enter the Temple precincts. 4–7: These laws were reused in the postexilic context to prohibit intermarriage (Ezra chs 9–10; Neh. 13.1–3). 4: Ammonite or Moabite, perhaps introduced after v. 3 because of an older tradition concerning their incestuous origins (Gen. 19.30–38). Tenth generation, "forever," as congregation of the LORD,⁵ because they did not meet you with food and water on your journey after you left Egypt, and because they hired Balaam son of Beor, from Pethor of Aram-naharaim, to curse you.—⁶ But the LORD your God refused to heed Balaam; instead, the LORD your God turned the curse into a blessing for you, for the LORD your God loves you.—⁷ You shall never concern yourself with their welfare or benefit as long as you live.

⁸You shall not abhor an Edomite, for he is your kinsman. You shall not abhor an Egyptian, for you were a stranger in his land. ⁹Children born to them may be admitted into the congregation of the LORD in the third generation.^a ¹⁰When you go out as a troop against your enemies, be on your guard against anything untoward. ¹¹If anyone among you has been rendered unclean by a nocturnal emission, he must leave the camp, and he must not reenter the camp. ¹²Toward evening he shall bathe in water, and at sundown he may reenter the camp. ¹³Further, there shall be an area for you outside the camp, where you may relieve yourself. ¹⁴With your gear you shall have a spike, and when you have squatted you shall dig a hole with it and cover up your excrement. ¹⁵Since the LORD your God moves about in your camp to protect you and to deliver your enemies to you, let your camp be holy; let Him not find anything unseemly among you and turn away from you.

¹⁶You shall not turn over to his master a slave who seeks refuge with you from his master. ¹⁷He shall live with you in any place he may choose among the settlements in your midst, wherever he pleases; you must not ill-treat him.

¹⁸No Israelite woman shall be a cult prostitute, nor shall any Israelite man be a cult prostitute. ¹⁹You shall not bring the fee of a whore or the pay of a dog^b into the house explicitly stated in the Hebrew. 5: The rationale, which could be a late addition, substantially varies from the earlier report that Israel detoured around Ammon without requesting assistance and received food and water from Moab (2.19, 29, 37). Balaam, see Num. chs 22–24. 8: Not abhor an Edomite: The retention of this exhortation is extraordinary, since the Edomites participated in the destruction of Jerusalem (Ps. 137.7; Obadiah; cf. Amos 1.11). Kinsman, through Esau (Gen. 25.24–26; 36.1). Egyptian: This equally remarkable injunction must reflect stories about Egypt as a site of sanctuary (Gen. chs 12; 37–50), while managing to overlook the enslavement (26.6; 28.60, 68; Exod. chs 1–15).

23.10–15: Special rules for the military camp. These laws move forward from the rules determining the composition of the assembly to the special rules that apply to the military camp. The focus is no longer on the rules of engagement (20.1–20; 21.10–14) but rather personal hygiene. The theology of holy war assumes God's direct participation in the campaign (7.17–24; 20.4), creating a demand for heightened purity such as was demanded of the entire people at Sinai (Exod. 19.10, 14). Sexual abstinence seems also to have been required (1 Sam. 21.4–5; 2 Sam. 11.8–11; cf. Exod. 19.15). 10–11: Cf. Lev. 15.16–18. 13: Area for you outside the camp, a latrine. These laws are reused in the Dead Sea Scrolls (War Scroll; Temple Scroll), each of which also specifies the exact distance of the latrine from the camp. 15: Moves about, see 20.4; 31.6. Anything unseemly, as in 24.1.

23.16–25.19: The heightened moral responsibilities of the covenant community. The text moves forward from membership (vv. 2–9) and military camp rules (vv. 10–15) to broader ethical and religious norms imposed upon Israel.

23.16–17: Prohibition against the return of escaped slaves. The law rejects the almost universal stipulation within ancient Near Eastern law that escaped slaves must be returned to their owner, usually under penalty of death, and that rewards bounty hunters for their return (Laws of Hammurabi §§16–20; Hittite Laws §§22–24). 17: The extraordinary fivefold repetition of phrases designating the location of residence emphasizes that the entire community must be open to them.

23.18–19: Restrictions on prostitution. These verses presuppose the inevitability of prostitution, while regulating it in such a way as to preserve the Temple's sanctity. 18: Cult prostitute: The translation reflects the widely held belief in the existence of sacred prostitution in Israel and the ancient Near of the LORD your God in fulfillment of any vow, for both are abhorrent to the LORD your God.

²⁰You shall not deduct interest from loans to your countrymen, whether in money or food or anything else that can be deducted as interest; ²¹but you may deduct interest from loans to foreigners. Do not deduct interest from loans to your countrymen, so that the LORD your God may bless you in all your undertakings in the land that you are about to enter and possess.

²²When you make a vow to the LORD your God, do not put off fulfilling it, for the LORD your God will require it of you, and you will have incurred guilt; ²³whereas you incur no guilt if you refrain from vowing. ²⁴You must fulfill what has crossed your lips and perform what you have voluntarily vowed to the LORD your God, having made the promise with your own mouth.

²⁵When you enter another man's vineyard, you may eat as many grapes as you want, until you are full, but you must not put any in your vessel. ²⁶When you enter another man's field of standing grain, you may pluck ears with your hand; but you must not put a sickle to your neighbor's grain.

24 A man takes a wife and possesses her. She fails to please him because he finds something obnoxious about her, and he writes her a bill of divorcement, hands it to her, and sends her away from his house; ²she leaves his household and becomes the wife of another man; ³then this latter man rejects her, writes her a bill of divorcement, hands it to her, and sends her away from his house; or the man who married her last dies. ⁴Then the first husband who divorced her shall not take her to wife again, since

East, for which there is scant evidence. Heb "kedesha" here more likely serves as a standard euphemism for the coarser term for a regular prostitute that appears in v. 19. The same alternation between the two terms appears in the narrative of Tamar, whom Judah privately regards as a "whore" but who is publicly referred to as a "kedesha" (Gen. 38.15, 21). The word might better be translated as "one set aside." 19: Dog, in context, the male counterpart to a common female prostitute. To maintain holiness, the law proscribes the donation of income gained from prostitution to the Temple (cf. Hos. 4.14; Mic. 1.7).

23.20–26: Laws of financial ethics, vows, gathering by the needy. 20–21: As Israelites must not sexually exploit one another (vv. 18–19), so must they avoid economic exploitation. This law builds on Exod. 22.25, which clarifies that, in this economy, lending served primarily as a means of social support for "the poor among you" (similarly Lev. 25.36–37). Charging interest would amount to profiteering from the misfortunes of others. 21: Foreigners, as distinct from the "resident alien" or "stranger," who fully participated in Israel's social welfare system (5.14; 14.29; 16.11; 24.14, 17, 19, 20, 21; for similar distinctions, see 15.3; Lev. 25.44–45). 22–24: A vow (v. 22) promises payment to God (usually a sacrifice at a temple) for granting a petitioner's request (see 1 Sam. 1.11). The cautious reserve expressed here closely corresponds to wisdom teachings (Eccl. 5.4–6). The precedent of stories like Jephthah's vow (Judg. 11.29–40) trenchantly explains such reserve. For a more positive view, see Ps. 50.14. 25–26: These rules prohibit exploitation of Deuteronomy's extensive support system for the needy (14.28–29; 24.19–22; 25.4). 26: Pluck . . . hand, to address immediate hunger (illustrated in a later period in Luke 6.1; cf. Matt. 12.1; Mark 2.23).

24.1–22: The chapter, like the previous one, begins with a restriction on marriage and concludes by stipulating care for those in need. 1–4: This complex law, theologically applied by two prophets (Isa. 50.1; Jer. 3.1, 8), addresses only the specific case of remarriage after divorce to a wife who subsequently married another; it does not prohibit remarriage in general. No general laws of either marriage or divorce survive from ancient Israel; biblical law includes only special cases that raise particular ethical or religious issues. 1: Male-initiated divorce was the norm, though there is some evidence in the Near East and in the Jewish Elephantine papyri (5th century BCE) of marriage contracts permitting either party to initiate proceedings (cf. Exod. 21.10–11). He finds . . . about her, a legal formula used to charge someone with disloyal action or betrayal of trust (1 Sam. 29.3, 6, 8; 2 Kings 17.4; cf. 1 Sam. 12.5). Obnoxious, "unseemly" (23.15). It is unclear from the term, whose exact meaning is debated in early Jewish texts, what valid criteria for divorce were. Bill of divorcement, legally freeing her to remarry (22.14 n.). 4: Since she has been defiled, not in general, since she is permitted to remarry, she has been defiled^a—for that would be abhorrent to the LORD. You must not bring sin upon the land that the LORD your God is giving you as a heritage.

⁵When a man has taken a bride, he shall not go out with the army or be assigned to it for any purpose; he shall be exempt one year for the sake of his household, to give happiness to the woman he has married.

⁶A handmill or an upper millstone shall not be taken in pawn, for that would be taking someone's life in pawn.

⁷If a man is found to have kidnapped a fellow Israelite, enslaving him or selling him, that kidnapper shall die; thus you will sweep out evil from your midst.

⁸In cases of a skin affection^b be most careful to do exactly as the levitical priests instruct you. Take care to do as I have commanded them. ⁹Remember what the LORD your God did to Miriam on the journey after you left Egypt.^c ¹⁰When you make a loan of any sort to your countryman, you must not enter his house to seize his pledge.

¹¹You must remain outside, while the man to whom you made the loan brings the pledge out to you. ¹²If he is a needy man, you shall not go to sleep in his pledge; ¹³you must return the pledge to him at sundown, that he may sleep in his cloth and bless you; and it will be to your merit before the LORD your God.

¹⁴You shall not abuse a needy and destitute laborer, whether a fellow countryman or a stranger in one of the communities of your land. ¹⁵You must pay him his wages on the same day, before the sun sets, for he is needy and urgently depends on it; else he will cry to the LORD against you and you will incur guilt.

¹⁶Parents shall not be put to death for children, nor children be put to death for parents: a person shall be put to death only for his own crime.

¹⁷You shall not subvert the rights of the stranger or the fatherless; you shall not take a widow's garment in pawn.

¹⁸Remember that you were a slave in Egypt and that the LORD your God redeemed you from there; therefore do I enjoin you to observe this commandment.

but specifically as regards relations with her first husband. 5: Another of the rules for holy war (20.1–20; 21.10–14; 23.10–15). Newly married: Contrast the premarital deferral from service in 20.7. To give happiness to, including conjugal joy.

6: The law prohibits oppression in economic relations (like vv. 10–15). Taken . . . in pawn, held as collateral for a loan. Handmill . . . upper millstone: Like the garment taken as "pledge" in vv. 10–12, they lack significant intrinsic value but are essential to survival; thus, only as incentive for repayment would they be taken in pawn. The law prohibits such activity as extortion. 7: Restricts the application of Exod. 21.16 to kidnappers of fellow Israelites; perhaps also an interpretation of Deut. 5.17 (cf. Laws of Hammurabi §14; Hittite Laws §§19–21). 8–9: Remember . . . Miriam, see Num. 12.1–15. Skin affection, not leprosy but an unidentified inflammation; see Lev. chs 13–14. 10–13: Expands upon Exod. 22.25–26 (cf. Amos. 2.8; Prov. 20.16; 22.27; 27.13; Job 22.6). As in Exodus, the pledge refers to a garment. The Yavneh Yam inscription, a recently excavated legal petition written on a pottery sherd from the late 7th century BCE, deals with a similar case. 14–15: See Exod. 22.21–24; Lev. 19.13. Israel's ethics are based upon the conviction that God identifies with and vindicates the oppressed. 14: The prohibition against economic exploitation applies equally to the non-Israelite; it is not contingent upon ethnicity or nationality (see 1.16 n.). 16: This law, restricting punishment to the responsible individual, applies specifically to civil and criminal law; it is cited in 2 Kings 14.6. In contrast, collective responsibility for wrongdoing operates in the realm of offenses against God (5.9–10; Exod. 34.7; Num. 16.31–33; Josh. 7.24–25; 2 Sam. 21.1–9). That theological principle was subsequently brought into conformity with the law of individual liability (7.10; Jer. 31.29–30; Ezek. ch 18). 17: You shall not subvert the rights, identical to the comprehensive "You shall not judge unfairly" (16.19). This law, therefore, ensures full judicial protection of the most vulnerable members of the community, the stranger (or "resident alien") and the fatherless. Take . . . in pawn, better, "seize" or "distrain" to force payment (see Job 24.3). This law accords the widow special protection; for day laborers, the garment could be taken but must be returned daily (vv. 10–13). 18: See 15.15. 19–22: Lev. 19.9–10; 23.22. The story of Ruth, both widow and alien, presupposes

a sheaf in the field, do not turn back to get it; it shall go to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow—in order that the LORD your God may bless you in all your undertakings.

²⁰When you beat down the fruit of your olive trees, do not go over them again; that shall go to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. ²¹When you gather the grapes of your vineyard, do not pick it over again; that shall go to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. ²²Always remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt; therefore do I enjoin you to observe this commandment.

25 When there is a dispute between men and they go to law, and a decision is rendered declaring the one in the right and the other in the wrong—²if the guilty one is to be flogged, the magistrate shall have him lie down and be given lashes in his presence, by count, as his guilt warrants. ³He may be given up to forty lashes, but not more, lest being flogged further, to excess, your brother be degraded before your eyes.

⁴You shall not muzzle an ox while it is threshing.

⁵When brothers dwell together and one of them dies and leaves no son, the wife of the deceased shall not be married to a stranger, outside the family. Her husband's brother shall unite with her: he shall take her as his wife and perform the levir's duty. ⁶The first son that she bears shall be accounted to the dead brother, that his name may not be blotted out in Israel. ⁷But if the man does not want to marry his brother's widow, his brother's widow shall appear before the elders in the gate and declare, "My husband's brother refuses to establish a name in Israel for his brother; he will not perform the duty of a levir." ⁸The elders of his town shall then summon him and talk to him. If he insists, saying, "I do not want to marry her," ⁹his brother's widow shall go up to him in the presence of the elders, pull the sandal off his foot, spit in his face, and make this declaration: Thus shall be done to the man who will not build up his brother's house! ¹⁰And he shall go in Israel by the name of "the family of the unsandaled one."

such laws, which assign harvest gleanings to the needy, allowing them to eat without begging for food. 20: Beat, with poles, so as to harvest the olives (Isa. 17:6).

25.1–3: This law imposes a double restriction upon the Near Eastern convention of judicial flogging (22.18 n.), which was also employed for discipline in nonjudicial contexts (21.18 n.; Exod. 21.20; Prov. 10.13; 26.3; 1 Kings 12.14).

2: First, the sentence must be carried out under the judge's direct supervision: in his presence, with the lashes delivered by [his] count. 3: Second, the number is restricted to forty lashes. No parallel restriction exists in Near Eastern law; the Middle Assyrian Laws stipulate floggings of five to one hundred lashes. The rationale for the restriction is an extrajudicial notion of human dignity: The criminal, despite his judicial status, remains your brother. 4: For similar humane treatment of animals, see 22.6–7; Prov. 12.10. 5–10: Levirate marriage. Biblical, Near Eastern, and Roman inheritance law assigned special responsibilities to the "husband's brother" (vv. 5–7), for which Hebrew had a special term, "yavam" (cf. Latin "levir"). Should a man die, leaving his widow childless, his brother was expected to marry the widow, thereby continuing the deceased's line (see variations of this law in Gen. 38.8; Ruth 4.5–6). 5: Stranger most likely refers to someone outside of the larger clan. The widow's marriage outside the clan would diminish the landholding of the clan and add it to her husband's, affecting the original equitable division of land among the tribes (Josh. chs 13–21). Her husband's brother shall unite with her: This requirement conflicts with the prohibition against incest with the sister-in-law (Lev. 18.16; 20.21). Possibly, as in the Hittite Laws, levirate marriage provided an exception to the normal prohibition of such relations; alternatively, the Holiness Collection's incest laws, which seem to be later, are intended to prohibit the practice altogether. 6: The first son alone here counts to the brother; cf. Gen. 38.8; Ruth 4.5–6. The intent is to mitigate the injustice created by the institution of levirate marriage: The brother who complied with its requirements would effectively disinherit himself. 9: Legal title was symbolically claimed by walking over the land (11.24 n.; Gen. 13.17); transfer of title therefore entailed passing the sandal (Ruth 4.7); and renunciation of title was symbolized by removal of the sandal. The intent of the ceremony, with the man passive and spat upon, is public shaming, since the dereliction of duty abandons the brother's wife to the category of those who are economically dependent: "the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow in your settlements" (14.29 n.). 10: Shall go . . . by the name of, thus explicitly applying a form of talionic justice (19.19 n.). For refusing to build up the deceased's "name" (vv. 6, 7) and "house" (v. 9), the brother's own family (lit. "house") is stigmatized by its new name. 11–12: This law, like the preceding one, deals with threats to reproduction; it provides a corollary to Exod. 21.22–25, where a case involving a pregnant woman is used to develop the law of talion. The rationale for the punishment is difficult. While physical mutilation is characteristic in the Middle Assyrian Laws, it is nowhere else prescribed in the Bible, except in the general formula for talion (19.21; Exod. 21.23–24; Lev. 24.19–20). That formula does not apply here, however, since there can be no symmetry between injury and punishment. Since no physical injury to the male is actually specified, the issue may rather be the perceived insult to dignity or to decency (compare Laws of Hammurabi §195). 13–16: Compare Laws of Hammurabi §108; Lev. 19.35–36; Amos. 8.5. 14: By fraudulently using two different sets of counterweights—small ones to sell grain but large ones to purchase it—a merchant could turn a tidy profit. 17–19: The tradition presupposes Exod. 17.8–17, in which the Amalekites, a fierce desert tribe, attacked Israel (cf. Ps 83.4–8). Within later Jewish tradition, these verses play a central role, as Amalek came to symbolize any enemy of the Jews. These verses are read liturgically on the Sabbath before Purim, since according to Jewish tradition, Haman, the evil protagonist of Esther, is an Amalekite (see 1 Sam. 15.8 and Esth. 8.3). 18: These details are not reflected in Exod. 17.8–17; the Deuteronomist author may have supplied them in order to justify the extirpation of Amalek (v. 19; cf. Exod. 17.14; 1 Sam. 15.2–3). 19: Grants you safety, see 3.20; 12.9–10 n.

26.1–15: Concluding liturgies.

Two already prescribed laws (14.22–29) are given a historical and theological foundation (similarly, 16.12, for the Festival of Weeks). 1–11: The context is the Festival of Weeks (16.9–12), when the Israelite was to make an annual pilgrimage to the central sanctuary, bringing the first fruits of the harvest, to thank God for the land's bounty. 4: The priest shall take the basket . . . and set it down in front of the altar, in contrast to the stipulation, "You shall leave it before the LORD" (v. 10). On that basis, vv. 3–4 may represent a later addition to the text, in order to emphasize the role of the priests in the ceremony. That would account for the absence of reference to the priests elsewhere in the unit; the double tradition about what is recited at the sanctuary (v. 3, vv. 5–10); and the two versions of who is to set the basket before the altar. Thus, v. 5 would originally have continued v. 2. 5: My father was a fugitive Aramean: This verse is de-

God: “My father was a fugitive Aramean. He went down to Egypt with meager numbers and sojourned there; but there he became a great and very populous nation. ⁶The Egyptians dealt harshly with us and oppressed us; they imposed heavy labor upon us. ⁷We cried to the LORD, the God of our fathers, and the LORD heard our plea and saw our plight, our misery, and our oppression. ⁸The LORD freed us from Egypt by a mighty hand, by an outstretched arm and awesome power, and by signs and portents. ⁹He brought us to this place and gave us this land, a land flowing with milk and honey. ¹⁰Wherefore I now bring the first fruits of the soil which You, O LORD, have given me.”

You shall leave it^a before the LORD your God and bow low before the LORD your God. ¹¹And you shall enjoy, together with the Levite and the stranger in your midst, all the bounty that the LORD your God has bestowed upon you and your household.

¹²When you have set aside in full the tenth part of your yield—in the third year, the year of the tithe^b—and have given it to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat their fill in your settlements, ¹³you shall declare before the LORD your God: “I have cleared out the consecrated portion from the house; and I have given it to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, just as You commanded me; I have neither transgressed nor neglected any of Your commandments: ¹⁴^c I have not eaten of it while in mourning, I have not ployed in the Passover Haggadah (just following the section on the Four Sons) in a famous passage that emphasizes God’s miraculous sparing of Israel from a long line of persecutors, beginning with Laban’s attack on Jacob (Gen. ch 31). By means of a midrashic reworking of its original meaning, the verse is interpreted to mean “an Aramean sought to destroy my ancestor.” That rendering departs from the actual grammar of the verse and almost certainly reflects the politics of the Second Temple period, when the Seleucid empire, which ruled Israel from Syria (198–168 BCE), was referred to obliquely as Laban, the Aramean. The hyperbolic claim in the Haggadah that Laban’s oppression of Israel/Jacob was more invidious than the Egyptian enslavement points to a polemic against the Seleucids, whose policies triggered the Hasmonean revolt (167 BCE). 8–9: The thanksgiving prayer recited by the pilgrim provides a précis of the main narrative line of the Pentateuch and Joshua (the “Hexateuch”). For that reason, the verses have been seen by some scholars as an ancient confession of faith, or creed, that is older than its present context. Strikingly, this summary of the main events of Israel’s religious history makes no mention of the revelation of law at Sinai/Horeb. The same is true for many similar “confessions” in the Bible (see 6.20–24; Josh. 24.2–13; 1 Sam. 12.8; Pss. 78, 105, 136). The existence of such a strong tradition that makes no mention of Sinai has suggested to a number of scholars the possibility that the inclusion of the Sinai/Horeb experience in the overall Torah narrative represents a relatively late, secondary addition. Sinai seems to have been incorporated into the larger narrative only in exilic or later texts (Ps. 106; Neh. ch 9). Some scholars have explained this by reasoning that only a minority of the tribes or groups eventually comprising Israel experienced Sinai/Horeb; thus, only at a late stage of the tradition was their experience extended to all Israel and incorporated into the narrative of the Torah. Alternately, this act of thanksgiving commemorates Israel’s wondrous transformation from a single, landless, persecuted individual into a populous nation, secure and at home in its land. In this thanksgiving for the double miracle—the individual has now become a nation and those who were homeless now harvest crops from their land—mention of the journey to Sinai to receive the law would have been disruptive and irrelevant. 6: Oppressed . . . heavy labor, see Exod. 1.11–14. 11: Enjoy, or “rejoice” (16.11, 14–15), specifically in a festive meal consumed at the central sanctuary (12.7, 18), which must include the Levite and the stranger, for whose benefit (along with other disadvantaged groups) the following law is directed. 12–15: Produce was tithed annually and consumed by the farmer and his household at the central sanctuary (14.22–27); every third year that tithe was used locally to support the poor (14.28–29). 12: The stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, see 1.16 n.; 14.29 n.; 23.3–8 n., 20 n. 14: The triple confession of the donor’s ritual purity implies that the formula was originally used for donations of produce to God at a sanctuary, where purity would be expected. That formula has now been reused for the donation of food to the poor in a noncultic setting: “in your settlements” (v. 12). Deposited any of it with the dead: The duty of the living to care for dead ances-cleared out any of it while I was unclean, and I have not deposited any of it with the dead.^a I have obeyed the LORD my God; I have done just as You commanded me. ¹⁵Look down from Your holy abode, from heaven, and bless Your people Israel and the soil You have given us, a land flowing with milk and honey, as You swore to our fathers.”

¹⁶The LORD your God commands you this day to observe these laws and rules; observe them faithfully with all your heart and soul. ¹⁷You have affirmed^b this day that the LORD is your God, that you will walk in His ways, that you will observe His laws and commandments and rules, and that you will obey Him. ¹⁸And the LORD has affirmed^b this day that you are, as He promised you, His treasured people who shall observe all His commandments, ¹⁹and that He will set you, in fame and renown and glory, high above all the nations that He has made; and that you shall be, as He promised, a holy people to the LORD your God.

27 Moses and the elders of Israel charged the people, saying: Observe all the Instruction that I enjoin upon you this day. ²As soon as you have crossed the Jordan into the land that the LORD your God is giving you, tors through food offerings at their place of burial was widely assumed in the ancient Near East (see the Ugaritic Aqhat epic) and continued to be held in Second Temple times (Tobit 4.17). Here the practice is not condemned; it is viewed as improper specifically when coming into contact with cultic donations, because the impurity associated with death would render food unfit for donation to the Temple (Lev. 22.2–4). 15: From Your holy abode, from heaven (as in 1 Kings 8.30): The double preposition may point to the correction of an older theology in light of a newer one, following Deuteronomy's older view that only God's name resides in the Temple (12.11; 16.11; 26.2). For the earlier idea, that God Himself inhabits the Temple, see 1 Kings 8.13; cf. Deut. 12.5. Bless Your people Israel and the soil: The farmer prays for the blessing of the community and of the land, not directly for fertility or the abundance of his own crops.

26.16–19: Formal conclusion, which presents the legal corpus as a mutually binding relationship between God and Israel. Having just read the law to the people, Moses presents it to them in a formal ratification ceremony (vv. 17–18; cf. 2 Kings 23.1–3).

16: Laws and rules . . . observe . . . faithfully forms an inclusio with 12.1, thus providing the laws of chs 12–26 with an elegant frame to mark their conclusion. 17–18: You have affirmed: The past tense points to a prior action or speech in which each party has proclaimed what is here described. No record of such an event or ceremony survives. Deuteronomy emphasizes that both God and Israel have explicitly assented to the covenant and have affirmed the mutuality of the obligations that each undertakes. God's proclamation (v. 17)

specifies His responsibility (to be God) and then identifies His three expectations of Israel. Symmetrically, Israel proclaims (v. 18) one responsibility (to obey the commandments) while then outlining the three responsibilities of God toward Israel (to grant treasured status, election, holiness). This reciprocal model contrasts with the Sinai covenant, which was unilaterally offered by God (Exod. 19.3–6) and unilaterally agreed to by Israel (Exod. 19.8; 24.3, 7). Deuteronomy invokes the language of the Sinai covenant as a model, while revisiting that model in the process. 18: His treasured people, see 7.6 n.; 14.2 n. As He promised you, Exod. 19.5–6. 19: High above all the nations, see 28.13–14 n. That He has made, see Exod. 19.5b. A holy people to the LORD your God continues the reference to Exod. 19.5–6, while substituting people for “nation,” which Deuteronomy uses for non-Israelites (12.29). In fame and renown and glory: NJPS implies that the accolades will be given to Israel. The Hebrew also allows for the possibility that the honors will go to God because of His action on Israel's behalf (see Jer. 13.11; 33.9).

27.1–26: The ceremonies at Shechem. The injunctions of 11.29–32 are here reiterated and detailed. The laws of chs 12–26 are thus framed with ceremonies that connect entry into the land with obedience to Torah. The chapter joins four separate sections that are only loosely connected to one another and to the rest of Deuteronomy. A later editor has aligned the sections with one another, while breaking up the continuity of the Mosaic speech of chs 26 and 28. The resulting digression preserves several competing traditions about how and where the covenant between God and Israel was concluded: at Sinai; or on the plains of Moab; or at Gilgal immediately upon entering the land; or at the important northern shrine of Shechem (see 11.29 n.). 1–8: This section combines two separate requirements: the raising of plas-

you shall set up large stones. Coat them with plaster³ and inscribe upon them all the words of this Teaching. When you cross over to enter the land that the LORD your God is giving you, a land flowing with milk and honey, as the LORD, the God of your fathers, promised you—⁴upon crossing the Jordan, you shall set up these stones, about which I charge you this day, on Mount Ebal, and coat them with plaster.⁵ There, too, you shall build an altar to the LORD your God, an altar of stones. Do not wield an iron tool over them; ⁶you must build the altar of the LORD your God of unhewn^a stones. You shall offer on it burnt offerings to the LORD your God, ⁷and you shall sacrifice there offerings of well-being and eat them, rejoicing before the LORD your God. ⁸And on those stones you shall inscribe every word of this Teaching most distinctly.

⁹Moses and the levitical priests spoke to all Israel, saying: Silence! Hear, O Israel! Today you have become the people of the LORD your God: ¹⁰Heed the LORD your God and observe His commandments and His laws, which I enjoin upon you this day.

¹¹Thereupon Moses charged the people, saying: ¹²^bAfter you have crossed the Jordan, the following shall stand on Mount Gerizim when the blessing for the people is spoken: Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph, and Benjamin. ¹³And for the curse, the following shall stand on Mount Ebal: Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali. ¹⁴The Levites shall then proclaim in a loud voice to all the people of Israel:

tered-over stones inscribed with the Torah (vv. 1–4, 8), and the construction of a stone altar for sacrifice (vv. 5–7). 1: Moses is here referred to in the third person, interrupting his first-person address (chs 5–26, 28). And the elders: Nowhere else in Deuteronomy do they join Moses in addressing the people; this plural subject does not easily fit the following singular I. 2: As soon as you have crossed the Jordan . . . you shall set up large stones: The Deuteronomistic historian understands this command to have been fulfilled at Gilgal, just across the Jordan and less than a mile from Jericho (see Josh. ch 4). Coat them with plaster, to serve as a surface for an inscription. Archeology attests the use of plaster-covered inscriptions. 4: Mount

Ebal, at over 1,000 m (3,280 ft) high, the tallest mountain in the region, lies in central Canaan, adjacent to the city of Shechem. But that site, more than 50 km (30 mi) from the Jordan, is inconsistent with v. 2 and the beginning of this verse, which each anticipate that the ceremony will take place immediately upon crossing the river. It would be impossible to reach Shechem in a day. The most logical explanation is that Josh. ch 4 points to the original form of these verses, with Gilgal, which later became an important sanctuary (1 Sam. 11.15; Hos. 4.15; 9.15; 12.12; Amos 4.4; 5.5) as the site where Israel complied with this command. That older tradition was then replaced here by the reference to the mountains around Shechem, the chief town of the northern tribes (Josh. 24.1, 32).

5–7: These verses are an insertion that reinterprets the plastered stones on which the Torah is to be inscribed as an altar of unhewn stones, following Exod. 20.22. Such an altar, outside of Jerusalem, conflicts with the centralization requirement of ch 12, further suggesting this tradition's antiquity and its independence from the rest of Deuteronomy. The Deuteronomistic historian understood this law to be fulfilled at Mount Ebal some time after the Israelite entry into the land, following the defeats of Jericho and Ai (Josh. 8.30–35).

8: On those stones you shall inscribe every word of this Teaching: repeats and resumes the key terms of vv. 3–4, thus bracketing the insertion of vv. 5–7. Since the term "law" (Heb "torah") is elastic, there is significant debate in traditional and critical scholarship about what was meant to be written on these stones. 9–10: This paragraph, which has its own beginning, is independent of what precedes it. 9: And the levitical priests, see v. 1 n.; here too the plural subject is continued by "I" (v. 10). Today: The assertion here that Israel becomes God's people just now, in Moab, contrasts with statements that define the bond as previously formed, either at the time of the exodus (Exod. 6.6–7) or at Sinai (4.20; Exod. 19.5–6). 11–13: A fragment that refers to an ancient covenant ceremony at Shechem, instituted at the command of Moses (Josh. 8.30–35). The antiquity of the tribal list is seen in the facts that Levi is listed as a tribe (Gen. 49.5–7) and that the division of the House of Joseph into Manasseh and Ephraim has not yet occurred (Gen. 49.22–26; contrast Deut. 33.17). The division of the tribes into two groups of six is attested only here. 11: Thereupon, lit., "on that day," without further specification. 12–13: Mount Gerizim . . . Mount Ebal: See 11.29 n. One group of tribes, on Gerizim, proclaims a set of blessings (see 28.1–14); the other, on Ebal, a set of curses (see 28.15–68). 14–26: Despite the paragraphing in NJPS, v. 14 more likely begins a new section with a very different conception of the ceremony. Here the tribe of Levi alone proclaims a set of prohibited actions and all the people—acting in unison and not divided into tribes—respond, Amen (see Jer.

11.3–5). There is no list of blessings (cf. v. 12). Nor is "the curse" intended by v. 13—a description of divine punishment for wrongful action, as in 28.15–68—provided. In contrast, the "cursed be" proclamations here employ an unrelated Heb word and stigmatize a summary list of rejected actions, making no references to the consequences of the transgressions.

14: The Levites: Deuteronomy's normal term is "levitical priests" (v. 9; 18.1). 15–26: In context, the twelve curses correspond to the twelve tribes, although this section makes no reference to the tribal division, and the people function as a single entity (v. 14). The resulting incongruence points to the many editorial revisions that this chapter has undergone.

28.1–68: The consequences of obedience or disobedience: blessing or curse. The Mosaic covenant specifies a series of blessings and curses that follow upon national obedience or disobedience to the law. These are modeled after ancient Near Eastern state treaties, in which the consequences of breach of the treaty are spelled out at its conclusion; this chapter has several close parallels to the Vassal Treaty of Esarhaddon (VTE), a Neo-Assyrian treaty dating to 672 BCE. The present strong disproportion between the sections devoted to blessing (vv. 1–14) and to curse (vv. 15–68) most likely reflects the actual historical experience of the Babylonian conquest, deportation, and exile of Judah (597 and 586 BCE), here recast as a prophetic warning. The two appendices which have expanded the section (vv. 47–57, 58–68) each seek to make theological sense of that catastrophe. The two other legal collections of the Torah (the Covenant Collection of Exod. chs 21–23; the Holiness Collection of Lev. chs 17–26) similarly end with exhortations to obedience, accompanied by blessings and curses (Exod. 23.20–33; Lev ch 26), as does the Code of Hammurabi. Here an inclusio frames and defines the blessings section: if you obey . . . observe faithfully (vv. 1, 13). 1–2: The proem emphasizes the conditionality of the elected status of Israel. The repetition of the conditional nature of the fulfillment, If you obey the LORD your God (vv. 1 and 2), places a frame around the central idea of divine election of Israel. Set ⁵Blessed shall be your basket and your kneading bowl.

⁶Blessed shall you be in your comings and blessed shall you be in your goings.

⁷The LORD will put to rout before you the enemies who attack you; they will march out against you by a single road, but flee from you by many^a roads. ⁸The LORD will ordain blessings for you upon your barns and upon all your undertakings: He will bless you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you. ⁹The LORD will establish you as His holy people, as He swore to you, if you keep the commandments of the LORD your God and walk in His ways. ¹⁰And all the peoples of the earth shall see that the LORD's name is proclaimed over you,^b and they shall stand in fear of you. ¹¹The LORD will give you abounding prosperity in the issue of your womb, the offspring of your cattle, and the produce of your soil in the land that the LORD swore to your fathers to assign to you. ¹²The LORD will open for you His bounteous store, the heavens, to provide rain for your land in season and to bless all your undertakings. You will be creditor to many nations, but debtor to none.

¹³The LORD will make you the head, not the tail; you will always be at the top and never at the bottom—if only you obey and faithfully observe the commandments of the LORD your God that I enjoin upon you this day, ¹⁴and do not deviate to the right or to the left from any of the commandments that I enjoin upon you this day and turn to the worship of other gods.

¹⁵But if you do not obey the LORD your God to observe faithfully all His commandments and laws which I enjoin you high above all the nations of the earth (see also v. 13): The metaphor, which is also used to denote the elected status of the Davidic dynasty (Ps. 89.28), here denotes the divine election of the nation. The same affirmation of Israel's election appears at 26.19, where it is not conditional; instead, it fulfills God's past promises. Here, in contrast, the nation's elected status is presented as a future promise that is conditional upon obedience. The marked change may well reflect the revision of earlier expectations in light of the catastrophe of exile. 3–6: The six benedictions have their malediction counterpart at vv. 16–19. The two antonym pairs (vv. 3, 6) provide a frame to the unit. The opposites form a merism to stress totality (like "night and day"); see 6.7 n. 3: City and country, "everywhere," urban and rural. 4: Issue . . . lambing: For womb, ground, and livestock, obedience to the Torah is rewarded with comprehensive fertility. Fecundity is contingent upon obedience to the covenant—and thus not upon either natural fertility or competing fertility gods (see 7.12–14 n.). 6: Comings . . . goings, whenever and wherever you go. 7: Military success is conditional upon covenantal obedience rather than strength of arms (9.1–3; Josh. 1.6–8). 9: The LORD will establish you . . . if you keep: The assertion here that the nation's holiness or election is conditional upon obedience represents a remarkable shift from other contexts in Deuteronomy where Israel's holiness is not future but present, and not conditional but unconditional (7.6; 14.2; cf. 26.18). 10: The LORD's name is proclaimed over you signifies a special relationship with God, which includes particular accountability to God and corresponding divine oversight. The formula can apply to either the nation (here; Isa. 63.19; Jer. 14.9; 2 Chron. 7.14) or an individual (Exod. 33.12; Jer. 15.16). 12: Store: In Israelite and Near Eastern cosmology, primordial waters remained above the dome of the sky and were released as rain (Gen. 1.7; 7.11). Creditor . . . debtor: For the use of the same image as a metaphor for national sovereignty, see 15.6. 13: Further metaphors for autonomy, as at 15.6. 14: And turn . . . gods, lit. "to go after other gods to worship them." See 6.14 n.

28.15–68: Consequences of disobedience. This long section has two subsections. The focus of the first (vv. 15–46) is a broad range of misfortunes, extending from infertility of crops, livestock, or the human population through to military defeat. The second unit (vv. 47–68) places its focus specifically on foreign invasion, siege, national defeat, and exile, reversing key components of the covenantal promises and of the nation's history of salvation. By disobeying the covenant, the nation undoes its own history. 15–46: The first section is framed upon you this day, all these curses shall come upon you and take effect:

¹⁶ Cursed shall you be in the city and cursed shall you be in the country.

¹⁷ Cursed shall be your basket and your kneading bowl.

¹⁹ Cursed shall you be in your comings and cursed shall you be in your goings.

²⁰ The LORD will let loose against you calamity, panic, and frustration in all the enterprises you undertake, so that you shall soon be utterly wiped out because of your evil-doing in forsaking Me. ²¹ The LORD will make pestilence cling to you, until He has put an end to you in the land that you are entering to possess. ²² The LORD will strike you with ^aconsumption, fever, and inflammation, with scorching heat and drought, with blight and mildew; they shall hound you until you perish. ²³ The skies above your head shall be copper and the earth under you iron. ²⁴ The LORD will make the rain of your land dust, and sand shall drop on you from the sky, until you are wiped out.

²⁷ The LORD will strike you with the Egyptian inflammation,^c with hemorrhoids, boil-scars, and itch, from which you shall never recover.

a Exact nature of these afflictions uncertain.

by an ancient editorial device, a chiasmic inclusio, whereby the initial sequence AB is repeated at the end of the unit as B'A'. Thus, the sequence in v. 15, not obey . . . to observe (A) and these curses shall come upon you and take effect (B) is reversed in v. 45 as these curses shall befall you . . . overtake you (B'), identical in the Hebrew and not heard . . . keep the commandments (A').

15: A precise negation of v. 1: Disobedience negates blessing and occasions punishment. Come upon you and take effect: The verbs are animate and active; the curses are almost personified, as if they had agency or acted by themselves to punish those who infringe the covenant (cf. Exod. 12.23).

16–19: Negating vv. 3–6. 20: Corresponding to the promise of tripartite blessing for obedience (v. 8: agriculture, activity, and land) stands the triple threat of calamity, panic, and frustration. The first term would more accurately be translated "curse," as the precise negation of blessing. The threats summarized by this verse are spelled out in the rest of the section (vv. 21–44). Me: Moses speaks on behalf of God directly: Note the shift to the first person from third person reference to God (as at 7.4; 17.3). The shift takes place in the opposite direction in the Decalogue (cf. 5.6, 11). 21–44: This section echoes the state treaties imposed by the Neo-Assyrian empire upon its vassal states in order to ensure loyalty and tribute (826–625 BCE). The degree of similarity suggests that the curse section of these state treaties, either directly or by way of Aramaic translation, provided a model for the authors of this chapter to use in describing Israel's relationship to God. According to biblical narratives, Judah was a vassal to the Assyrian empire (2 Kings 18.13–18) and both Neo-Assyrian and Judean officials freely employed Aramaic (2 Kings 18.26–27). 23: Copper . . . iron: See VTE §63–64: "May [the gods] make your ground like iron . . . Just as rain does not fall from a bronze sky. . . ." 25: The routers of v. 7 become the routed. You shall become a horror: The Septuagint reads "you shall become a 'diaspora,'" reinterpreting the Hebrew so as to reflect the historical circumstances of its 3rd century BCE Alexandrian authors. 26: Deuteronomic law requires even executed criminals to be buried by sun-down, lest their corpses become carrion (21.22–23); the abrogation of that religious norm here underscores the punishment's horror (Jer 7.33). 27–35: The sequence of punishments specified in this section initially seems arbitrary: skin inflammation (v. 27); blindness (vv. 28–29); and loss of wife, house, and property (vv. 30a, 30b, 33). The sequence finds its explanation, however, in VTE §39–43, where each curse is associated with a particular god within the Neo-Assyrian pantheon. The moon god Sin is responsible for leprosy; the sun god Shamash for blindness; and Dilipat (the planet Venus) for rape, dispossession, and pillage by a foreign army. The arrangement of the curses follows the rank of the deities within that pantheon's hierarchy. 27: Egyptian

²⁸The LORD will strike you with madness, blindness, and dismay.^a ²⁹You shall grope at noon as a blind man gropes in the dark; you shall not prosper in your ventures, but shall be constantly abused and robbed, with none to give help.

³⁰If you pay the bride-price for a wife, another man shall enjoy her. If you build a house, you shall not live in it. If you plant a vineyard, you shall not harvest it.^b ³¹Your ox shall be slaughtered before your eyes, but you shall not eat of it; your ass shall be seized in front of you, and it shall not be returned to you; your flock shall be delivered to your enemies, with none to help you. ³²Your sons and daughters shall be delivered to another people, while you look on; and your eyes shall strain for them constantly, but you shall be helpless. ³³A people you do not know shall eat up the produce of your soil and all your gains; you shall be abused and downtrodden continually,³⁴ until you are driven mad by what your eyes behold. ³⁵The LORD will afflict you at the knees and thighs with a severe inflammation, from which you shall never recover—from the sole of your foot to the crown of your head.

³⁶The LORD will drive you, and the king you have set over you, to a nation unknown to you or your fathers, where you shall serve other gods, of wood and stone. ³⁷You shall be a consternation, a proverb, and a byword among all the peoples to which the LORD will drive you.

³⁸Though you take much seed out to the field, you shall gather in little, for the locust shall consume it. ³⁹Though you plant vineyards and till them, you shall have no wine to drink or store, for the worm shall devour them. ⁴⁰Though you have olive trees throughout your territory, you shall have no oil for anointment, for your olives shall drop off. ⁴¹Though you beget sons and daughters, they shall not remain with you, for they shall go into captivity. ⁴²The cricket shall take over all the trees and produce of your land.

⁴⁵All these curses shall befall you; they shall pursue you and overtake you, until you are wiped out, because you did not heed the LORD your God and keep the commandments and laws that He enjoined upon you. ⁴⁶They shall serve as signs and proofs against you and your offspring for all time. ⁴⁷Because you would not serve the inflammation: inversion of 7.15; see Exod. 9.9–11. 28–29: Blindness: The Mesopotamian sun god Shamash punishes disobedience by withholding light and vision. Shamash is also the god of justice. Thus, his punishment entails the breakdown of civil order and legal standards: You shall be constantly abused and robbed. 30: Wife . . . house . . . vineyard: Contrast 20.7, which provides the same conditions for exemption from conscription, in different order. 32: The sale of the children to foreigners as slaves guarantees their non-return (Gen. 37.25–38). 36: Both the Neo-Assyrian army (2 Kings ch 17) and the Neo-Babylonian invaders (2 Kings chs 24–25) practiced deportation. 37: Byword: The nation's fate will become a negative standard that all other peoples will hope to avoid. The opposite idea was central to God's covenant with Abraham, whose people were to become the paradigm of divine providence (Gen. 12.3). 38–42: Futility curses. The frustration of human labor through infertility of the harvest (caused by insects or other natural enemies) is here presented as punishment for infringement of the covenant, reversing the blessings of vv. 7–14. From this perspective, crop failure is interpreted as divine judgment (Lev. 26.20; Amos 4.7–12). 43–44: Reversing vv. 12b–13. 45–46: Summary statement that, in conjunction with vv. 38–44, shows systematically how disobedience undoes blessing: (A) the blessings of agricultural and reproductive fertility (vv. 11–12a) and (B) economic independence and political sovereignty (vv. 12b–13), which result from (C) obedience (vv. 13b–14), are reversed with (A') failure of crops and loss of progeny (vv. 38–42) and (B') political and economic domination by foreigners (vv. 43–44), all of which result from (C') disobedience to the covenant (v. 45). 46: Signs and proofs, more commonly translated "sign(s) and marvel(s)," as at 29.2. These terms normally specify the miracles performed by God on behalf of Israel at the time of the exo-

LORD your God in joy and gladness over the abundance of everything, ⁴⁸ you shall have to serve—in hunger and thirst, naked and lacking everything—the enemies whom the LORD will let loose against you. He will put an iron yoke upon your neck until He has wiped you out.

⁴⁹The LORD will bring a nation against you from afar, from the end of the earth, which will swoop down like the eagle—a nation whose language you do not understand, ⁵⁰ a ruthless nation, that will show the old no regard and the young no mercy. ⁵¹ It shall devour the offspring of your cattle and the produce of your soil, until you have been wiped out, leaving you nothing of new grain, wine, or oil, of the calving of your herds and the lambing of your flocks, until it has brought you to ruin. ⁵² It shall shut you up in all your towns throughout your land until every mighty, towering wall in which you trust has come down. And when you are shut up in all your towns throughout your land that the LORD your God has assigned to you, ⁵³ you shall eat your own issue, the flesh of your sons and daughters that the LORD your God has assigned to you, because of the desperate straits to which your enemy shall reduce you. ⁵⁴ He who is most tender and fastidious among you shall be too mean to his brother and the wife of his bosom and the children he has spared ⁵⁵ to share with any of them the flesh of the children that he eats, because he has nothing else left as a result of the desperate straits to which your enemy shall reduce you in all your towns. ⁵⁶ And she who is most tender and dainty among you, so tender and dainty that she would never venture to set a foot on the ground, shall begrudge the husband of her bosom, and her son and her daughter, ⁵⁷ the afterbirth that issues from between her legs and the babies she bears; she shall eat them secretly, because of utter want, in the desperate straits to which your enemy shall reduce you in your towns.

⁵⁸ If you fail to observe faithfully all the terms of this Teaching that are written in this book, to reverence this dus (4.34; 6.22; 7.19; 34.11; Exod. 7.3; 8.19; 10.1–2; 11.9–10). They now threaten instead to immortalize the divine punishment of Israel, as even language is now inverted against the nation.

28.47–57: Scenario of foreign invasion. This unit, outside the frame provided by vv. 15, 45–46, seems like a later appendix. 47: Because you would not serve: Here the detailed depiction of the future curse is based upon wrongdoing already committed in the past, in contrast to the conditional formulation of v. 15, which presents the disobedience as a future possibility. Abundance: The threat that prosperity in the land will cause Israel to forget the source of that comfort is here realized (see 6.11–12; 8.11–20; 33.15, 18). 48: The punishment corresponds precisely to the offense: Because you would not serve . . . (v. 47) you shall have to serve: Israel is judged by talionic justice (“an eye for an eye”). The formulation works on the double meaning of the key Hebrew word: “to serve” can refer to sacrificial worship of God (13.5) as well as to labor as a servant or slave (see 5.13 n.). God thus redeemed Israel from servitude in Egypt so that, in freedom, they serve Him in the covenant (Lev. 25.42, 55). Iron yoke, symbolizing vassal status, as in Jer. chs 27–28. 49–57: Systematic presentation of foreign conquest, proceeding from invasion (vv. 48–50), to the invaders’ plunder and despoiling of the land (v. 51), to crippling siege (v. 52), and culminating in the horrors of starvation that arise from the siege (vv. 53–57). These descriptions of the invader and of the consequences of the siege are based upon the literary model of the Vassal Treaty of Esarhadon. 49–52: Closely parallels Jer. 5.15–19. 49: Like the eagle, cf. Ezek. 17.3–7; Hab. 1.8. 51: Contrast the idealistic war laws of 20.19–20, which prohibit occupiers from despoiling the land. 52: It shall shut you up . . . until every . . . wall . . . has come down: The Neo-Assyrian (2 Kings 17.5) and Neo-Babylonian armies (2 Kings 24.3; 25.1–7) employed advanced engineering to mount a siege campaign involving ramparts, battering rams, and catapults. 53–57: The starvation resulting from the siege causes a complete breakdown of the normal social order, as parents become predators of their children and family members compete for food. For cannibalism under siege conditions, see Lev. 26.29; 2 Kings 6.28–32; Jer. 19.9; Ezek. 5.10; Lam. 2.20; 4.10; and VTE §§47, 69, 71, 75.

28.58–68: Undoing the exodus. The orientation here differs considerably from what precedes; the unit seems to represent a third layer to the chapter. 58: The Mosaic speaker has thus far urged Israel to obey God’s “commandments which I enjoin upon you this day” (v. 1; similarly, vv. 13–14).

honored and awesome Name, the LORD your God,⁵⁹ the LORD will inflict extraordinary plagues upon you and your offspring, strange and lasting plagues, malignant and chronic diseases.⁶⁰ He will bring back upon you all the sicknesses of Egypt that you dreaded so, and they shall cling to you.⁶¹ Moreover, the LORD will bring upon you all the other diseases and plagues that are not mentioned in this book of Teaching, until you are wiped out.⁶² You shall be left a scant few, after having been as numerous as the stars in the skies, because you did not heed the command of the LORD your God.⁶³ And as the LORD once delighted in making you prosperous and many, so will the LORD now delight in causing you to perish and in wiping you out; you shall be torn from the land that you are about to enter and possess.

⁶⁴The LORD will scatter you among all the peoples from one end of the earth to the other, and there you shall serve other gods, wood and stone, whom neither you nor your ancestors have experienced.^a ⁶⁵Yet even among those nations you shall find no peace, nor shall your foot find a place to rest. The LORD will give you there an anguished heart and eyes that pine and a despondent spirit.⁶⁶ The life you face shall be precarious; you shall be in terror, night and day, with no assurance of survival.⁶⁷ In the morning you shall say, "If only it were evening!" and in the evening you shall say, "If only it were morning!"—because of what your heart shall dread and your eyes shall see.⁶⁸ The LORD will send you back to Egypt in galleys, by a route which I told you you should not see again. There you shall offer yourselves for sale to your enemies as male and female slaves, but none will buy.

⁶⁹These are the terms of the covenant which the LORD commanded Moses to conclude with the Israelites in the

a See note at 11.28.

Here, in contrast, Israel must obey the terms of this Teaching that are written in this book. How the commandments have already become transformed from oral proclamation into a written text, i.e., Torah in its later sense, is unexplained, since it is not until 31.9, 24 that Moses commands that the Torah be put into writing as a book. Moreover, hitherto the required obedience was to the plural "commandments" (vv. 1, 9, 13, 15, 45). Here, for the first time in the chapter, Israel must obey a codified, single Teaching. This . . . Name: distinctively, Name stands directly for God (elsewhere in the Torah only Lev. 24.11). The word's special reference is explained by the following the LORD, which denotes the Tetragrammaton (יהוה), God's personal name. 59–68: Consistent with the "book" perspective, the consequences for breach of the written Torah have a different focus than the preceding horrors of foreign invasion. Contravention of the Torah triggers a systematic reversal of the national history, covenantal promises, and theology included in that Torah. The punishment amounts to an anti-Torah that will dissolve the national identity. 59–61: Bring back . . . sicknesses: After the miracle of the exodus, God had promised, if the people obeyed, "I will not bring upon you any of the diseases that I brought upon the Egyptians" (Exod. 15.26). Now the threat implicit in that conditional promise becomes realized (also vv. 21–22, 35; 7.15). 62: Stars . . . skies: God will cancel the promise made to Abraham that his people shall be as numerous as the stars of heaven (Gen. 15.5–6). The covenantal promise of peoplehood (Gen. 12.2) will thus be rescinded. 63: Dispossession and exile (as in 4.26; Lev. 26.33–39) rescinds the covenantal promise of the land, contravening even the unconditional divine promises of Gen. 12.7 and 13.17. 64: The double loss of Israel's identity: Dispersion of the population dissolves its political identity, and idol worship dissolves its religious identity. 65–67: In the absence of the national destiny provided by the covenant, historical existence has no meaning. 68: Forced return to Egypt, where the former taskmasters now spurn Israel's desperate bid to sell itself back into slavery and thus to undo its own history. For selling oneself into slavery under financial hardship to pay off debts or gain support ("indenture"), see Lev. 25.39. Route which I told you you should not see again (cf. 17.16): Although the reference to the "route" or "direction" is unclear, the threat reverses the unconditional promise by Moses at the time of the exodus: "the Egyptians whom you see today you will never see again" (Exod. 14.13). The covenant violations by Israel are so serious that Moses threatens to abrogate that promise.

28.69–30.20: The third discourse of Moses: The ratification ceremony for the covenant on the plains of Moab. Israel is formally land of Moab, in addition to the covenant which He had made with them at Horeb.

29 Moses summoned all Israel and said to them: You have seen all that the LORD did before your very eyes in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh and to all his courtiers and to his whole country: ²the wondrous feats that you saw with your own eyes, those prodigious signs and marvels. ³Yet to this day the LORD has not given you a mind to understand or eyes to see or ears to hear.

⁴I led you through the wilderness forty years; the clothes on your back did not wear out, nor did the sandals on your feet; ⁵you had no bread to eat and no wine or other intoxicant to drink—that you might know that I the LORD am your God.

⁶When you reached this place, King Sihon of Heshbon and King Og of Bashan came out to engage us in battle, but we defeated them. ⁷We took their land and gave it to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh as their heritage. ⁸Therefore observe faithfully all the terms of this covenant, that you may succeed in all that you undertake.

⁹You stand this day, all of you, before the LORD your God—your tribal heads, your elders and your officials, all adjured to enter the covenant: to swear to obey the laws of chs 12–26 under penalty of the sanctions of ch 28. 28.69–29.28: A didactic review of Israel's history (29.1–8) precedes an imprecation to ensure loyal adherence to the covenant (vv. 9–28). The people are formally assembled and instructed in the serious consequences of what they are about to undertake. 28.69: Editorial Heading. NJPS follows the Masoretic textual division, understanding the verse as a colophon that concludes the second discourse of Moses (4.44–28.69). In contrast, most English translations follow the more logical Septuagint system, which regards the verse (as 29.1) as a superscription to the third discourse (29.1–30.20). Similar formulae (these are the . . .) are used to introduce the first and second discourses (1.1; 4.45). The covenant . . . Moab: This editorial heading provides two new perspectives on the legal corpus. (1) The earlier "laws and rules" (12.1) are now seen as a unified, single covenant between God and Israel. This perspective is absent from the legal corpus itself, where the word "covenant" appears only at 17.2. In this third discourse, however, that understanding becomes the norm (see 28.69; 29.8, 11, 13, 20, 24; 31.16, 20). (2) The second new perspective regards the laws of Moab as a covenant in addition to the one made at Horeb; the phrase suggests an editor's attempt to work in a later version of a law or narrative alongside an earlier one (Gen. 26.1; Lev. 23.38). This view stylizes Deuteronomy—originally intended as an independent body of law—as now working in tandem with prior law. It is striking that, in other contexts, Deuteronomy does not take the covenant at Horeb into account but presents itself as an independent and autonomous covenant. There is no reference to Horeb in the redundant introductory formulae of 4.44–45 or, more importantly, in the superscription to the legal corpus at 12.1.

29.1–8. Didactic review of Israel's history. 29.1: You have seen: As at 5.2–4, Moses addresses the present generation, who are actually one generation removed from the miraculous events, as if they had themselves lived through the exodus and the wilderness wandering. 2: Signs . . . marvels, see 28.46 n. 3: Yet to this day, more accurately, "the LORD has not given you until today." The thrust is to stress informed consent. The admonition creates a tension with the preceding two verses: the addressees who "have seen" The miraculous events (v. 1), which their own "eyes" saw (v. 2), are accused of having lacked eyes to see. The castigation reflects the episodes of rebellion (9.7–24). 4–5: The Mosaic homily reinterprets the wilderness wandering, originally intended as divine punishment of Israel (Num. 14.13–35), and presents it positively, in didactic terms. 4: I: For the intrusion of divine speech into Mosaic speech, see 7.4, 17.3, 28.20, 68. Clothes . . . feet, see 8.4. 5: You had no bread to eat . . . no wine . . . to drink: The sense is, "It was not bread that you ate . . . nor wine that you drank." The manna, quail, and water that Israel consumed were supplied by divine providence (8.2–5; Exod. ch 16; Num. 11.4–9, 31–33). Know: The miraculous sustenance of Israel in the desert was intended didactically to bring the people to God (8.3). Knowledge here is not abstract speculation but the recognition of God's historical actions on behalf of the nation. I the LORD am your God, better, "I, YHWH, am your God" (6.4; Exod. 20.2). 6–7: See 1.4; 2.26–3.22; Num. 21.21–35.

29.9–28: Imprecation to ensure loyalty to the covenant. 9: Stand . . . all of you, in formal array for a public legal ceremony (see the men of Israel, ¹⁰your children, your wives, even the stranger within your camp, from woodchopper to water drawer—¹¹to enter into the covenant of the LORD your God, which the LORD your God is concluding with you this day, with its sanctions;^a ¹²to the end that He may establish you this day as His people and be your God, as He promised you and as He swore to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. ¹³I make this covenant, with its sanctions, not with you alone, ¹⁴but both with those who are standing here with us this day before the LORD our God and with those who are not with us here this day.

¹⁵Well you know that we dwelt in the land of Egypt and that we passed through the midst of various other nations; ¹⁶and you have seen the detestable things and the fetishes of wood and stone, silver and gold, that they keep. ¹⁷Perchance there is among you some man or woman, or some clan or tribe, whose heart is even now turning away from the LORD our God to go and worship the gods of those nations—perchance there is among you a stock sprouting poison weed and wormwood. ¹⁸When such a one hears the words of these sanctions, he may fancy himself immune, thinking, “I shall be safe, though I follow my own willful heart”—to the utter ruin of moist and dry alike.^b ¹⁹The LORD will never forgive him; rather will the LORD’s anger and passion rage against that man, till every sanction recorded in this book comes down upon him, and the LORD blots out his name from under heaven.

Ps. 82.1). This day, making the transition from historical review (28.69–29.7) to present adjuration (similarly, VTE §33). 10: In Deuteronomy, all, including women, are included in the covenantal community. 11: Covenant . . . with its sanctions: This legal formula recurs at v. 13, thus framing the central idea of the covenant: the binding relationship between God and Israel. Sanctions, more accurately, “its imprecation” or “its curse” (see translators’ note a). Treaty infraction is punished with “all the curses of the covenant” (v. 20, more accurately translating the same Hebrew terms), which are named and sworn to in advance. As in the colloquial expression that joins a promise (“Cross my heart”) to a pronouncement dooming oneself for noncompliance (“and hope to die”), so in the ancient Near East were covenants validated by means of a concluding imprecation (VTE §§37–56, 58–106). On that model, the preceding laws of chs 12–26 represent the treaty stipulations; ch 28, its sanctions; and ch 29, the formal ceremony of the imprecation.

13–14: The covenant binds even future generations (as in VTE §25, 33, 34, 57); consequently, the punishment for infraction of its terms extends to the third and fourth generation (5.9; Exod. 20.5; 34.7). 16–26: A stark, two-part warning, showing how the attempt even of a single individual secretly to withdraw from the covenant (vv. 16–18) jeopardizes the entire nation (vv. 19–27). 17: Turning away, transferring loyalty from God to other gods (13.6–11; 17.2–7). Poison weed and wormwood, Hos. 10.4; Amos 5.7; 6.12. 18: Fancy himself immune, rather than proclaim the imprecation, hoping to escape the sanctions of the covenant. Moist and dry: Most likely the paired antonyms designate totality (see 28.3–6 n.), but the exact meaning is lost. 19: Passion: God is described as an “impassioned God” (5.9; Exod. 34.14; with the adjectival form of the same word), referring to His zeal to defend the mutual exclusivity of the covenant relation. Comes down upon him, more literally, “will crouch down upon them” (cf. Gen. 4.7), with the imprecation here almost animate. Blots out his name: The image is of the erasure of a tablet or scroll (Num. 5.23), given a theological cast based on the Mesopotamian idea that the divine decree of human fate is inscribed in a heavenly book. Erasure from this book, then, symbolizes punishment (9.14; Gen. 6.7; Exod. 17.14; 32.32; 2 Kings 14.27; Ps. 9.6). This early, non-Israelite idea figures prominently in the later Jewish liturgy for Rosh Ha-Shanah (the Jewish New Year) and Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement). 21–27: The negative instruction. As the wilderness wandering provided an instructional lesson for the nation (vv. 4–5), so will Israel, now herself transformed into a devastation, provide an object lesson for future generations and other nations. Normally this question-and-answer model, which anticipates the child’s question, seeks to provide the rationale for ritual observance with reference to God’s redemptive acts and foreigners who come from distant lands and see the plagues and diseases that the LORD has inflicted upon that land, ²²all its soil devastated by sulfur and salt, beyond sowing and producing, no grass growing in it, just like the upheaval of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboiim, which the LORD overthrew in His fierce anger—²³all nations will ask, “Why did the LORD do thus to this land? Wherefore that awful wrath?” ²⁴They will be told, “Because they forsook the covenant that the LORD, God of their fathers, made with them when He freed them from the land of Egypt; ²⁵they turned to the service of other gods and worshiped them, gods whom they had not experienced^a and whom He had not allotted^b to them. ²⁶So the LORD was incensed at that land and brought upon it all the curses recorded in this book. ²⁷The LORD uprooted them from their soil in anger, fury, and great wrath, and cast them into another land, as is still the case.”

²⁸Concealed acts concern the LORD our God; but with overt acts, it is for us and our children ever to apply all the provisions of this Teaching.

30 When all these things befall you—the blessing and the curse that I have set before you—and you take them to heart amidst the various nations to which the LORD your God has banished you, ²and you return to the LORD your God, and you and your children heed His command with all your heart and soul, just as I enjoin upon you this day, ³then the LORD your God will restore your fortunes^c and take you back in love. He will bring you together again from all the peoples where the LORD your God has scattered you. ⁴Even if your outcasts are at the ends of the world,^d from there the LORD your God will gather you, from there He will fetch you. ⁵And the LORD

(4.32–38; Exod. 12.25–27; 13.8–10). Reversing that scenario, the lesson here involves divine punishment for breach of covenant (see 1 Kings 9.9). 22: Sulfur and salt were used in antiquity as chemical defoliants by invading armies. Sodom . . . Zeboiim: The land’s resulting sterility will recall the divine devastation of the proverbial wicked cities located in the arid area around the Dead Sea (Gen. 19.24–25; Isa. 1.9–10). 24: The covenant, conflating the covenants of Horeb and Moab (28.69). 25: Gods . . . not allot- ted to them: As at 32.8–9, the idea is that each nation is allocated its own god, and that YHWH is the God of Israel. As at 5.7–9, the existence of other deities is here conceded. Contrast 4.19, where it is rather only inanimate “stars . . . [that] God allotted,” which reinterprets the polytheistic image from the later perspective of monotheism. 27: Cast them into another land, as is still the case: The reference to the present implies that the chapter was composed subsequent to the Babylonian exile of 586 BCE.

28: Concealed acts may, as here, refer to acts that God will punish (vv. 17–18); or to future events. More likely, the antithesis rejects religions that define truth in terms of esoteric speculation and restrict access to such truth to a learned few. Instead, the Torah, based upon a public revelation (ch 5) and Mosaic instruction (chs 12–26), is accessible to all. Similarly, Israel’s God is “near” and obedience to the revealed Torah constitutes “wisdom” (4.6–7). For us and our children ever, tripartite emphasis on lasting open access. To apply continues the antithesis: The Torah requires not esoteric speculation but moral and religious action.

30.1–10: Reassurance of restoration. The promise of restoration here contradicts the unconditional denial of divine pardon and the blotting out of Israel’s name in 29.19. Indeed, this section, with its emphasis on restoration, does not logically follow ch 29, which urges obedience to the covenant by stressing the seriousness of its sanctions. The unit makes most sense as an insertion that serves the religious needs of a community different from that of the book’s original audience (see v. 5 n.). Its literary and theological elegance is difficult to represent in English. The author uses the Hebrew word “shuv” (which can mean “return,” “repent,” or “restore”) in seven different ways to establish the close bond between human repentance and divine forgiveness: (v. 1) If you take them to heart . . . (v. 2) and return . . . (v. 3) then the LORD will restore your fortunes and take you back . . . (v. 8) Then you shall again obey . . . (v. 9) For the LORD will again take delight . . . (v. 10) because you return. This notion of returning (using “shuv”) is central to Deuteronomy 4 as well, and to prophetic literature, and is further developed into the rabbinic doctrine of “teshuvah” or repentance, which replaces the Priestly idea of “kapparah” or atonement. 4: Contrast Amos 9.2–3. 5: Bring you to the land that your fathers possessed: The your God will bring you to the land that your fathers possessed, and you shall possess it; and He will make you more prosperous and more numerous than your fathers.

⁶ Then the LORD your God will open up^a your heart and the hearts of your offspring to love the LORD your God with all your heart and soul, in order that you may live. ⁷ The LORD your God will inflict all those curses upon the enemies and foes who persecuted you. ⁸ You, however, will again heed the LORD and obey all His commandments that I enjoin upon you this day. ⁹ And the LORD your God will grant you abounding prosperity in all your undertakings, in the issue of your womb, the offspring of your cattle, and the produce of your soil. For the LORD will again delight in your well-being, as He did in that of your fathers, ¹⁰ since you will be heeding the LORD your God and keeping His commandments and laws that are recorded in this book of the Teaching—once you return to the LORD your God with all your heart and soul.

¹¹ Surely, this Instruction which I enjoin upon you this day is not too baffling for you, nor is it beyond reach. ¹² It is not in the heavens, that you should say, “Who among us can go up to the heavens and get it for us and impart it to us, that we may observe it?” ¹³ Neither is it beyond the sea, that you should say, “Who among us can cross to the other side of the sea and get it for us and impart it to us, that we may observe it?” ¹⁴ No, the thing is very close to you, in your mouth and in your heart, to observe it.

¹⁵ See, I set before you this day life and prosperity, death and adversity. ¹⁶ For^b I command you this day, to love the LORD your God, to walk in His ways, and to keep His commandments, His laws, and His rules, that you may thrive and increase, and that the LORD your God may

“you” no longer refers to the desert generation whom Moses, according to the narrative, addresses on the plains of Transjordan, as they are about to enter the land (ca. 1220 BCE). Instead, the perspective has shifted to that of the Judean exiles in Babylonia (586–539 BCE), who look forward to returning to the land they once occupied, and from which they have since been displaced. More numerous, using the language of the covenantal promise (Gen. 17.2; 22.17). For similar claims that the future will repeat the past while also surpassing it, see Isa. 42.9; 43.6–20; 51.9–11. 6: The LORD . . . will open up [lit. “circumcise”] your heart: God is the agent, in contrast with the previous call for Israel itself to “cut away . . . the thickening about your hearts” (see 10.16 n.). The change in perspective suggests skepticism about the people’s ability to effect such a change of heart independently. Still more skepticism is evident in the prophetic vision of a divine “reprogramming” of the human heart by inscribing the Torah upon it (Jer. 31.31–34; Ezek. 11.19–20; 36.26–27). 7: The curses are deflected from Israel to the adversary; contrast 28.47, 49, where the foreign nation functions as God’s agent to punish Israel for its disobedience. 9: Issue . . . offspring . . . produce: The blessings upon return from exile conform to those promised upon initial entry into the land (28.4). 10: Heeding the LORD . . . and keeping His . . . laws that are recorded in this book of the Teaching: The reference is to the text of Deuteronomy itself, which replaces the live speech of Moses (12.28; 13.1) or prophetic speech (18.18–9) as authoritative revealer of God’s word.

30.11–20: The original continuation of ch 29, with two sections: vv. 11–14, 15–20. 11–14: The accessibility of Torah. Turning their own characteristic imagery against them, the passage challenges the assumptions of Near Eastern wisdom schools about the inaccessibility of divine wisdom and the limits of human knowledge (cf. Job ch 28). 11: Surely, better, “because,” logically continuing 29.28 and emphasizing the ready accessibility of the Torah. The NJPS translation is an accommodation to the insertion of vv. 1–10. This Instruction, when used in the singular, refers to the Torah as a whole (as at 6.1); the contrasting plural use designates the individual stipulations (v. 10; 4.2, 40; 5.10; 6.17). 12: See Prov. 30.4. That we may observe it, lit. “so that He may proclaim it to us.” 14: In your mouth: In antiquity, written texts were normally read, taught, and recited aloud rather than silently (6.7; 31.19, 21; Josh. 1.8). 15–20: The necessity of choice. If “life” meant only biological life, there would be no choice. The choice is rather between life in the covenant and life not in the covenant. From this viewpoint, biological existence, and even prosperity, if not in the covenant, constitutes death. 16: Love . . . walk in His ways: In the technical language of Near Eastern treaties, “love” means to act loybless you in the land that you are about to enter and possess.¹⁷ But if your heart turns away and you give no heed, and are lured into the worship and service of other gods,¹⁸ I declare to you this day that you shall certainly perish; you shall not long endure on the soil that you are crossing the Jordan to enter and possess.¹⁹ I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day: I have put before you life and death, blessing and curse. Choose life—if you and your offspring would live—²⁰by loving the LORD your God, heeding His commands, and holding fast to Him. For thereby you shall have life and shall long endure upon the soil that the LORD swore to your ancestors, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give to them.

ally and to honor the commitments of the treaty (6.5 n.).

19: Heaven and earth to witness, see 4.26; 32.1 n. Choose life: Joshua reiterates the necessity of choice (Josh. 24.15). The didactic use of life and death suggests the influence of wisdom teachings upon the authors (Prov. 11.19; 14.27; 18.21; cf. Jer. 8.3; 21.8).

31.1–34.12: The death of Moses and the formation of the Torah.

With the imprecation of ch 30 marking the conclusion of the treaty between God and Israel, Deuteronomy now returns to Moses, the mediator of the treaty, as his life draws to a close. The inevitable question of succession is here given a twofold answer, as befits the role of Moses as both political and religious leader of Israel. Moses invests Joshua with leadership in political and military matters (31.1–8, 14–15, 23; 32.44, 48–52; 34.9), while also “putting down in writing the words of this Teaching” (31.24) to instruct the nation in matters of religion. Deuteronomy thus ends in paradox: Moses, ostensibly the book’s narrator, narrates his own death (ch 34); and the book of the Torah, which is already presupposed (29.26), nevertheless provides an account of its own formation (31.9–13, 24–29). The conclusion of Deuteronomy also marks, however, the conclusion of the Pentateuch. As they incorporated Deuteronomy into that larger work, later editors with the background of the exile contributed their perspectives on the function of the Torah in the people’s life. Finally, the Pentateuch’s literary precedent of a patriarch’s deathbed bequest and blessing (Gen. chs 27, 48–49) led to the incorporation of “The Song of Moses” (32.1–43) and of “The Blessing of Moses” (ch 33), each of which may originally have circulated independently. What results is a heavily “written over” text that blends several viewpoints. Themes like the Mosaic appointment of Joshua begin, then begin again from a different perspective, and then are continued only after an apparent digression, which marks the insertion of new material. The editors sought to incorporate later layers by patterning them after earlier ones, often repeating their key terms, while arranging the whole in an overarching chiasmic pattern

31.1–29: Moses makes arrangements for his death. Publicly announcing his imminent death, Moses invests Joshua with leadership and initiates the writing down of the Torah, which is to be taught regularly to the entire people. These two legacies seem independent of each other and suggest that an earlier narrative, concerned with the leadership issue, has been expanded to provide an account of the formation of the book of Deuteronomy. But, perhaps because of the importance of each of these two traditions, and the pivotal role occupied by Deuteronomy in the Pentateuch, each tradition is itself doubled. The chapter is thus quite complex and contains many layers of tradition: (a) There is a double announcement of the imminent mortality of Moses: v. 1 (at the initiative of Moses, citing previous divine commandment) and vv. 14–15 (with no reference to a previous announcement). (b) There is a corresponding double tradition concerning the transfer of leadership. Although Moses begins a public ceremony in order himself to appoint the new leader (vv. 7–8), a variant tradition has God commission Joshua directly (vv. 14–15, 23). (c) There is a double tradition concerning what Moses writes: one of “the words . . . of this Teaching” (v. 24) and one of “this poem” (v. 19). Each is to serve as a “witness” (vv. 21, 26). The first tradition, which refers to Deuteronomy, was supplemented by the second in order to integrate the following “Song of Moses” (32.1–43). (d) In the “Song” tradition, Israel’s future apostasy is already a foregone conclusion (vv. 16–22; 28–29); in the covenant-making tradition, there is yet hope that, by taking the law to heart, Israel might avoid catastrophe (vv. 9–13, 24–27).

31.1: Moses went and spoke: The Septuagint and Qumran texts attest an alternate version, “Moses finished speaking” (see translators’ note a-a; in Hebrew, the difference

I am now one hundred and twenty years old, I can no longer "be active." Moreover, the LORD has said to me, "You shall not go across yonder Jordan." ³The LORD your God Himself will cross over before you; and He Himself will wipe out those nations from your path and you shall dispossess them.—Joshua is the one who shall cross before you, as the LORD has spoken.—⁴The LORD will do to them as He did to Sihon and Og, kings of the Amorites, and to their countries, when He wiped them out. ⁵The LORD will deliver them up to you, and you shall deal with them in full accordance with the Instruction that I have enjoined upon you. ⁶Be strong and resolute, be not in fear or in dread of them; for the LORD your God Himself marches with you: He will not fail you or forsake you.

is continued by "and he said to them . . ." (v. 2; 32.46).

2: I am now one hundred and twenty years old. The Hebrew places the age first, thus immediately announcing the key issue in the plot. Moses has reached the maximum age allocated by God to humans (Gen. 6.3); the imminence of death makes it urgent to assure continuity of leadership. I can no longer be active, lit. "go out and come in," referring specifically to military leadership (Num. 27.17; 1 Kings 3.7; cf. 2 Sam. 11.1). 2-3: Resumes 1.37-38; 3.27-28. The death of a key leader and the transfer of his authority mark important turning points within the larger context of the Deuteronomistic History and partially follow a common model (cf. Josh. 23.2; 1 Sam. 12.2; 1 Kings 2.1-2). 4: The successful military campaigns in Transjordan provide assurance in the conquest of Canaan; Moses aims to counter Israel's intimidation (1.27-28; Num. chs 13-14). 5: The Instruction that I have enjoined upon you refers to the ban (7.1-7; 12.29-31; 20.16-18). 7-8: The speech commissioning Joshua into office includes three formal elements: encouragement (Be strong and resolute), description of the task (for it is you who . . .), of all Israel: "Be strong and resolute, for it is you who shall go with this people into the land that the LORD swore to their fathers to give them, and it is you who shall apportion it to them.⁸ And the LORD Himself will go before you. He will be with you; He will not fail you or forsake you. Fear not and be not dismayed!"

⁹Moses wrote down this Teaching and gave it to the priests, sons of Levi, who carried the Ark of the LORD's Covenant, and to all the elders of Israel.

¹⁰And Moses instructed them as follows: Every seventh year,^a the year set for remission, at the Feast of Booths, ¹¹when all Israel comes to appear before the LORD your God in the place that He will choose, you shall read this Teaching aloud in the presence of all Israel. ¹²Gather the people—men, women, children, and the strangers in your communities—that they may hear and so learn to revere the LORD your God and to observe faithfully every word of this Teaching. ¹³Their children, too, who have not had the experience, shall hear and learn to revere the LORD your God as long as they live in the land that you are about to cross the Jordan to possess.

¹⁴The LORD said to Moses: The time is drawing near for you to die. Call Joshua and present yourselves in the Tent of Meeting, that I may instruct him. Moses and Joshua went and presented themselves in the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁵The LORD appeared in the Tent, in a pillar of cloud, the pillar of cloud having come to rest at the entrance of the tent.

¹⁶The LORD said to Moses: You are soon to lie with your fathers. This people will thereupon go astray after the alien gods in their midst, in the land that they are about to enter; they will forsake Me and break My covenant that I made with them. ¹⁷Then My anger will flare up against them, and I will abandon them and hide My countenance from them. They shall be ready prey; and many evils and troubles shall befall them. And they shall say on that day, "Surely it is because our God is not in our midst that these evils have befallen us." ¹⁸Yet I will keep My countenance hidden on that day, because of all the evil they have done in turning to other gods. ¹⁹Therefore, write down this poem and teach it to the people of Israel; put it in their mouths, in order that this poem may be My witness against the people of Israel. ²⁰When I bring them into the land flowing with milk and honey that I promised on oath to their fathers, and they eat their fill and grow fat and and assurance of support (the LORD . . . will be with you). 9–13: The institution of a covenant ceremony to be held every seven years, in the sabbatical year (15.1–11), during the Feast of Booths (16.13–15). 12: The requirement that the law must be read publicly and taught to the assembled nation specifies the inclusion of women, minors, and non-Israelite resident aliens. The law does not restrict the responsibility to observe the covenant to males (contrast Exod. 19.15). 14: Tent of Meeting: In the J source, the site outside of the camp where God speaks to Moses, with Joshua in attendance (Exod. 33.7–11). This tent should be distinguished from the Tabernacle of the Priestly literature, located in the center of the Israelite encampment and housing the . . . Ark of the Covenant and the altar (Exod. chs 26–27; Num. 7.1–3; 18.1–7). That I may instruct him: The more standard tradition involves direct commission by Moses at God's command (3.27–28; 34.9; Num. 27.18–23). 15: The double reference to the pillar of cloud, located both in the Tent (cf. Exod. 30.36; 40.34–35; Lev. 16.2) and at the entrance of the tent (cf. Exod. 33.9–10; Num. 12.5) blends the separate traditions associated with each of the two tents regarding the site of divine communication. 16: Forsake: The punishment is measure for measure (v. 17). 17: Our God: Although the word generally has this meaning, the Hebrew could also mean "our gods," which makes sense here. The people will have strayed so far from the covenant that they attribute the resulting divine punishment to other gods. This interpretation explains God's angry response (v. 18).

turn to other gods and serve them, spurning Me and breaking My covenant,²¹ and the many evils and troubles befall them—then this poem shall confront them as a witness, since it will never be lost from the mouth of their offspring. For I know what plans they are devising even now, before I bring them into the land that I promised on oath.

²²That day, Moses wrote down this poem and taught it to the Israelites.

²³And He charged Joshua son of Nun: “Be strong and resolute: for you shall bring the Israelites into the land that I promised them on oath, and I will be with you.”

²⁴When Moses had put down in writing the words of this Teaching to the very end,²⁵ Moses charged the Levites who carried the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD, saying: ²⁶Take this book of Teaching and place it beside the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD your God, and let it remain there as a witness against you. ²⁷Well I know how defiant and stiffnecked you are: even now, while I am still alive in your midst, you have been defiant toward the LORD; how much more, then, when I am dead! ²⁸Gather to me all the elders of your tribes and your officials, that I may speak all these words to them and that I may call heaven and earth to witness against them. ²⁹For I know that, when I am dead, you will act wickedly and turn away from the path that I enjoined upon you, and that in time to come misfortune will befall you for having done evil in the sight of the LORD and vexed Him by your deeds.

³⁰Then Moses recited the words of this poem to the very end, in the hearing of the whole congregation of Israel:

HA'AZINU

הֲאִזִּינוּ

32 Give ear, O heavens, let me speak;
Let the earth hear the words I utter!

a I.e., may my words be received eagerly; cf. Job 29.22–23.

22–23: The sequence of Moses wrote down (v. 22) and . . . charged (v. 23) uses the same key terms as “When Moses had put down in writing . . . Moses charged” (vv. 24–25). The repetition of the paired terms provided a means for editors to insert the section on the song (vv. 16–22). 23: And He charged, lit. “He commanded,” with no subject identified. NJPS, by capitalizing the pronoun, indicates the divine reference to clarify that the verse does not continue from v. 22 but directly resumes vv. 14–15.

31.30–32.44: The Song of Moses. The Song is a late insertion that reflects upon Israel’s history and almost certainly presupposes the exile. The Song’s literary form is a revised and expanded prophetic lawsuit (Isa. ch 1; Jer. ch 2; Mic. ch 6; Ps. 50). The basic structure is as follows: (1) Introduction, with summoning of witnesses (vv. 1–3); (2) Summary accusation of Israel’s disloyalty (vv. 4–6); (3) Recital of God’s loving actions on Israel’s behalf as the basis for the charge (vv. 7–14); (4) Indictment of Israel as disloyal (vv. 15–18); (5) Declaration of the decision to punish Israel (vv. 19–25). At this very point, however, God interrupts His own judicial sentence to recognize a risk to His honor: other nations might conclude that Israel’s God was weak should they see Israel destroyed (vv. 26–27). God reverses Himself, cancels the just-pronounced punishment, and decides instead to punish Israel’s enemies so as to vindicate Israel (vv. 28–42). The Song concludes with a call for the divine council to praise God for His actions; the call may originate from within the divine council itself (v. 43; similarly, Ps. 29.1). A prose frame links the Song to Deuteronomy by identifying Moses, otherwise unmentioned in the poem, as its speaker (31.30; 32.44). 2: The reference to discourse, and the criticism of Israel as “dull and witless” (v. 6) show how the original prophetic lawsuit has been combined with ideas taken from wisdom literature (Prov. 1.5; 4.2; 7.21). 4: Rock, more accurately, "Mountain," a title applied to the high god of ancient Canaanite literature (see v. 8 n.) and to the biblical God (vv. 15, 18, 30, 31, 37; Isa. 44.8; Ps. 78.35). 6: Created you, when God redeemed Israel from Egypt (Exod.

15.16). 8: Most High, or "Elyon," is the formal title of El, the senior god who presided over the divine council in the Ugaritic literature of ancient Canaan. The reference thus invokes, as do other biblical texts, the Near Eastern convention of a pantheon of gods ruled by the chief deity (Pss. 82.1; 89.6–8). Israelite authors regularly applied El's title to Israel's God (Gen. 14.18–22; Num. 24.16; Pss. 46.5; 47.3). Even the precise parallelism "Rock" / "Elyon" (see v. 4; Ps. 78.35) reflects a conventional Ugaritic title for El. In relation to Israel's numbers is unintelligible as it stands. The variant attested by the Septuagint and at Qumran, "according to the sons of El" (cf. NRSV), which preserves the mythological reference to Most High ("Elyon") earlier in the verse, makes much more sense. Here, the idea is that the chief god allocates the nations to lesser deities in the pantheon. (A postbiblical notion that seventy angels are in charge of the world's seventy nations echoes this idea.) Almost certainly, the unintelligible reading of the MT represents a "correction" of the original text (whereby God presides over other gods) to make it conform to the later standard of pure monotheism: There are no other gods! The polytheistic imagery of the divine council is also deleted at 32.43; 33.2–3, 7.

9: Portion: This and the following term reflect ancient estate law: Israel is God's special inheritance (4.20; cf. 7.6; 14.2; 26.18). Own allotment: NJPS has added own in order to avoid the impression that 'Elyon, as head of the pantheon, has assigned Israel to YHWH, as merely a member of the pantheon. The translation suggests that Israel's God, here identified with Elyon, reserves Israel for Himself until the end. The Hebrew permits either reading. 10: Found (Hos. 9.10): Overlooking the traditions about the slavery in Egypt, the Song here traces the beginnings of Israel to the wilderness period, romanticizing its ideal purity (similarly, Hos. 2.14–15; Jer. 2.2–3; contrast Deut. 9.6–7, 22–27; Ezek. ch 20). 11: God, as an eagle, tenderly bears Israel as a fledgling (see Exod. 19.4). Ironically, the dietary laws prohibit the eagle as ritually unclean (14.12). 13: High-lands, see Exod. 15.17. 14: Curd, symbolic of extravagant hospitality offered to special guests (Gen.

18.8; Judg. 5.25). 15: Jeshurun, probably meaning "upright," a poetic term for Israel (33.5, 26; Isa. 44.2). 17: Demons, better, "protective spirits," using a word borrowed from Akkadian (also Ps. 106.37). No-gods: The language is intentionally sarcastic (see also v. 21). 18: The Rock that begot you . . . brought you forth: The Hebrew much more vividly presents God as going through childbirth: "The Rock who gave birth to you . . . who writhed in labor (to bear) you." The same verb is elsewhere applied to Sarah, who "writhed in labor" to bring Israel forth (so Isa. 51.2, lit.). That God had to suffer labor pains to bear Israel only increases the injustice of Israel's forgetting its divine parent. For the metaphor of God panting as a woman in labor, see Isa. 42.14. Such cases provide an important alternative to the normal masculine imagery associated with God. 21: Incensed refers to the covenant's demand for exclusive loyalty to God (5.8; 6.15; Num. 25.11). Accordingly, the punishment for breach of the covenant metes out precise talionic justice (see 19.19 n.). Heb emphasizes the sarcasm: thus, with no-gods and no-folk. Their futilities, lit. "their vapors" or "their vanities," even "their vapidities" (Jer. 8.19, "futilities"; 10.15, "delusion"; 16.19, "delusions"; Eccl. 1.2, "futility"). 22: Sheol, the underworld (Gen. 37.25; 1 Sam. 2.6; Ps. 139.8). The abode of all the dead, not a place of damnation like the later idea of hell. 23: My arrows, divine punishments (v. 42; Ezek. 5.16; Pss. 7.14; 18.15; 38.3). 24: Ravaging plague reflects the name of the Ugaritic god of pestilence, thus better, "devoured by Plague." 25: Youth . . . maiden, better, "young man . . . young woman," to emphasize along with suckling . . . aged the double merism (28.3–6 n.), which symbolizes the totality of the slaughter. 26–27: The Song here pivots from judgment of Israel to her vindication at the expense of the foreign invaders. 27: For fear: God has feelings and vulnerabilities (as at Gen. 6.6). Our own hand has prevailed, lit., "our hand is held high" in victory (Num. 33.3, "defiantly"; Ps. 89.14). 28–31: God's soliloquy is interrupted by another voice that refers to God in the third person and speaks on behalf of Israel (vv. 30–31). The voice is contextually that of Moses (see translators' note a), but it is one that assumes the perspective of scribal wisdom. The section therefore seems to be an addition to the text, separating God's abrupt change of heart (vv. 25–27) from the explicit announcement of judgment upon the foreign nation (vv. 34–38). 28–29: The insertion here directs against the foreign nation the same critique already made of Israel: God's judgment is justified by the nation's lack of wisdom (vv. 6, 20). 30: A citation within a citation: The verse, attributed to Israel's enemy, in effect reproaches the foreign nation for failing to understand that it owes its triumph over Israel to God rather than force of arms. The imagery ironically inverts the holy war idea (3.22; 20.1), now turning it against Israel. 32: Sodom . . . Gomorrah, here symbolizing moral corruption more than ruinous devastation (cf. 29.22 n.). 34: It, the punishment of the foreign nation, which is about to be announced (vv. 35–42). Put away . . . sealed up refers to the formal legal procedures for rolling and then sealing a witnessed deed or contract with a wax seal, so that the unaltered document can subsequently be introduced into court as evidence (Isa. 8.16; Jer. 32.9–15). 35: Vengeance, better, "vindication," since the idea is not revenge but justice. 36: Their might is gone, And neither bond nor free is left: God will act when no one survives who can take charge or provide assistance (2 Kings 14.26; cf. 1 Kings 14.10; 21.21; 2 Kings 9.8). 37–38: Further sarcasm. 39: Similar to exilic Second Isaiah (Isa. 41.4; 43.10, 13; 44.6; 45.6–7, 22; 48.12). 40: I raise my hand, elsewhere translated "I swear," which clarifies the meaning here. God is represented anthropomorphically, as performing the physical gesture that marks a formal legal oath (see

Thus, because of the judicial connotation, vengeance gives the wrong idea (v. 35 n.). Reject Me, treaty language that refers to disloyal action that violates the covenant. 43: As it stands, the Hebrew presents numerous difficulties. The opening vocative O nations is illogical in this context. The verse demands that the very nations judged guilty of spilling Israel's blood suddenly join in the chorus of those praising

Israel—in the moment before their destruction! The expected poetic parallelism (AA'BB', as in v. 2) is absent. Here the second line presents a completely different idea than the first line, rather than repeating it with a variation. The absence of parallelism is not simply a formal stylistic issue: It renders the climax of the poem unintelligible. The incoherence of v. 43 in its present form suggests that the original text has been disrupted. Alternative reflections of the text, as preserved by the LXX and by the Dead Sea Scrolls, restore the poem's lost coherence. A reconstruction of the original form of the verse is shown in the diagram below. The restoration opens up an entire world of meaning and provides the expected poetic parallelism for the first, second, and third pairs of lines, which is absent in the MT. In the ancient versions, it is logically the "heavens" who are addressed (as in v. 1 and Isa 1.2) and who rejoice with God. That makes more sense than requiring the nations illogically to praise Israel. The restoration also shows how the poem's conclusion, "heavens . . . land" (v. 43) forms an inclusio with its beginning, "heavens . . . earth" (v. 1). It also continues the mythological imagery of God presiding over the divine council and acting as Divine Warrior (see vv. 8–9 n.; vv. 41–42). Almost certainly, the challenge to monotheism in the original form of the verse is what triggered the attempts to purge the text of polytheistic elements, i.e. the shift from "heavens" to "nations" and the elision of the parallelism, with its reference to plural deities. Note the similar "correction" of the text at v. 8. Avenge the blood: These lines present God as divine blood-avenger (cf. 19.6), who removes the stain of Israel's blood from the land by requiring the aggressor for having spilled it (19.11–13). Cleanse: The line makes sense as it stands; the textual emendation suggested by NJPS in translators' note a is neither necessary nor linguistically valid. The moral stain on the land can only be "wiped clean" (the word's literal meaning) with the blood of the murderer (Num. 35.33–34; cf. Deut. 21.8): here, the foreign nation. God's position is nonetheless morally ambiguous, since it was God who had sanctioned the foreign invasion as just punishment for Israel's wrongdoing (vv. 19–26).

32.44–47: Double conclusion to the Song. Two originally separate conclusions joined by Deuteronomy's editors. 44: All the words . . . frames the Song of Moses in a perfect inclusio (see 31.30), thus concluding that unit. 45–47: A separate section, the original continuation of 31.29 prior to the insertion of the Song. 46: All the words, specifically, the laws of Deuteronomy (31.24); now, following the insertion of the Song, reinterpreted to refer to both. 47: Not a trifling thing, using the same word as the Laws of Hammurabi: "My laws . . . are trifling only to the fool" (Epi-logue).

32.48–52: Moses commanded to die. This section repeats the announcement of Moses' death (Num. 27.12–14) and thus joins it to its logical continuation, the narrative of that death (Deut. ch 34). The original connection between these two Priestly sections was broken with Deuteronomy's insertion into the Torah. 49: These heights of Abarim to Mount Nebo, as in the Priestly narrative (Num. 27.12; 33.47); but, according to the Deuteronomistic tradition, Pisgah

(3.27). The two traditions are joined at 34.1. 50: You shall die, lit. "Die . . . !" This unusual imperative establishes that Moses both lives and dies at God's command (34.5 n.). Gathered to your kin refers specifically to burial in a family tomb, where the bones of the generations would be gathered together (2 Kings 8.24; 22.20; cf. 1 Kings 13.31). Here the phrase is used metaphorically, since Moses' burial place is unknown (34.6). Mount Hor, consistent with the Priestly tradition (Num. 20.22–29; 33.37–39); but, in the Deuteronomistic tradition, "Moserah" (10.6). 51: You both broke faith, see Num. 20.1–13.

33.1–29: The Blessing of Moses. Based upon the literary precedent of a father's blessing of his progeny when death is imminent (Gen. 27.27–29; 48.15–16; 49.1–28; cf. 1 Kings 2.1–4), Moses addresses the tribes, arrayed before him

(29.1, 9; 31.7, 30) as if all Israel were his own progeny, gathered before the deathbed (Gen. 48.2; 49.33). Conforming to the literary model of the blessing, the tribes are primarily addressed in the singular, as if they were individual sons (cf. v. 19). Surprisingly, Deuteronomy makes no reference to the two sons of Moses (Exod. 2.22; 18.3–4; see also 34.6 n.). This poem is clearly an insertion into Deuteronomy, intruding between God's command to Moses to ascend Nebo to prepare for his death (32.49–50) and Moses' compliance (34.1–5).

In its present form the poem was created by editors who have consciously combined several older literary models, in three stages, to create something new. (1) The literary convention of the patriarchal blessing addressed individually to each of the twelve tribes (vv. 6–25) has been (2) embedded in a framing poem, which is rather addressed to a united Israel (vv. 1–5, 26–29). The focus of the framing poem is not on tribal destiny but on YHWH as the Divine Warrior who departs from the distant mountains that are His home. Accompanied by His divine pantheon, God comes to the rescue of His people in a powerful theophany that disturbs nature, defeats foreign adversaries, and results in His proclamation as Divine King, while ensuring His nation's rule. This model goes back to the classical victory hymns to the Divine Warrior (Judg. ch 5, Ps. 18.8–16; Hab. ch 3; cf. Exod. ch 15). That older model has been (3) significantly transformed, however. In vv. 1–4, the expected climax of the divine theophany in the military defeat of the enemy has been totally eclipsed (cf. vv. 26–29), although it is the logical precondition for the proclamation of God as King (v. 5). The editors have instead introduced a new climax: Moses' proclamation of Torah (v. 4 n.). The reference here to Sinai instead of Deuteronomy's usual Horeb (see 1.2 n.) is an attempt by the later editors of the Blessing to integrate Deuteronomy with the other literary sources of the Torah (Exod. chs 19–20; Lev. 25.1; Num. 10.12). The editors have used an inclusio pattern to embed the Blessing (with its focus upon the individual tribes) into the framing hymn to the Divine Warrior (where united Israel is the focus). Thus the chiasm LORD:Jacob:Jeshurun::Jeshurun':Jacob':LORD' (A:B:C::C':B':A'; vv. 2, 4, 5, 26, 28, 29) brackets the inserted Blessing. Older hymns to the Divine Warrior sometimes list the tribes' contributions to the battle (Judg. 5.14–18), facilitating the combination of the two models. Although it draws upon older textual traditions, the poem in its present form is almost certainly exilic or post-exilic. The combination of two separate literary models and the emphasis on Torah rather than on the Divine Warrior's manifestation in battle suggests the later literary setting.

^b Meaning of Heb. mimino³eshdath uncertain, perhaps a place name.

^c The meaning of vv. 3–5 is uncertain. An alternative rendering, with v. 3 apostrophizing Moses, is: ³Then were, O lover of the people, / All His worshippers in your care; / They followed your lead, / Accepted your precepts. / ⁴Moses charged us with the Teaching / As the heritage of the congregation of Jacob. / ⁵Thus was he king in Jeshurun . . .

33.1: Man of God, a prophet, concerning whom "everything that he says comes true" (1 Sam. 9.6; see also Josh. 14.6; 1 Kings 13.1–32; 17.18, 24; 2 Kings 4.7–41). This term is not used of Moses elsewhere in Deuteronomy. 2: The LORD came from Sinai; He shone: God's departure from His distant mountain stronghold, dramatically coming to the rescue of His people, closely follows the model of Judg. 5.4; Hab. 3.3. Sinai . . . Seir: The geography intended by the parallelism is anomalous. Normally Sinai is located in the Sinai

Peninsula, south of Israel, while Seir, associated with Edom (Judg. 5.4), lies in the east, in southern Transjordan. And approached from Ribebboth-kodesh: The place name is otherwise unknown; and the alternative in translators' note a, Kadesh, has no connection to God's theophany. The Heb can also be understood (with LXX, Samaritan; cf. NRSV) as "with Him were thousands of holy ones," i.e., the divine council who accompany God into battle (32.8 n.; Pss. 68.18; 89.8). This alternative translation, which only changes the vowels of one word in the MT, (from approached to "with Him,") is to be preferred since it preserves the poem's representation of God as Divine Warrior (see 33.1–29 n.). God similarly ventures forth from Sinai, at the head of a divine host of "thousands upon thousands," to appear in theophany in Ps. 68.18. 3: Their hallowed, originally, the divine council. The poem's editors seem to have shifted it to refer to Israel (7.6; 14.2, 21; 26.19; 28.9; Lev. 19.2; Num. 16.3) to permit a transition to v. 4. 4: Moses charged us: Since Moses is himself the speaker (v. 1), the change of perspective is disruptive and suggests that the verse was inserted so as to present the promulgation of Mosaic Torah as the climax of the Divine Warrior's theophany! (See 33.1–29 n.) 5: Then He became King: Although the subject is not specified, it almost certainly refers to God as Divine King of Israel (Exod. 15.18; Num. 23.21; Judg. 8.22–23; 1 Sam. 8.7; Isa. 33.22; Ps. 29.10). NJPS's capitalized pronoun reflects this interpretation. The idea of God's kingship is central to the Bible, but is rarely explicit in the Torah. Jeshurun, see 32.15 n. 6: Reuben, who once had the leadership of the first-born (see Gen. 49.3–4), is apparently threatened with extinction, owing to military pressures in Transjordan. (Simeon, Jacob's second-born, is missing from the list entirely.) 7: Judah, in sore trouble because of an unnamed adversary (perhaps the Philistines), should be helped by other tribes. This depiction con-
